

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

THE work, of which a New Edition is now presented to the public, was, on its original publication, and still continues to be, a most valuable contribution to the Legal Literature of Scotland. Indeed, a more valuable aid to all engaged in the practice, as well as in the study, of the law of Scotland, could not have been furnished. One of the great merits of the work is, that it gives the law applicable to the subjects of its various articles in the language of the Institutional Writers themselves, so that the legal student or practitioner who may consult it has at once brought before him an authoritative abstract of the law. No other work of a similar kind is equal to it, and indeed no other work has ever attempted to rival or displace it. A New Edition has been called for, both on account of the former impression being exhausted, and also on account of the various changes in the law which have taken place during the last twenty years of legislation. These changes, which relate principally to Conveyancing, have been incorporated in the present Edition. A few articles are almost, or entirely new, such as that of "APPROBATE and REPROBATE," which also comprehends the English doctrine of "ELECTION." The article "ASSIGNATION" is considerably enlarged, and that of "ASSIGNMENT" is almost entirely new. In the former of these articles the law relating to Latent Trusts is more fully set forth; and in the latter the English law of Notice in the case of Assignments is attempted to be explained. The article "COMPENSATION" is also considerably enlarged, and the various cases in which the plea of compensation may arise with reference to debts due to or by a Company, and debts due to or by its Partners, are pointed out. Under the article "STATUTES" will be found an Index to the important Statutes which have been passed during the present reign.

In consulting the earlier Articles, it is important to observe that they were sent to Press before the passing of some of the recent Statutes introducing changes in the law. This circumstance will account for no notice having been taken of these changes, but in subsequent Articles, opportunities were afforded for remedying the omission.

The article "TITLES TO LAND" is entirely new, and details the various successive alterations that have been made in conveyancing since 1845. At the close of this article, there is also indicated what still remains to be done; in order to free the transfer of land of all the feudal hindrances with which it may still be considered to be fettered. The change suggested is a very simple, but at the same time a very important one. It is simply this, that in future there should be no recurrence to the Superior for an entry, by a Vassal's heir or disponent, but that the decree of service in favour of the former should be pronounced, and that the conveyance in favour of the latter should be granted, under burden of all the superior's rights, contained in the Original Charter of the lands, or in any subsequent Charter by Progress, recorded in the Books of Council and Session, or in the Register of Sasines, and subject also to those rights which are the legal incidents of a right of Superiority. By this means all the substantial rights of superiors would remain intact, with this additional advantage provided to them, that every proprietor whose name appears on the Register of Sasines should be held to be the vassal in the lands on the death of the former vassal, and thus the heir of the former vassal would be prevented from offering to enter as vassal, and so depriving the superior of his composition.

A less violent change on the present system could not possibly be proposed, and yet complete freedom in the transfer of land from all feudal trammels would be effected. Superiors and vassals would have it in their power, as now, to transact in regard to the sale and purchase of the duties and casualties exigible by a superior, but a compulsory sale of those rights would not be enforced. If a superior were to be compelled to sell his feuduties, the creditor in a ground-annual must equally be compelled to sell his right of ground-annual; and on the same principle, too, a landlord should be compelled to sell his right under a long lease. This, however, would be an unnecessary interference with the rights of property, for it is difficult to furnish a satisfactory answer to the question—Why should annual payments out of land not be permitted, if parties choose to create such rights? When it is the interest of both parties that such payments should be redeemed, their redemption will be effected. To facilitate their redemption, heirs of entail who are superiors ought to be authorised to sell, and those who are vassals to purchase, rights of superiority—the price in the case of a superior selling being invested in the purchase of lands, and in the case of a vassal purchasing, being imposed as a burden on the entailed estate, in the same manner as is authorised by the Titles to Land Act in the case of Writs of Investiture. Where the rights of superiority are sold to the vassal, a Writ of Discharge should be granted in his favour by the superior, and that writ, on being recorded in the Register of Sasines, would free the land for ever of all the duties discharged by it.

The existence of a feu-duty, ground-annual, or other annual payment, is no obstacle to the free transfer of land. On the contrary, where the annual payment is considerable, the burden may be considered as a means of facilitating its transfer. For what is a reserved annual burden but a part of the price unpaid by the purchaser and secured upon the land, with this important difference, that the purchaser can never be called on to pay the principal sum reserved? To compel, therefore, a sale of feu-duties or ground-annuities against the will of the party in right of them, is to interfere unnecessarily with the private pactions of individuals; and it may be doubted whether, if such an interference were authorised by the Legislature, many vassals would avail themselves of their statutory privilege of redemption.

In the case of Vassal Corporations, where the rights of the superior are not discharged, the superior should be entitled to payment of a composition from the Corporation, not only on the death of the last vassal from whom the Corporation may have purchased the land, but also at every twenty-fifth or thirty-third year from the payment of the last composition.

The Crown rights of superiority stand in a different position from those of Subject Superiors. In regard to these, therefore, a sale compulsory on the part of the Crown, but optional on the part of the vassal, ought to be authorised; and on a sale taking place, a Writ of Discharge should be granted, and thereafter an entry by the Crown should no longer be required. The price to be paid by a Crown vassal for a Writ of Discharge might be fixed at twenty years' purchase of the annual feu-duty, along with the amount of a single composition. Where the feu-duty is not payable in money, but in grain or other articles in kind, such duties might be converted into money in the same manner as they are now converted in Exchequer when such duties are exacted from a vassal.

If the suggestion now proposed were adopted, the Feudal system of Conveyancing would be entirely abolished. No vestige of it would then remain. Charters, and Writs, of Confirmation and of Resignation, Charters of Sale, and of Adjudication, Precepts, and Writs of Clare Constat, would all follow in the train of those once equally powerful instruments of Feudal machinery—Obligations to infeft by a double manner of holding, Procuratories and Instruments of Resignation, Precepts and Instruments of Sasine. The change, too, would be a voluntary one. For one of the distinguishing features of all recent legislation in regard to the forms of conveyancing is, that it permits, but does not compel,—it creates, but does not destroy,—it introduces something new, but does not abolish what is old. A right to elect between the old and the new forms is conferred, and thus the merits of the latter are tested before the former are entirely laid aside.

Although, however, the Feudal system of Conveyancing would be virtually abolished, the substantial rights of superiors would not be interfered with. That system is based on the relation of Superior and Vassal, and on requiring a formal acknowledgment to be granted on every change of vassal. If that relation were abolished, the more simple one of Landlord and Tenant as under a perpetual Lease, or that of debtor and creditor as under a Contract of ground annual, would be substituted instead. In neither of these cases is any renewal of the original deed required. A lease, however long, endures until its term of duration expires. A contract of ground-annual can always be enforced. Why, then, should any renewal of a grant of land be necessary? A vassal is nothing else than a holder of land under an irrevocable grant, with certain annual and other payments to make to the granter, in consideration of his right. What is this but a tenant of land under a perpetual lease? This is the modern character of a Feu right. Formerly, a vassal could renounce his feu against the will of his superior. Modern notions refuse to recognise any such right. Both superior and vassal are bound by the original grant. The one cannot revoke, the other cannot renounce. This doctrine, although now fully established, was at one time strongly opposed by some who deemed it an unwarrantable innovation on the pure principles of the Feudal system.

The rights and obligations of the two parties interested in the land would thus remain as before. The annual feu-duty would just be a ground-annual, which is the form the transaction assumes when subinfeudation is prohibited. The casualties of Composition and Relief would also be exacted as formerly. A superior may perhaps object that, when the lands are sold, he has no means of ascertaining the death of his former vassal, on which event depends his right to exact a composition. To such an objection it is answered, that, under the present system, a superior is constantly exposed to the same inconvenience, as the new vassal seldom demands an entry from the superior, but waits until an entry is demanded of him. There might, nowever, be no objection to benefit the superior so far, as to allow the composition to carry interest from the death of the last vassal. Or perhaps it might be an advantage to both parties to allow a composition at fixed periods, as suggested in the case of corporations; but with this proviso, that not more than one composition should be demanded from the same vassal.

The effect of the change now proposed would be considerable. All feudal hindrance to the free transfer of land would be removed. There would be no recurring to the superior for an entry in any case. All the valuable rights of the superior would remain, but the feudal dignity of granting Charters by Progress would cease. That being accomplished, the owners of land would have no ground of complaint, and the transfer of land might become as simple as it was in the earlier ages of conveyancing.

Abandoning an Action. It is competent to a pursuer, after the record is closed, to abandon the cause on paying full expenses to the defender, and to bring a new action if otherwise competent; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 10. But this regulation only applies to the case where the abandonment is made before an interlocutor has been pronounced, assolvieing the defender in whole or in part, or leading, by necessary inference, to such absolvitor; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 115. It would seem that an abandonment of the cause before closing the record, although competent, is not held to fall under the above statutory regulation; Caledonian Foundry v. Clyne, 14th Dec. 1831, 10 S. & D. 133; and so the giving or refusing expenses is a matter of discretion with the Court, in such a case.

As to a statutory abandonment after the record is closed, see Shirreff, 24th May 1836, 14 S. 825, in which case the Lord Ordinary, instead of dismissing the action, having assolvied without any reservation of a right of new action, the pursuer was, nevertheless, allowed to bring a new action. The pursuer is liable for expenses taxed only as between party and party; Lockhart, 15th July 1845, 7 D. 1045. The minute of abandonment must be ratified by the judge, in order to give it effect in putting an end to the process; Mur, 2d Feb. 1849, 21 Jurist, 139; Cornack, 25th June 1846, 8 D. 889; and a new action cannot be insisted in, unless the expenses of the previous one have been either paid or consigned; Lawson, 1st July 1845, 7 D. 960. By A. S. 10th July 1839, § 61, a pursuer before the Sheriff Courts may, upon paying full expenses, enter upon record an abandonment of the cause, "before any interlocutor of absolvitor is pronounced." See Shand's Prac. 333; McGlashan's Sheriff Court Prac. 333; Shaw's Digest, ii. 992; iii. 354. See Amendment of Libel.

Abandonment; in the law of insurance, is the relinquishment, by the insured, to the underwriters, of all claim to the subject saved. This right may be exercised wherever there is such a loss as to make the voyage not worth pursuing; or where the thing saved has lost its chief value; where the salvage is very high; or where further expense is necessary, which the insured does not choose to undertake. The election to abandon must be made as soon as the insured has obtained correct information as to the loss; and reasonable notice of the abandonment must be given. In this country no particular form of notice is required; in some countries it is by protest. Bell's Princ. § 484, and authorities there cited; Illust. § 485, et seq.; Shaw's Digest, p. 284.

The actual annihilation of a ship is not necessary to constitute a total loss. It is sufficient, if the expenses of repairs would exceed the value of the ship when repaired. Where, therefore, the damage to the ship is so great, from the perils insured against, as that the owner cannot put her in a state of repair necessary for pursuing the voyage insured, except at an expense greater than the value of the ship, he is not bound to incur that expense, but is at liberty to abandon and treat the loss as a total loss. Although, however, the assured may claim upon a total loss where the ship is not actually annihilated, if they do so, they must abandon the vessel to the underwriters, and give up along with the vessel all benefit and advantage belonging or incident to it. One of the incident advantages or benefits is the freight which the vessel has earned, and this falls to be given up to the underwriters paying for a total loss, as much as the vessel itself, or any matter of value incident to it. In Berson v. Chapman, 6 M. & G. 792, TINDALL, C. J., observed:—"The assured has sustained a total loss of the freight if he abandons the ship to the underwriters, and is justified in so doing; for, after such abandonment, he has no longer the means of earning the freight, or the possibility of ever receiving it, if earned, such freight going to the underwriters on ship." In Case v. Davidson, 5 M. & S. 79, Lord TESTERDEN observed:—"I have never heard of an instance in which the assured, after abandoning the ship to the underwriters, has stepped in and claimed the freight as against the underwriters. On the contrary, the practice has been uncontested, that the abandonee has received the freight." In the case of the "Laurel," the owner had insured the vessel with one company, and the freight with another. The cargo consisted of timber, and the vessel, on her voyage from Quebec to Liverpool, was seriously damaged by an iceberg. She, however, reached Liverpool, and delivered her cargo to the consigners, by whom the freight was paid. The owners then gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters, and brought an action claiming as for a total loss. The jury found "that the vessel was a total loss, irrespective of the decayed timber and deficient sails." The underwriters then claimed the freight, on the ground that, having paid the full value of the ship, they had acquired right to all her earnings. This claim the Court sustained, and their judgment was affirmed. Lord COTTENHAM, C., observed:—"Where a ship has received such repairs as entitles the owners to treat her as actually lost, and where the owner consequently abandons her to the underwriters, they come in as assignees, and so are entitled to all freight afterwards earned." Stewart v. Greenock Insurance Company, 8 D. 323, 1 Macqueen 328.

Where, however, the owners elect to abandon the vessel to the underwriters, and where freight has been actually earned, and the underwriters on the vessel have deducted the freight from the sums assured, the owners have no claim against the underwriters on the freight. In the case of the "Laurel," the owners having been compelled to surrender the freight to the underwriters on the vessel, raised an action against the insurers on the freight, on the ground that, as the underwriters on the ship had been found entitled to the freight, it must be considered as lost to the assured, and consequently recoverable from the underwriters on the freight. The Court sustained the claim of the owners, but their judgment was reversed, on the ground that what the underwriters on the freight undertook was, that the voyage should be performed, so that the owners should be able to deliver the cargo, and be in a condition to assert their title to the freight, and that the underwriters on the freight had undoubtedly performed this contract. Lord COTTENHAM observed:—"The underwriters on freight engaged that the ship should not be prevented by perils of the sea from enabling the owners to earn her freight. The right of the underwriters on the ship to claim that freight arose, not from perils of the sea, but from the election made by the owners, after the freight had been earned, to treat the ship as wholly lost." Turner v. Scottish Marine Insurance Company, 13 D. 652, 1 Macqueen, 334.

The owners of a vessel may be deprived of their right of abandonment, and of claiming as for a total loss, where the master elects to repair the damage caused to the vessel. The duty of the master, in the case of damage to the ship, is to do all that can be done towards bringing the adventure to a successful termination—to repair the ship if there be a reasonable prospect of doing so, at an expense not ruinous—and to bring home the cargo, and earn the freight, if possible. Unless, therefore, it is shown that the master, in repairing the ship, acted improperly, the mere fact that the expenses of repair ultimately prove to be greater than the value of the ship, will not be sufficient to show that he acted beyond the scope of his authority, for he is held to have authority to act as a provident uninsured owner would have done. This law was applied by the House of Lords in the case of Benson v. Chapman, 1849, 2 C. & F. 696, where the vessel was repaired by the master, and the expenses exceeded the value of the ship and freight. It was held that the case was one of constructive total loss, and that the master might have abandoned; but that as he had elected to repair, he must be treated for that purpose as the agent of the owner, whose acts bound the owner.

Abbey. Prior to the Reformation, an abbey was a monastery or religious house, where religious persons, whether men or women, resided under the direction and control of an Abbot or Abbess. In Scotland, the word abbey is also used colloquially, to signify the sanctuary against personal diligence afforded by the Abbey of Holyroodhouse, as having been a royal residence. See Sanctuary.

Abbot. An Abbot was the head and governor of a religious house or abbey. He had commonly a Prior under him; and, before the Reformation, Abbots sat ex officio in the Scotch Parliament. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 4.

Abbreviate of Adjudication; an abridgment or abstract of the decree of adjudication, containing the names of the creditor and debtor, and of the lands adjudged, with the amount of the debt. This abbreviate used formerly to be authenticated by the signature of the Lord Ordinary by whom the decree was pronounced; but is now signed by the Extractor; (1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 18.) The abbreviate must be recorded within sixty days. The register of abbreviates is kept by the clerks of the bills, and the certificate of registration is written on the abbreviate. A copy of the abbreviate is also appended to the extract of the decree, on which likewise the recording is certified. An abbreviate is necessary in all adjudications, whether in payment or in implement; but, where led before the Sheriff on decrees cognitionis causæ, the abbreviate need not be signed or recorded. An omission to record the abbreviate will have the effect of postponing the adjudication, in competition with another adjudication duly recorded, but does not infer nullity in a question with the debtor. No horning against superiors can be obtained unless the abbreviate be recorded; but if infestment have followed on the adjudication, the omission to record the abbreviate is of no consequence in a question with creditors adjudging posterior to the sasine. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 26; 1661, c. 31; Reg. 1695, c. 24; A. S. 18th Jan. 1715; A. S. 2d Dec. 1742; A. S. 10th July 1811; Bell's Com., i. 704, 722, 746; Shand's Prac. ii. 700, and authorities there cited; Mr More's Notes on Stair, p. ccvi; Bank. vol. ii. p. 222, § 50; Bell's Princ. § 825; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. voce Registration; Shaw's Digest, p. 6, § 17; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit., vol. iii. p. 888. See Adjudication.

Abdicate; to resign. Generally applied to the case of a magistrate or other functionary giving up or quitting his office before his term of service is expired. Tomlins, h. t.

Abduction of Women; is the unlawful taking away of the person of a woman, whether child, wife, ward, heiress, or woman generally. In England, the abduction of a wife, whether by open violence or by fraudulent practices, (which are held equivalent to constraint), is punishable by fine and imprisonment, as a crime, and may also found a civil action for damages. A similar action will lie in the case of abduction of a ward, the guardian being accountable to the ward for the damages recovered; although the more usual remedy for such a wrong, is by an application to the Court of Chancery, as the supreme guardian of all persons in England who are under age. The abduction of an heiress, or of any woman who has property in possession or expectation, from motives of lucre, with intent to marry her, is declared, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 31, as to England, and by 10 Geo. IV., cap 34, as to Ireland, to be felony, punishable by transportation, penal servitude, or imprisonment. If marriage has followed, though ostensibly voluntary, yet it will be held in law to have been forcible, as having proceeded on a consent fraudulently obtained. Generally, indeed, the abduction in order to marriage of women is a felony; and the woman who has been thus married may bear evidence as to her abduction against her husband, contrary to the ordinary rule of law. Under the same statutes, the abduction of an unmarried girl under sixteen years of age is a felony, punishable by fine and imprisonment. In Scotland, the crime of abduction of women is punishable arbitrarily. In one case, the forcible abduction and marriage of an heiress of fifteen years of age was punished by transportation for fourteen years. Hume on Crimes, i. 310; Tomlins, h. t.; Russell on Crimes.

Abduction of Voters. The abduction of voters at an election is an offence at common law, and punishable with an arbitrary pain; Alison's Princ. p. 642. But, although this was one ingredient in a successful petition against a return, the effect of abduction per se on the election has not yet been decided. It is apprehended, however, that the name of the voter should be added to the roll, there appearing to be no distinction in principle between this case and that of any other wrongfully excluded vote. Warren's Law of Election Committees, 368; Chambers on Elections, h. t.

Abettor; one who incites, instigates, or encourages, or who commands, or counsels, another to commit felony. In most cases an abettor is considered as much a principal as the actual felon. Tomlins, h. t.

Abeyance; an English law term, importing that a freehold or inheritance is not vested in any one, but is in expectation, and ready to descend upon him who shall first fill the character required by the particular quality of the estate. This abeyance or suspense being repugnant to the general principles of the English law of tenure, is never allowed except when it is unavoidable. It has been compared to the hereditas jacens of the civil law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Abiding by. In an action of reduction-improbation, where the main reason of reduction is forgery or falsehood; or in any other action where either party founds on a deed or writing to which the objection of falsehood or forgery is proponed either by way of action or of exception, the party founding on the deed may be required by his adversary to abide by it,—that is, to declare judicially that he abides by the deed or writing challenged or objected to, as true and genuine. If he refuse, decree of certification will be pronounced against the writing as improbable or false. The party abiding by the deed does so sub periculo falsi; i. e. at the risk of the punishment of forgery, if the forgery be proved; and regularly the abider by the deed ought to appear in court for the purpose; although, in the case of extreme age or of necessary absence from Scotland, a commission to take his declaration will be granted. It was formerly the practice to admit parties to abide by deeds qualificate, as it was expressed,—that is, with explanations tending to show that the deed came fairly into the party's possession. This practice, however, has gone into desuetude; but it is still competent and usual for the abider to protest that he shall be at liberty to prove facts and circumstances as to the manner in which the deed came into his hands, and as to his belief of its being genuine, which, even if it turn out to be a forgery, may free him of accession to the crime. After a party has thus abidden by a deed, he cannot be asked how the deed came into his hands; and the form of process is to make up the record in the cause, by ordering a condescendence of articles improbatory, and answers containing articles approbatory. The writ in question is also identified by the signatures of the party abiding by it, and of the judge or commissioner. Stair, B. iv. tit. 20, § 19; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 69; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 224; Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, § 53; Shand's Prac. ii. 642, et seq. and cases there cited, and notes; Hume, i. 157. See Articles improbatory.

Abjuration, Oath of; an oath asserting the title of the present Royal Family to the Crown of England. The statutes enjoining it are 13 Will. III., c. 6, 1 Geo. I., c. 13, and 6 Geo. III., c. 53. By this oath the swearer recognises the right of the Sovereign under the Act of Settlement; engages to support him or her to the utmost of his power; promises to disclose all traitorous conspiracies; and expressly disclaims any right to the Crown of England by the descendants of the Pretender. This oath is ordered to be taken by all persons holding offices in Scotland, civil or military,—by Peers before voting in the election of Scotch Peers, or taking their seats in the House of Lords,—by judges, advocates, and practitioners,—by the heads and other members of colleges,—by the clergy of the Church of Scotland, and by schoolmasters. Quakers and Moravians are allowed to make an affirmation to the same effect, in lieu of the oath. 8 Geo. I., c. 6; 6 Geo. III., c. 53; 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 49, § 2. The oaths of abjuration and allegiance are repealed in every case as to Roman Catholics; and by 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 36, no elector in England is to be required, at any election, to take them, or any oath required by any act to be taken in lieu of them. Members of Parliament (except Roman Catholics) must take them before they sit or vote, after the Speaker is chosen, otherwise the election is void; 13 Will. III., c. 6; and Roman Catholics elected members must take an oath in lieu of the oaths of abjuration, allegiance, and supremacy, according to a formula prescribed by 10 Geo. IV., c. 7, § 2. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 33; Swinton's Abridgment, voce Oaths; Blair's Justice Manual, h. t.; Chambers' Election Law, h. t.; Hutch. Justice of Peace. See also Oaths Affirmation.

Abortion; the offence of administering medicine or applying force to a pregnant woman, in order to procure abortion, is not murder of the child in utero, whether quick or not. But where the mother dies from the effect of the potion or operation used to destroy or expel the fœtus, there seems to be room for a charge of murder against the perpetrator. An attempt to procure abortion is a relevant charge. Hume, i. 186, 263; Alison, Princ. 72.

Abroad; persons resident abroad, that is, out of Scotland, are not, generally speaking, subject to the jurisdiction of any Scotch court. But to this rule there are several exceptions. A native Scotchman, who goes abroad animo remanendi, leaving no property, either heritable or moveable, behind him, does not remain subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch courts ratione originis. If a party resident abroad have heritable property in Scotland, or, whether he be a native or not, if a jurisdiction has been created by arresting his moveables in Scotland jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, he may be cited (except in questions of status) in the Scotch courts. In the case of a landed estate, the lex rei sitæ is the rule; and the law presumes that the owner of such an estate, whether native or foreigner, if resident abroad, has employed some one resident in this country to look after his interests in his absence. Hence, not only in the case where there is an arrestment to found a jurisdiction, but also where there is jurisdiction ratione rei sitæ, edictal citation, on induciæ of twenty-one days, is competent against the party, to the effect of making him amenable to the Court of Session in Scotland. Parties resident abroad, and charged with the commission of crimes in Scotland, may also be cited as furth of the kingdom. The effect of absconding, or going abroad for the purpose of evading payment of debt, or of escaping punishment for a crime, will be considered under other heads.

In the case of Grant v. Pedie, 5th July 1825, 1 W. & S. 716, which, overruling the judgment of the Court below, found that a native of Scotland domiciled abroad was not amenable to the jurisdiction of the Courts in Scotland ratione originis, there was no personal citation. Where, however, a native of Scotland domiciled abroad is cited personally in Scotland, he is amenable, although he may be in Scotland only on a visit, and may not have resided there for forty days continuously. Ritchie v. Fraser, 9th Dec. 1852, 15 D. 205. It would rather seem, therefore, that the moment that a Scotsman returns home, the jurisdiction of his native courts revives, although he be at home transiently only, provided he be cited personally. On this ground the judgment in the case of Calderv. Wood, 19th Jan. 1798, M. 2250, may be doubted. There the defender was a native of Scotland domiciled abroad, and had been at home on a visit for more than forty days, but the citation was left at his lodging-house after he had quitted it, and when he was on his road to England two or three days before the citation was given. The older case of Wiltie v. Muirhead, M. 4814, appears to have been correctly decided, for there the defender, although domiciled in England, was a Scotsman by birth, and was personally cited in Scotland. So soon as a party leaves his residence in Scotland, with the intention of establishing himself elsewhere, he may be cited edictally as being furth of Scotland, although he may not have acquired another domicile elsewhere; Brown v. Blaikie, 1st Feb. 1849, 11 D. 474. In that case Lord Jeffrey observed: "It is a great mistake to suppose that the domicile for citation is the same as that which regulates succession, and that no domicile for citation can be lost until a new one is acquired. This is an error, for such domicile may be lost in the course of twenty-four hours by going forth from the realm, and by intimating to all the lieges that the party does not mean to come back. The only proper form of citation from that time forth is edictal citation."

Abrogate. To abrogate a law is to repeal or recall it.

Absconding. The act of absconding or fleeing, in order to evade payment of debt, is one of the equivalents of legal bankruptcy, under the act 1696, c. 5, and under the bankrupt statutes. Burton on Bankruptcy, p. 203.

Absconding is also one of the indications of guilt usually libelled on in indictments and criminal letters. If a witness mean to abscond, in order to avoid giving evidence at a trial, he may be apprehended and imprisoned, till he find caution for his appearance. Hume on Crimes, ii. 375. The prosecutor (or panel, as the case may be) must give in a regular application, and support it by oath, that he has good cause for believing that the witness means to abscond in order to disappoint the course of justice. Alison's Prac., 398. Dickson on Evidence, 951. See Bankrupt. Meditatio Fugæ.

Absence. Where a defender, although duly cited, has failed to appear, the Court, on the ground that by means of the citation he has had lawful notice of the demand, accompanied by certification of what will ensue if he fail to make appearance, is in use, on the pursuer's motion, to pronounce a decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons or libel, which is called a decree in absence. In order to warrant such a decree, the Court must have jurisdiction over the defender, and the decree must be in terms of the libel; or, at least, the only admissible variation must be of the nature of a restriction on the demand in the summons, not of an amendment of the libel. The principle on which this rests is, that the absent defender is presumed to have laid his account with a decree in the terms concluded for; while, if he had been made aware of the variation, he might have appeared and opposed it. Where a libel contains alternative conclusions, the decree must be made to bear reference to one or other of them. In consistorial actions, generally, the pursuer must prove his case before getting decree, though the defender has failed to appear. In criminal process no procedure of the nature of trial, conviction, or sentence, can take place in absence of the accused; although, if he fail to appear on the day to which he is cited, sentence of fugitation or outlawry may be pronounced against him in his absence, whereby his person is forfeited in law, and his moveables escheated. The effect of absence where the party has no domicile or forum in Scotland, or where he has lost his original forum and domicile by leaving the country animo remanendi, is, that he is not amenable to the Scotch courts in any process, civil or criminal, except under the circumstances explained in the article Abroad. A decree in absence not being held as res judicata, the party may be reponed against its effects, in the manner pointed out under the article Decree. As to the mode of providing for the management of the estate or affairs of an absent party, see Judicial Factor; and as to the manner in which he must sue an action, see Mandatory. For the mode of citing him when he has a Scotch forum, see Edictal Citation. As to decrees in absence in Sheriff Courts, see 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 2.

Where a decree in absence is sought to be reduced, the pursuer, as a condition of his being allowed to insist in the action, must first pay the expenses decreed for in the previous decree. If he is successful in the reduction, he is not entitled to claim repayment of these previous expenses, as forming part of the expenses of the action of reduction. A different judgment appears to have been pronounced in one case, but it does not appear to be supported by the opinion of the majority of the judges who, as reported, were against the claim. The judgment bears that the pursuer of the reduction was entitled to repayment of the expenses of the principal action under the deduction of the expenses of enrolling and obtaining decree, the taxation, and extract; and this appears to have proceeded on the ground that these were the only expenses caused by the pursuer of the reduction not appearing in the previous action. By his not appearing, however, the summons itself was rendered useless, and having been unsuccessful in the reduction, he had to pay the expense of the summons of reduction—the expense of which was caused by the non-appearance of the pursuer in the previous action. It would appear, therefore, that his claim for the previous expenses ought to have been disallowed in toto; Scales v. Wigton, 22d May 1852, 14 D. 780.

Absolute Disposition is a conveyance unqualified by any reservation in favour of the disposer or of any other party; in contradistinction to a conveyance containing in græmio a power of reversion, or any other limitation or qualification of the right. In Scotch law language, however, the term absolute disposition is generally used in relation to heritable property, and in connection with what is called a back-bond; that is, a right ex facie absolute is qualified by a separate deed declaring a trust, or importing a security, by taking the disponee bound to redispone to the disposer, or his representatives, on repayment of a particular loan or advance of money, or on being relieved of certain obligations contracted on the disposer's account. This is a form of security sometimes given for future advances, or for securing obligations of relief.

When the relative back-bond is published by registration in the record of sasines and reversions, it becomes, from the date of registration, a real qualification on the disponee's right, which will be effectual against the disponee's creditors and against third parties. And after such registration, or after judicial production of the back-bond, the parties cannot disburden the disponee's right merely by cancelling or restricting the back-bond. The registration of the back-bond in the record of sasines and reversions is held to be a feudal limitation of the disponee's right; and in order effectually to discharge it, the discharge, like the burden, must appear on the record. While the back-bond remains unrecorded, the disposer is exposed to the risk of the disponee's bankruptcy; and if it should never be recorded, then on the face of the records, and feudally speaking, the disponee will be the absolute proprietor, subject only to a personal obligation to denude or account, in terms of the back-bond. Although the holder of a disposition qualified by a recorded back-bond is virtually no more than an heritable creditor to the disposer entitled to redeem, yet it seems to be doubtful whether the disponee can state himself as in right of a debitum fundi, to the effect of entitling him to poind the ground of the lands comprehended in the absolute disposition in his favour. Poinding of the ground is a remedy competent to the holder of a debitum fundi, but not competent, it would seem, to a party holding a title, in virtue of which he can enter into the natural possession of the lands. Ross's Lectures, vol. ii. p. 430, and authorities there cited; Bell's Com. i. 672; Princ. § 913, and authorities there cited. See Burdens. Bankrupt. Wadset. Poinding of the Ground.

An absolute disposition qualified by a back-bond acknowledging the disposition to be in security merely, covers all advances made by the disponee, either before or after the date of the disposition. If, however, the disposition be recorded, or produced judicially, it will then operate as a security merely for the sums advanced at the date of the recording, or of the judicial production. Riddell v. Nibbie's Creditors. 16th Feb. 1782, M. 1154; Keith v. Maxwell, 8th July 1795, M. 1163.

There exists an important distinction between a disposition which in græmio contains a trust and sets forth certain specific trust-purposes, and a disposition which is ex facie absolute, but is qualified by a separate back-bond by the disponee, containing a general declaration of trust. The first does not divest the granter, but merely burdens his right until the back-bond has been recorded; the latter does divest him, leaving him merely the creditor on the disponee's obligation to re-

convey. The donee who possesses under a title ex facie absolute, when required to denude in favour of the trust, is entitled to retain the subject until the obligations incumbent on the trust towards him shall be fulfilled. Where the back-bond is perfectly general in its tenor, the security created by the trust not being limited either expressly or by implication, the donee is entitled to refuse to denude until he is relieved of all advances made or obligations incurred for the trust, prior, as well as posterior, to the date of the disposition. Where, too, the back-bond is not perfectly general, but specifies particular obligations, still in so far as regards subsequent advances by the donee to or for the trust, he is entitled to retain the subjects for his relief of these. The presumption of law in such a case is, that the trust in obtaining these subsequent advances contemplated the extension of the trust, and that the donee holding the subjects under an ex facie absolute title, made these subsequent advances for the trust in reliance on the security actually held by him. Where, however, it appears from the back-bond that the absolute disposition has been granted in security of a particular debt specially named, and the donee is taken bound to reconvey on the particular debt being repaid, in security of which the disposition was specially granted, the disposition will not be held to cover debts previously due. In such a case the trust created will be held to be a new transaction, and its nature and terms will fall to be determined by the intention of the parties as ascertained by competent evidence; for an absolute conveyance with a back-bond, though a trust or security most favourable for the trustee, is still but a trust or security, and its terms, like those of any other transaction, are a fit subject of judicial inquiry. In so far, however, as regards subsequent advances in such a case as that now supposed, these will be held to be covered by the security, on the principle that there was an implied extension of the trust-purposes, to the effect of securing such subsequent advances. Robertson v. Duff, 14th Jan. 1840, 2 D. 279.

An ex facie absolute disposition, qualified by a back-bond, does not exclude the widow of the donor from claiming her third out of the lands conveyed, on the ground that the transaction, as declared by the back-bond, was nothing more than an heritable security over the lands, and that beyond the extent of the sum secured the infestment of the donee was truly the infestment of the donor. Bartlett v. Buchanan, 21st Feb. 1811, F. C. In the case of Gardyne v. Bank of Scotland, 8th March 1851, 13 D. 912, the Court, by a majority of three, held that an ex facie absolute donee of a subject held burgage, was liable to the creditor of a ground-annual secured over the subjects, although he had put upon record a back-bond, granted by him at the same time that he received the disposition, which set forth that the conveyance was to him in security merely of a debt, and although he afterwards executed and put on record a discharge and renunciation of the security. This judgment was clearly erroneous, on the ground that the creditor in the ground-annual had no claim against any donee to whom the lands out of which the ground-annual was payable were or might have been conveyed; and, accordingly, on this ground, the judgment was reversed in the House of Lords. See Ground-Annual. But independently of this ground, on which alone the reversal proceeded, the soundness of the judgment may be doubted, on the additional ground that so soon as a back-bond qualifying an ex facie absolute disposition is put on record, the donee ceases to be proprietor, even nominally, and becomes an heritable creditor merely.

Lord MONCREIFF dissented strongly from the judgment, and observed, "If the transaction had been completed by an ordinary disposition in security and infestment by resignation, bearing the quality of the right in the body of it, there could not, I presume, have been any doubt that it would have been nothing but a title in security, which never could have given the pursuer any right to the ground-annual as against the creditor so infest, or deprived him of the benefits of his author's personal obligation for payment of it. But I have long believed it to be a settled principle in the law, that a security constituted in the form of an absolute disposition, but qualified by a back-bond, declaring this title to be limited to a definite security, forms neither more nor less than an heritable security for debt. It clearly is so in any question with the grantor, and it is clearly so with any other party as soon as the back-bond has been recorded in the register of sasines and reversions. The title of the grantor of the disposition remains entire, subject only to the burden so constituted. Nothing hinders him to sell the property to another, subject to the security; nothing hinders him to create other postponed securities, either in the same form or in any other. And his title remains entire for other purposes, in regard to the rights of other parties. This point was surely determined in the most deliberate manner in the case of Bartlett v. Buchanan, 21st Feb. 1811, in which it was held that a widow's right of third remained untouched by such an absolute disposition with infestment, qualified by back-bond recorded. The Court unanimously found that the husband's infest-ment remained entire, subject to the heritable debt, without which there could have been no terce, the husband's seisin being the measure of the wife's terce. And it is accordingly universally so laid down, that a title constituted in this form creates nothing but an heritable debt." The joint opinion of some of the majority of the Court contains the following observation: "The fallacy on the other side lies in dealing with the right of the back-bond, as if in legal construction it were one of security only, and not a proprietary right. That, in one sense, though not in the ordinary sense, it may operate to the effect of a security, is true enough. But in its conception and legal constitution, it is not a security, which is a mere burden in favour of one party on the radical jus domini, continuing separately to exist in the person of another. It is, on the contrary, the proper jus domini itself, transferred by divestiture of the former into the person of the new proprietor, who in this way comes by independent investiture into his author's place quoad the entire substance and universitas of the real right." In reference to these remarks, Lord MONCREIFF observes, "I see it is said in the opposite opinion, 'The fallacy on the other side lies in dealing with the right of the bank, as if in legal construction it were one of security only, and not of proprietary right.' With all deference it appears to me that the whole fallacy in the argument lies in assuming that it is anything else but a right in security. In its original constitution, if the disposition and the back-bond be read together, beyond all question the only right constituted is nothing else but a right in security. No doubt, as the disposition is absolute in its terms, the qualification effected by the back-bond, though referred to in the disposition, could have no effect against third parties until it was registered in the register of sasines; but as soon as it was so registered, the disposition and the registered back-bond constituted but one title, and that a title in security merely. I shall only farther remark that I can conceive no greater fallacy in reasoning upon a feudal title, than to mistake the mere form in which a security for debt is created for the substance of the right; and that is what I think the Court are now in great danger of doing."

Abstracted Multures. This term is applied to that evasion of the servitude of thirlage which consists in fraudulently or illegally carrying the grain of the servient lands to be ground elsewhere, or otherwise disappointing the right of the dominant mill. The remedy competent to the proprietor or tenant of the mill, against the proprietor or tenant of the astricted lands, is an action for abstracted multures, which may be raised either before the Judge Ordinary or in the Court of Session; and the conclusion of which is alternative, either for delivery of the multure of the abstracted grain, or for a sum of money in lieu thereof. Multures prescribe in five years from the time they become due; 1669, c. 9. Where the right of thirlage is disputed this action is combined with a declarator of thirlage, which can be competently brought only in the Court of Session. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 32; Bell's Princ. § 1030; Jurid. Styles, iii. 83; Boyd's Jud. Proceedings, p. 216; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 561, et seq.

Acceptance; in its general acceptation, is the act whereby a party agrees to any terms, offer, or proposal made to him, or undertakes a trust, office, or duty. Acceptance in this sense may be either express or tacit, verbal or written; or provable by facts and circumstances inferring acceptance, and not reconcilable with rejection. The evidence, however, whatever it may be, must amount to a clear indication of an intention to accept. Thus, the mere possession of a deed containing a condition will not be held as acceptance. But, on the other hand, the proposal or offer may be so made that, if not rejected, acceptance is implied. An order in trade does not require acceptance to bind the party giving the order; and it will also bind the party to whom it is addressed, if not rejected in course of post, if in the line of his particular trade; e.g., an order for goods to a dealer, or for insurance to an insurance-broker, or the delivery of goods to a common carrier for transport to the place of its destination. *Bell's Princ. § 74, et seq.; Ersk. iii. t. 2, § 45; Stair, B. i. tit. iii. § 9, and tit. 10, § 5; Mr More's Notes, p. lxii.; Bank. vol. i. p. 288, § 9, and 342, § 6; Bell's Com. 5th edit., vol. i. p. 326, et seq.; Bell's Illustrations, §§ 73, 76, 80; Tait on Evidence, p. 172, 3d edit.; Jurid. Styles, vol. i. p. 368, 2d edit.; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), p. 127. See *Delivery. Offer. Carrier.

A retraction of an offer posted of the same date with the acceptance of the offer, though before the acceptance has been delivered to the offerer, will not prevent the completion of the contract. If at the date of the acceptance the offer is a subsisting offer, the concursum which then takes place completes the contract. Thomson v. James, 12th July 1855; 18 D. 1.

Acceptance of a Bill of Exchange; is the act whereby the drawee contracts the obligation to pay the bill. It is usually done by signing his name either opposite to the address, or across the face of the bill. The word "accepts" is also sometimes prefixed to the signature of the acceptor; but this is unnecessary. In common parlance the accepted bill is called "an acceptance."

The theory of a bill of exchange is that the bill is an assignment to the payee of a debt due by the drawee to the drawer, and acceptance by the drawee imports that the acceptor is a debtor to the drawer, or at least that he has effects of the drawer in his hands. Where the drawee has accepted he is the original debtor in the bill, and the drawer is only liable in default of payment by the acceptor. A bill must be drawn absolutely, but it may be accepted conditionally; but the payee is not bound to receive a conditional or qualified acceptance. If, however, he does receive a conditional acceptance, he must conform to the terms of it; and if he does not receive it, but protests for non-acceptance, he cannot afterwards recover from the party who accepted conditionally. Sproat v. Matthews, 10th May 1786; 1 T. R., 132. When a bill is once accepted, and the acceptance has been communicated to the holder, the acceptance cannot be recalled, even with the consent of the holder; but an acceptance may be cancelled by the drawee before it has been communicated to the holder. Cox v. Troy, 29th Jan. 1822; 5 B. & Al. 474. The acceptor of a bill, whether for accommodation or for value, can only be discharged with consent of the holder of the bill. Pentum v. Pocock, 16th Nov. 1813; 5 Tass. R. 190. The holder of a bill may discharge any of the parties to it; but there is this difference between the acceptor and the other parties, that the acceptor is first liable; and in order to be entitled to have recourse against him, it is not necessary to show notice given to him of non-payment by any other party to the bill. Dingwall v. Dunster, 15th Nov. 1779, 1 Doug. R. 247. When a bill is accepted payable at a particular place, and at that place only, a delay in presenting there the bill for payment will not discharge the acceptor, unless he prove that he has sustained damage by the delay. Where a party accepts a blank bill, he is held to be the acceptor for the full amount which the stamp will cover, and is subject to all the liabilities attaching to the character of an acceptor. Such an acceptance is held to confer a power or mandate upon the party receiving the stamp so signed to pledge the security of the subscriber in any form of bill or note he chooses, and to the full amount of the sum which the stamp will cover. Neither is such an acceptor entitled to any notice of the bill being filled up. Russel v. Langstaffe, 22d Nov. 1780, 2 Douglas 514; Smith v. Minjoy, 29th Jan. 1813, 1 M. & S. 87; Fair v. Cran- ston, 11th July 1801, M. 1677; Ogilvie v. Moss, 28th June 1804, M. App., Bill, No. 17; Smith v. Taylor, 27th Feb. 1824, 2 S. 627; Lyon v. Butler, 7th Dec. 1841, 4 D. 178. An acceptance by a factor "for behoof of" his constituent imports a personal liability on the part of the factor so accepting. Webster v. McCalman, 3d June 1848, 10 D. 1133. Such an acceptance concerns only the acceptor and the person for whom he acts in the transaction, and to make his relief more easy after he has fulfilled his obligation to the party to whom he grants the acceptance. So far, however, as relates to the bill, the drawer is entitled to proceed against the party so accepting.

See also Bill of Exchange.

Acceptance for Honour; is acceptance of a bill after it has been protested against the drawee for non-acceptance. Such an acceptance is said to be for the honour of the drawer or indorser, i.e., to save his credit, and may be made either by the drawee himself, or by a third party. The acceptance for honour is to a certain extent conditional, as the acceptor is not bound to pay the bill, unless the holder retain it until maturity, without returning it to the drawer protested for non-acceptance. And as such an acceptor is entitled to have evidence of his interposition, which may entitle him to recover against the party for whose honour he has interposed, a formal protest may be required before the bill is paid by the acceptor for honour. He has likewise a claim not only against him for whose honour he interfered, but also against all the parties on the bill liable to him. Bell's Princ. § 322; Bank. vol. i. p. 361, § 11; Bell's Com. i. p. 401, 5th edit.; Thomson on Bills, p. 491, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, iii. pp. 589, 595, 2d edit. See Bill of Exchange.

An acceptance for honour is equivalent to saying to the holder of the bill, "Keep this bill, don't return it, and when the time arrives at which it ought to be paid, if it be not paid by the party on whom it was originally drawn, come to me and you shall have the money." It is in the nature of a conditional acceptance, and implies that the bill will be paid by the acceptor for honour, if, on its arriving at maturity, it is not paid by the drawer. An acceptor for honour, however, will not be liable, unless the bill, when it becomes due, is duly presented for payment to the drawer. When a bill accepted for honour still remains with the holder, a second resort to the drawee is proper, for effects often reach the drawer who has refused acceptance in the first instance, out of which the bill might be satisfied if presented to him again when the period of payment arrives. Whatever is requisite to enable a person, who accepts for the honour of another, to call upon that person to repay him, and to enable him to recover over against such person, is also necessary to enable another party to recover from such an acceptor for honour. Hoare v. Cazenove, 27th Nov. 1812, 16 East 391; Williams v. Germaine, 21st Nov. 1827, 7 B. & C. 468.

Acceptilation; is the extinction of a debt, by a declaration that the debt has been paid when it has not; or the acceptance of something merely imaginary in satisfaction of the debt. Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 5; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 8; Bank. i. p. 490, § 20, et seq.

Accessory or Accessory. A person is said to be accessory to a crime, who aids the perpetrator with advice in the commission of it, or who assists in its execution. One who abets by previously promising protection to the criminal will be considered in law as an accessory. Our law does not, like that of England, recognize accession after the fact, where unconnected with any earlier knowledge of, or concern in, the deed. Hume, i. 282; Alison's Princ. 57-70. Both principal and accessory may be tried in one indictment, and the latter, though the principal has not been brought to trial. See Accomplice; Art and Part.

Accession; is a term used to signify the commencement of the King's reign.

Accession, Deed of; is a deed by the creditors of a bankrupt or insolvent debtor, by which they approve of a trust executed by their debtor for the general behoof, and bind themselves to concur in the fiduciary arrangements proposed for extricating his affairs. It is analogous to the English deed of covenants. Accession to a trust for behoof of creditors may be instructed without a formal deed, by facts and circumstances inferring accession, or not otherwise explainable. Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 501, 5th edit.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit., i. p. 123, ii. pp. 190, 254. See Trust.

A deed of accession is a mutual contract, by which no creditor who signs it is bound by it until all the other creditors have assented. This is commonly expressed as a special condition to the deed, but whether expressed or not, it is an implied and essential condition of the contract that all shall be bound or none. It has been held, however, that although the whole creditors have not concurred, it is not competent for one who has acceded to begin diligence in order to acquire a preference directly or indirectly, while the non-concurring creditors are standing neutral. In Watson v. Fede, 5th Feb. 1724, M. 6397, the Court found that a supersedere of diligence had been signed by some of the creditors on the faith that all the creditors were to do the same, and that it was not binding on those who had signed, in respect a small number only, and not the whole, had signed it. They found also, however, that a creditor who had signed it could not be the first user of personal diligence against the debtor. Accession by a creditor binds his assignee to the debt. It will also bind himself in respect of a debt which he has purchased, although the cedent of the debt had not acceded. But where a creditor who has acceded acquires a debt fortuitously by succession on other unforeseen means, in relation to which there has been no accession, it is doubtful whether, in respect of such debt, the creditor so succeeding is bound by his former accession.

Accession—Accessories. Accession, as a mode of acquiring property, is either natural or artificial. By natural accession, the young of cattle belong to the owner of the mother, and the fruits and produce of the earth to the proprietor of the soil. On the same principle, the gradual addition acquired by grounds lying on the bank of a river (called alluvio) belongs to the proprietor of the land receiving this addition. Artificial accession, again, is that addition which is the result of human industry, otherwise called industrial accession; e.g., trees planted, or a house built on the property of another, which belong to the proprietor of the ground, and not to the planter or builder. The party who has thus built by mistake may have a claim against the owner of the ground for the value of the house, in so far as it is a melioration; but the builder is not entitled to retain possession until repaid the expense of building, and may be summarily removed. Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 34; Bank. vol. i. p. 506, § 10, et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 752, et seq., 5th edit.; Ersk. ii. t. 1, §§ 14, 15; Beattie, 27th May 1831, 9 S. and D. 639; Bell's Princ. § 1473. See Heritable and Moveable. Industrial Accession. Contexture. Adjunction. Specification. Commission. Fictures.

Accessorium sequitur principale; a Roman law maxim, signifying that the accessory right follows the principal. In the law of Scotland, the principle of this maxim has been fully adopted; in so much that the maxim itself forms one of the titles in Lord Kames' Dictionary of Decisions, and (following him) in Morison's Dictionary and Brown's Synopsis. Stair, B. iii. tit. 1, § 17; Mr More's Notes, p. 103; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 30; Bank. i. p. 506, § 10; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), p. 156-7.

Accessory Actions; are those actions which are in some degree subservient to others, as those of wakening or of transference; by the former of which, a cause, after it had lain over without any interlocutor having been pronounced in it for the period of a year (by which, technically speaking, it is said to have fallen asleep), might have been revived, and proceeded in to a conclusion. By the latter, an action may, on the death of the defender, be transferred in statu quo against his heir. Under this class of actions are ranked Proving of the Tenor, by which the tenor of a lost deed is judicially declared, and the loss thereby supplied; and Actions of Transumpt, by which copies of principal deeds are certified. By the recent acts, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, important provisions are made as to the wakening and transference of actions, the effect of which is to render actions of wakening no longer necessary. Stair, B. iv. tit. 31; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, §§ 18 and 52; Bank. ii. p. 622, et seq.; M'Glash. Sher. Court Prac. pp. 54, 316. See Wakening; Transference.

Accessory Obligations; are obligations adjoined to antecedent or primary obligations. Obligations for the regular payment of interest, cautionary obligations, and bonds of corroboration, are examples of accessory obligations, and all necessarily refer to some prior or principal obligation. Stair, B. i. tit. 17; Mr More's Notes, ciii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 60; Bank. iii. p. 105. See Cautionry.

Accommodation Bills; are bills of exchange granted without value having been received by the acceptors, for the purpose of raising money by discount. Such acceptances are denominated wind or accommodation bills; and the party for whose accommodation they are granted, whether drawer, acceptor, or indorser, is, of course, bound to relieve all the other parties whose names are on the bills from the consequences of their obligation. On bankruptcy, various nice and intricate questions arise with regard to the mode of ranking for such debts. The general rules established seem to resolve into these: 1st, That the onerous holder is entitled to rank on the estates of all the parties on the bill to the effect of drawing full payment. 2d, As no double ranking is allowed, the estate of the acceptor, though he receive no value, cannot claim upon the estate of the party for whose accommodation the bill was granted; but a claim for the amount of the dividend paid is competent against the party himself. 3d, In the case of mutual accommodation bills to the same amount, they are held to be good considerations for one another. 4th, The ordinary rules as to due negotiation do not apply to such bills. Hence, the drawer or indorser of an accommodation bill, if he has participated in the accommodation, cannot plead against the holder the want of notice of dishonour. Where, however, the accommodation is not for the drawer's behoof, but for the use of some of the other parties, the drawer has been held entitled to notice. See Bell's Com. i. 426, et seq.; Princ. § 346; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 33, and Note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Illust., § 346.

Where a bill of exchange is given for money really due by the drawee to the drawer, or is drawn in the regular course of business, an indorsee, though he has not given to the indorser the full amount of the bill, may yet recover the whole; but where the bill is an accommodation one, and that known to the indorser, and he pays only part of the amount, he can only recover the amount he has actually paid for the bill. Wiffen v. Roberts, 1 Espinasse, 261.

Accomplice; a socius criminis, or associate with another, or with others, in the commission of a crime. An accomplice is an admissible witness against his associates in the crime, his credibility being a matter for the jury. By the mere act of calling an accomplice as a witness, the public prosecutor discharges all title to molest him for the future concerning the crime in question. In this way the supposed objection to his admissibility on the ground of interest to criminate his associate, is obviated. But a private prosecutor cannot tie up the hands of the public authorities by examining a socius criminis. In order that the pannel may not be deprived of the benefit of exculpatory witnesses by their being included in the same libel with himself, it is in the power of the Court, upon special cause shown, to disjoin the charges in the libel, in order that one of the accused may be adduced as a witness in behalf of the other. Formerly the proposed exculpatory witness was tried first, and was not admissible as evidence if he were convicted. Infamy being now no longer a ground of exclusion (15 Vict., c. 27, § 1), he is equally admissible, whether he be convicted or acquitted. Where, in the police court, several parties had been charged with an offence, and, on a motion made, their trials had been separated, and the party whose trial had been taken first had tendered the others as witnesses in his favour, and the magistrate had refused their evidence, on the ground that they were socii criminis in the offence libelled, convictions obtained against two of these parties were set aside, on the ground that the evidence so refused was admissible, and ought to have been received. The Lord Justice-Clerk observed,—“Is there any authority for saying that, after a separation of the trials of different pannels, those whose trial is postponed cannot be received as witnesses for the other pannel?” Bell v. Shaw, 22d Jan. 1842, 1 Broun, 49. In a charge of assault against two pannels, after evidence for the Crown and for the pannels had been led, the counsel for the pannels proposed to examine one of them as a witness for the other, under § 3 of 16 Vict., c. 20. The Court held this to be incompetent, being of opinion that the proper course was to have moved for a separation of the trials, and that the statute did not make any alteration in this respect. Hogan (Glasgow Circuit), 28th Dec. 1853, 1 Irvine, 343. The testimony of socii criminis must, to a greater or less extent, be corroborated by unsuspected evidence. Campbell or Brown (Perth), 4th Oct. 1855, 2 Irvine, 232. See Hume, ii. 175, 367, 402; Alison's Prac. 241, 452; Bell's Notes to Hume, 182, 261; Dickson's Law of Evidence, 851; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 10, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 243, et seq.; Swint. Abridg. voce Evidence, § 6. See Art and Part; Accessory.

In England, the term accomplice is usually applied, in a limited sense, to the perpetrator of a felony, admitted, for the furtherance of justice, to give evidence against his associates. Tomlins, voce Accessory.

Account, Stated. See Stated Account.

Accounts. Merchants' accounts suffer a triennial prescription by the act 1579, c. 83. This prescription begins to run from the date of the last article. The existence of the debt (including the subsistence as well as the constitution of it) may be proved by the oath of the debtor after the expiration of the three years. The debt may also be proved by a writing signed by the debtor. By the Bankrupt Statute, 54 Geo. III., c. 137, where the debt claimed rests upon an open account, the creditor is required to produce a certified copy of the account, signed by the party to whom it is due, along with an affidavit by the creditor. The provisions of the statute as to this are not very clear; but it seems now to be settled that a correct copy of the whole account on both sides, as it stands in the creditor's books, must be produced, certified as authentic, either by the creditor or his book-keeper. The oath of verity is a certifying of the account. Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 343, 5th edit. The words of the act 2 and 3 Vict., c. 41, § 11, are, “That the creditor shall produce with his said oath such accounts and vouchers as shall be necessary to prove his debt.” *Ersk. Accountant of the Court of Session. By the act “for the better protection of the property of pupils, absent persons, and persons under mental incapacity in Scotland,” (12 and 13 Vict., c. 51), it is made lawful for the Crown to appoint an officer, called the Accountant of the Court of Session, whose duty is to superintend generally the conduct of all judicial factors and tutors and curators coming under the provisions of the act, and to see that they duly observe the rules and regulations laid down therein for their guidance. The accountant audits the factors' accounts, and reports thereon. He must make an annual report to the Court of all judicial factories. He is also the custodian of all deposit-receipts and other vouchers for sums of money placed under the authority of the Court, and of all bonds of caution and judicial bonds granted under the same authority,—a duty which, previously to the act, had been discharged by the senior Principal Clerk of Session. The records in the Accountant's office are open for inspection on payment of the fees fixed by Act of Sederunt 1st Feb. 1850. See also the Act of Sederunt framed in pursuance of the above statute, 11th Dec. 1849.

Accountant-General; an officer in the English Court of Chancery appointed to receive all money lodged in Court, and to deposit it in bank, or draw it out by judicial order. Tomlin's Dict. See Judicial Factor.

Accretion; takes place when a right, originally imperfect or defective, is completed in the person of the holder by some posterior act on the part of him from whom the right is derived. The term is usually applied to the titles of heritable property, and may be best illustrated by an example. Thus, if one having a good personal right to lands, but not infest, sells the lands, and grants the purchaser a precept of sasine on which infestment is taken, such infestment, as flowing a non habente potestatem, will vest the purchaser with no feudal right. But if the seller should afterwards perfect his own feudal right by infestment, his posterior infestment, jure accretionis, will validate the prior precept, and the sasine following thereon, in favour of the purchaser, and thus complete the purchaser's feudal right to the lands. The maxim which applies to such a case is Jus superveniens auctori accrescit successoris; and the principle is said to be the principle of warrandice, express or implied,—the law doing what the granter of the right is otherwise bound to do.

Where a party uninfest grants conveyances to several parties, and he is himself thereafter infest, his infestment accretes to the other parties, in the order of their recorded infestments. Paterson v. Kelly, 10th Dec. 1742, M. 7775. Where a party infest a me unconfirmed grants infestments to two creditors, the posterior of whom obtains his infestment confirmed, and the prior creditor thereafter obtains his author and himself confirmed in the same deed, the posterior creditor will be preferred. Campbell v. Henderson, 5th July 1821, 1 S. 104. The case of Keith v. Grant, 14th Nov. 1792, M. 2933, rules the point that the infestment of an heir does not accrete to a right granted by his ancestor who died uninfest. In that case it was observed on the Bench, "In such a case the jus superveniens cannot accresce. If an author after giving infestment is himself vested in the feudal right, his title becomes complete both in form and substance, and this new acquisition of right is communicated to all his former deeds. But a sasine obtained a non habente is altogether inept, and cannot be cured by any supervening right in his heir. In personal rights the law holds an obligation to convey and a conveyance to be the same, and therefore every person liable in absolute warrandice is bound to grant the conveyance. But in heritage, although an heir whose ancestor conveyed, having only a personal right, is liable in warrandice, and is obliged to give an infestment, still that infestment cannot proceed on the precept granted by the ancestor, who never acquired any right which entitled him to grant that warrant." According to the same principle, the infestment of assumed trustees will not accrete to and validate infestments following upon precepts granted by the trustees who assumed them, but who themselves were never infest. In Martin v. Wright, 3d Feb. 1841, 3 D. 485, Lord FULLERTON observed,—"The question is just whether infestment taken by different persons after the death of all the original trustees can be held, on the principle of accretion, to validate the precept of clare constat granted by the trustees who died uninfest? I do not think it can. There is no identity of persons between those who granted the precept and those who afterwards vested themselves with a title to grant it. The case is different from a corporation, which is held to be one person. There it may be said that the subsequent infestments in favour of the corporation is sufficient to validate the acts of the body done before infestment, and that although the officers of the corporation who take infestment are different from those by whom the act was done. But there is neither principle nor practice for applying it to the case of trustees. A trust for purposes does not create a separate constructive person like a corporation. The title of each trustee stands on the right made up in his own person, so that the infestment of any one trustee, or any number of trustees, is not the infestment of any other trustee afterwards assumed. The persons are essentially different, and I therefore see no room for applying the principles of accretion to the case." A conveyance granted by a party who has no right to the subject conveyed, but with consent of the true owner, is effectual. Buchan v. Cockburn, 14th July 1739, M. 6528. In that case Lord KILKERRAN observed,—"All agreed that a proprietor of land consenting to a disposition granted a non domino, implies a conveyance by the dominus." Where, however, the party consenting is not the dominus, but a creditor merely, his consent is held to import no more than a non repugnantia. This was decided in the same case of Buchan v. Cockburn, in which Lord ARNISTON observed,—"In the case of a verus dominus, or a party having or claiming the property of the subject, such a party consenting can intend nothing less than to convey that right; but a creditor hypothecarius, his meaning can be understood no more than a non repugnantia, for he cannot be thought to convey his debt without payment, and without conveying the debt he cannot convey the security he has on the lands." The position of a party consenter differs from that of a party disposer in this, that the consent of the former has reference only to the rights vested in him at the time of consenting, but does not extend to other rights which he may subsequently acquire. These subsequent rights he is entitled to avail himself of, notwithstanding his former consent. The rule of law, Jus superveniens auctori accrescit successori does not therefore apply to a consenter unless he has expressly bound himself in warrandice. Erskine observes,—"No warrandice can be fixed by implication against a consenter whose implied obligation can only be understood to bar him from objecting to the disposition upon any right then in his person. Ersk. B. ii. t. 7, § 4. In the case of Forbes v. Innes, 8th January 1668, reported by Lord Stair, the plea was sustained that a consenter cannot exclude any supervenient right of the consenter, but only such rights as the consenter had at the time of the consent; and that although a right acquired by a party who disposes with absolute warrandice accretes to his successor, it is not so in the case of a consenter whose warrandice is not found to be obligatory farther than as to the rights in the consenter's person at the time of his consent." Were it not for the weight of authority the other way, it might be doubted whether the consent of the verus dominus to a conveyance by a party having no right to the subject conveyed should make the conveyance effectual. It would seem to be more in accordance with feudal principle that the feu should be held ineffectual as a conveyance, but effectual as importing an obligation to convey against the party consenting. The point was again raised in the case of Mounsey v. Maxwell, 29th Nov. 1808 (Hume's Decisions, p. 237), when Lord President BLAIR observed,—"As to the point raised, the authority of Lord Stair must rule. Two things are requisite, the disposition act and the form. The two must concur; but where both exist it is not material in which of the parties the right truly is. He who has not the right, disposing with consent of the other who has the right, disposes effectually. So Stair says, and such is the law of Scotland." In the case of a party who had no right conveying, and afterwards acquiring a right, it has been doubted whether the maxim jus superveniens would apply, and yet it may be deemed to be no greater stretch of strict feudal principle than the one just adverted to. It is not doubted that the granter of the conveyance would be under an obligation to grant a new conveyance of the subject; but would the acquired right of the granter accresce to the original granter ipso jure? Professor Bell, in his Principles, observes,—"If the granter of the precept have at the time no right to the subject, but acquire a right by a subsequent title, it may be doubted whether accretion will take place. The ground of this doubt is that there can be no proper conveyance where there is no right existing; that law may, fictione, supply solemnities, but not substantial right; and that in such cases there is nothing but an implied obligation to convey, which requires a different mode of completion." Mr Bell adds in a note,—"In consultation with the late Mr Jamieson, we differed in opinion, that sound lawyer inclining to hold the maxim applicable." Bell's Principles, § 882. In the case of Glassford's Executors v. Scott, 9th March 1850, D. 12, p. 893, a bond of annualrent was granted by an heir of entail next entitled to succeed to the estate, and infestment followed on the bond. The heir in possession thereafter conveyed his right to the estate to the granter of the bond, and the Court held that the bond was validated by accretion. Lord FULLERTON observed,—"The question is, whether this is a proper case to which the doctrine of accretion can apply? I confess I have some difficulty. This is a bond granted with absolute warrandice, and there is no doubt this was done before the granter succeeded to the estate. But then the estate was afterwards conveyed to him, and he was duly infest in it. My impression is that his infestment accresced to the security, and that the bond must be sustained." There is no authority for holding that the doctrine of accretion is applicable to onerous deeds only. It appears to be equally applicable to gratuitous deeds, for in such deeds there is an implied warrandice that the conveyance made shall not be prejudiced by any future act of the granter. The completion of the granter's title must therefore be held to accresce to the gratuitous conveyance of the title so completed, and cannot be used to the prejudice of that conveyance. This point was raised in the case of M'Gibbon v. M'Gibbon, 5th March 1802, D. 14, p. 605, where a mother, while possessing on apparency, conveyed lands to her sons in fee, on which infestment was taken. The deed contained no power of revocation; but thereafter the granter, having completed her title, executed another deed, in which she gave her husband the power of dividing the lands among the sons. A grandson brought a reduction of this deed and a subsequent deed, by which the husband had exercised the power conferred upon him by that deed. One of the pleas in defence was that the doctrine of accretion was founded on warrandice express or implied, and did not apply to the case of a gratuitous deed containing no obligation of warrandice. The pursuer contended that it made no difference to the operation of accretion whether the deed was gratuitous or not. Lord COWAN, Ordinary, considered the argument "untenable," and the Court "adhered." Lord Justice-Clerk HORN observed,—"At the date of the deed the granter had a right of succession as heir-apparent of investiture. After its date her title was completed, and she became completely invested. I cannot understand on what principle it can be said that accretion does not apply." Where a trustee on a bankrupt estate completes his title through the bankrupt by completing the bankrupt's own title, the securities previously granted by the bankrupt will thereby be validated by accretion. It is therefore an important matter for the trustee so to complete his title as to leave the bankrupt out of the progress.

Accumulation of Interest. See Interest.

Accumulate Sum; is the sum for which decree of adjudication is pronounced, composed, in the general adjudication, of the principal sum of the debt, interest, and penalty; and, in the special adjudication, a fifth part more of the principal sum is added, as a compensation to the creditor on account of his receiving land for his debt. There is no instance, however, of a special adjudication being carried into effect. *Ersk. Acknowledgment. This term is frequently applied to a written admission or acknowledgment that a certain sum of money has been paid to the party granting the acknowledgment. Where the acknowledgment is meant as a mere voucher of payment, equivalent to a receipt, it will be effectual, subject only to a penalty under the Stamp Laws if it has not been written on a proper receipt-stamp. But where the acknowledgment is given as the voucher of a loan, care must be taken not to include in the acknowledgment a promise to pay, or to repay the money when required, or against any specified future time, as such an engagement converts the acknowledgment into what law holds equivalent to a promissory-note, which is not actionable unless written on a proper bill-stamp, the want of which cannot be supplied by getting the writing afterwards stamped. Bell's Princ. § 307. See Bill of Exchange. Promissory-Note.

In the case of Allan v. Murray, 13th June 1837, S. 15, 1130, a holograph acknowledgment in these terms—"Received from A. B. £186. (Signed) C. D."—was held to import the constitution of a debt, and an obligation to repay. Ogilvie, M. 11,510; Davidson, M. 1511; Ross v. Fiddler, 24th Nov. 1809, F. C.

A mere acknowledgment of debt does not constitute a promissory-note, and does not require any stamp; and unless the instrument contains an order or promise to pay a sum of money, it does not require a bill-stamp. 1 Ross' L. C. C. 52. Jones v. Simpson, 2 B. & C. 318; Tomkins v. Ashley, 6 B. & C. 541; Pirie v. Smith, 11 S. 473.

Acquittal; signifies a deliverance from a charge of guilt. Acquittal by the jury has no force until the Court has given judgment upon the verdict; but after such judgment the person acquitted cannot be again tried for the same offence. Tomlins' Dict.

Acquittance; a release or discharge in writing of a sum of money or debt. The word is rather an English than a Scotch law term. Tomlins. See Discharge.

Acre; the principal denomination of land-measure in Great Britain. The English standard acre, now the imperial acre of Britain, is a square raised from the basis of the chain of 66 feet, or 22 yards, or 1-80th of a mile. Ten of these squares form the acre, which thus contains 4840 square yards. This is divided into roods, of which there are four in the acre, and into poles or perches, of which there are 40 in each rood. The Scotch acre is considerably larger than the imperial. It is raised from the chain of 24 ells, and until of late years it was the practice of land-surveyors to measure with a chain of 74 feet and 4-10ths of a foot in length, the ell having been erroneously estimated at 37 inches and 2-10ths of an inch, whereby the Scotch acre came to be about 6150 square yards,—i. e., a Scotch acre was equal to 5 quarters and a fraction imperial. By the act 5 Geo. IV., c. 74, the imperial acre is declared the standard throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from and after 1st May 1825; afterwards, by 6 Geo. IV., c. 12, fixed for 1st January 1826. See Encyc. Brit. h. t.

Acre-Dale, or Aiker-Daill; a term sometimes met with in old deeds and writings, signifying lands in the neighbourhood of villages or towns let in small portions of an acre or so. Wood's Hist. of Parish of Cramond, p. 98.

Act of Bankruptcy. In the law of England, there are certain ostensible indications of insolvency on the part of a debtor, which are called Acts of Bankruptcy, and which are sufficient to bring a party otherwise subject to the bankrupt laws, within their operation. These acts of bankruptcy are, (1.) Departing the realm, or his dwelling-house, with intent to defraud his creditors. (2.) Beginning to keep his house privately, to avoid his creditors. (3.) Procuring or suffering himself, voluntarily and without just cause, to be arrested or outlawed. (4.) Willingly or fraudulently procuring his goods or money to be attached or sequestered. (5.) Making a fraudulent conveyance of lands or goods, to disappoint his creditors of their debts. (6.) Lying in prison two months after arrest, or detention for debt. (7.) Obtaining privilege, other than the privilege of Parliament, against arrest. (8.) Escape from prison after arrest for £100 or more. (9.) Preferring judicially any petition or bill against any of his creditors, to enforce acceptance of less than their just debt, or to procure longer delay in payment than was stipulated for. (10.) Paying the petitioning creditor his debt will supersede that commission, and be ground for another; and for the forfeiture of the debt so paid, for behoof of the other creditors. (11.) Neglecting to pay a debt of £100, or more, within two months after service of legal process for such debt on a trader, having privilege of Parliament. Holding these several special acts as criterions of insolvency or fraud, sufficient to found an application for a commission of bankruptcy, the law of England admits no other acts, by inference or analogy ; while, in determining whether an equivocal act is to be held as falling within the legal description of any of the acts above enumerated, the great test seems to be, whether or not the supposed act was done to defraud or delay creditors in the recovery of their just debts. The expression, act of bankruptcy, is unknown in Scotch legal phraseology ; but in the definition of notour bankruptcy, under the act 1696, c. 5, and of mercantile bankruptcy, under the sequestration statute, an enumeration of the indications of insolvency, analogous to the English acts of bankruptcy, will be found. Tomlins, voce Bankrupt. See Bankrupt.

Act and Commission ; is the judicial act, whereby, in the Court of Session, a commission is granted to a special commissioner for taking a proof, or examining havers, in a depending action. See Evidence. Commission.

Act of Court in a Service ; was a notarial instrument, stating the proceedings in the court of service, drawn up and signed by the clerk of court ; which afforded evidence of what passed in the court relative to the service. See Service. This instrument is no longer necessary.

Act of God ; in law language, signifies any inevitable accident occurring without the intervention of man ; such as from storms, lightning, tempests, &c. Losses arising from these and similar fatalities are not held to be such as one party, under any circumstances (independently of special contract), is bound to make good to another. Such losses, for example, are sufficient to liberate innkeepers and stablers from their obligation under the edict, Nautæ, caupones, stabularii. Bell's Com. i. pp. 470, 559, et seq., 5th edit.

Act of Grace. The act 1696, c. 32, for the aliment of poor prisoners incarcerated for non-payment of debt, is called the Act of Grace. The original object of this enactment was to relieve royal burghs of this expense ; but practically, it has mitigated the severity of the law of imprisonment for debt. By the statute 6 Geo. IV., c. 62, the older statute has been amended and improved ; and the following are now the leading provisions of the law on the subject : No keeper of a jail is entitled to receive a prisoner to be confined for civil debt, until the incarcerating creditor, or some one on his behalf, deposits in the jailor's hands ten shillings for aliment of the prisoner. Where aliment is afterwards awarded to the prisoner under the act 1696, c. 32, the jailor is bound to pay the aliment at the rate allowed, out of the deposit of ten shillings, from the date of the imprisonment until the money is exhausted. Where the prisoner is refused aliment, the ten shillings are to be returned to the depositor ; or where the prisoner does not apply for aliment for thirty days after commitment, the ten shillings are also to be returned. So also, where aliment has been awarded, but the ten shillings are not exhausted at the debtor's liberation, the unexhausted balance must be returned. And finally, where, before the prisoner can avail himself of the act 1696, the creditor consents to his liberation without payment of any part of the debt, the ten shillings are to be returned to the depositor, under deduction of the prisoner's aliment during his confinement, at the lowest rate usually allowed by the magistrates of the particular burgh. Every prisoner petitioning for the benefit of the Act of Grace must, when desired, execute a disposition omnium bonorum, in favour of the incarcerating creditor, for behoof of the other creditors, and at the expense of the creditor demanding the disposition. If, after being duly required, in writing, to execute such disposition, the debtor refuses or delays, he is entitled to no aliment while so refusing. A prisoner who desires the benefit of the Act of Grace must apply by petition to the magistrates of the burgh, and must swear that he has no means of subsistence. He must also be actually in prison at the time. He cannot apply while at large, on a sick bill ; and his application, when made, must be intimated to the incarcerating creditor or creditors, by service of the petition. The term allowed to the creditor either to provide an aliment, or to consent to liberation, is ten days from the service of the notice ; and if within that time aliment be not lodged, the debtor may be liberated. He may be liberated on the tenth day ; and where the incarcerating creditor lodges a sum with the jailor, to be applied in payment of the aliment awarded, the debtor will be liberated if the creditor fail to lodge a further sum, before the sum in the hands of the jailor is actually exhausted. It was at one time thought, that where the debt in respect of which the debtor had been incarcerated was a debt arising ex delicto, he was not entitled to the benefit of the act. But this is a mistake. Whatever be the origin of the debt, if it be of the nature of a civil debt due to a private party, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, the debtor is entitled to the benefit of the act. On the other hand, where the debt is a fine imposed in modum pænæ, for the public interest, the debtor cannot claim the benefit of the Act of Grace against the public prosecutor, on the plea of inability to pay the fine ; but must be alimented from the public fund appropriated to the aliment of prisoners ex delicto. A prisoner incarcerated for not performing an act within his own power, or ad factum præstandum, is not entitled to the benefit of the act. The quantum of aliment awarded varies in different burghs; but is in general very moderate; and in fixing it, the magistrates act subject to the review of the Court of Session. Where the debtor has an aliment from any source, no matter under what restrictions it may have been given, he must either surrender that aliment to the incarcerating creditor, or forego the benefit of the act. A debtor who has obtained the benefit of the Act of Grace, and who has been liberated in consequence of the creditor's failure to lodge aliment, may be afterwards re-incarcerated under the same diligence; although this is a power which a creditor would not be permitted to use oppressively. According to Erskine, where the debtor fails to lodge aliment, the magistrates, if they choose, may themselves aliment the debtor, and so protract his imprisonment. But the decision on which this dictum rests, has been disapproved of on the Bench, obiter, in a recent case. Bank. iii. p. 20, § 8; Brown's Synop. pp. 537, 1231, 1757; Shaw's Digest, b. i. and p. 647; S.D. vol. xi. pp. 144, 372; xii. p. 28; xiv. 380; Ersk. iv. tit. 3, § 28, Ivory's Notes; Bell's Com. ii. 553, et seq.; Princ. § 2406; 6 Geo. Act of Parliament. An Act of Parliament is a law passed by all the three branches of the Legislature; the King (or Queen), the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, in Parliament assembled. This is the highest legal authority known in the constitution; and a statute so enacted cannot be altered, repealed, or suspended, except by the same authority, or (in Scotland) by a long course of contrary usage or disuse; for, by the law of Scotland, a statute may, by disuse, cease to be obligatory. The ancient acts of the Scotch Parliament were proclaimed in all the country towns, boroughs, and even in the baron courts. This mode of promulgation, however, was gradually dropped as the use of printing became common; and, by the act 1581, c. 128, the publication at the market-cross of Edinburgh was declared to be sufficient. British statutes require no formal promulgation; and, in order to fix the time from which they shall become binding, it was enacted by 33 Geo. III., c. 13, that every Act of Parliament to be passed after April 8, 1793, shall commence from the date of the indorsement by the clerk of Parliament, stating the day, month, and year when the act was passed and received the royal assent, unless the commencement shall in the act itself be otherwise provided for. By the Acts of Parliament Abbreviation Act, 13 Vict., c. 51, it is provided, that Acts of Parliament may be altered, amended, or repealed in the same session; that all Acts shall be divided into sections, without introductory words; that in referring to statutes it shall be sufficient to cite the year of the reign, chapter, and section, without the title; that repealed acts shall not be revived in virtue of a repeal of the repealing act; that repealed provisions shall remain in force till the substituted provisions come into force; and that acts shall be deemed public unless the contrary be expressly declared. Section 4 contains the interpretation of certain terms for future acts. See Parliament. Desuetude. Assent, Royal Statute.

Act of Warding; is a warrant issued by the magistrates of royal burghs, authorising the imprisonment of a debtor. This warrant is contained either in a judgment pronounced by the magistrates, or in a decree of registration proceeding from the court of the magistrates, upon a clause of consent, or upon a registered protest of a bill. The privilege of granting such warrants is peculiar to the magistrates of royal burghs. It has been traced (erroneously it is believed) to the 2d stat. Robert I., c. 19, Reg. Mag. p. 361; and was till lately the only direct execution for payment of debt known in Scotland; imprisonment under horning and caption being founded on a fiction of the law, by which the debtor is imprisoned as a rebel. In strictness, the imprisonment under an act of warding ought to proceed only after an unsuccessful search for the effects of the debtor; and it is the practice of the town-officers in Edinburgh to certify that such a search has been made; after which, the days of charge being elapsed, the debtor may be imprisoned. Such warrants can be issued only against inhabitants of the burgh subject to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, which all persons are after forty days' residence within the royalty. In Ross's Lectures, vol. i. p. 255, there are some interesting historical speculations connected with this subject. Bell's Com. ii. 538; Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 1; Bank. iii. p. 1, § 2; *Kames' Stat. Acts of Sederunt; are ordinances of the Court of Session, made originally under authority of the act 1540, c. 93, whereby the Judges are empowered to make such statutes as may be necessary for the ordering of processes, and the expediting of justice. The power thus conferred was occasionally exceeded; and it became necessary, accordingly, to ratify several of the Acts of Sederunt in the Scotch Parliament. In so far, however, as Acts of Sederunt are confined to declarations of the purpose of the court to decide in a particular way on an occurrence of similar circumstances, they seem to amount to little more than authoritative announcements of the intention of the court to adhere judicially to certain precedents. The Acts of Sederunt which partake most of the legislative character are the acts 24th June 1665, as to pro-tutors, 28th Feb. 1662, as to executors-creditors, and 14th Dec. 1756, as to the removing of tenants. But with these exceptions, the Acts of Sederunt of the Court of Session have been confined, for upwards of a century and a half, almost exclusively to the regulation of judicial procedure, and to matters therewith connected. In recent statutes, express power is given to the Court of Session to pass Acts of Sederunt for carrying the purpose of the Legislature into more complete effect; and it is usually provided that the Acts of Sederunt made in virtue of such powers shall be laid before Parliament within a limited time. The old quorum of nine judges is requisite in passing an Act of Sederunt; 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 11. Ersk. i. tit. 1, § 40; Shand's Practice, i. 45; Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 16; Bank. i. p. 28.

Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. The acts of the General Assembly, issued under their legislative powers, are binding on all the members and judicatories of the church. The form of their procedure, in these enactments, is regulated by an act of the church (1697,) termed the Barrier Act, which directs any proposal or overture for a new act, or for repealing an old one, to be laid by the member by whom it is proposed before the presbytery or synod to which he belongs, who, if they approve of it, will transmit it to the General Assembly as their own overture. This overture may either be dismissed or adopted by the General Assembly, and it may be adopted with such changes or modifications as they may think proper. The overture, being adopted by the General Assembly, is, by that body, transmitted to the several presbyteries of the church for their consideration, with an injunction to send up their opinion on the measure to the next General Assembly, who may pass it into a standing law, if it be the general opinion of the church that it ought to be enacted; but a majority of presbyteries must have approved of it. The delay which this form of proceeding necessarily occasions, is remedied by a power exercised by the General Assembly of converting the overture, (where the presbyteries have neglected to communicate their opinion on the point,) into an interim act, which is held to be binding until the meeting of the next Assembly, and may be continued until the act be finally approved of or rejected. No overture, however, can be converted into an interim act, which involves an essential alteration of the existing law or practice of the church; but this does not apply to measures which may be necessary for carrying out more effectually subsisting regulations or forms. See Act of Assembly anent passing Interim Acts, 1848. Actio Directa et Contraria. Contracts and obligations in the Roman law gave rise to two actions; the actio directa, for enforcing implement of the essential obligation; and the actio contraria, for enforcing the counter obligation. Thus, in the contract of commodate, the actio directa was competent to the lender against the borrower, to compel him to return the thing lent; and the actio contraria to the borrower, to enforce his counter claims arising out of the contract. So the actio tutelæ directa was competent to the minor, on the expiration of the tutory, against the tutor, for compelling him to account and pay. The actio contraria to the tutor against the minor, for reimbursement of the expense necessarily disbursed in the pupil's affairs. And, generally speaking, in all contracts, the leading and essential obligation produced the actio directa, the counter obligation the actio contraria. Stair, iv. tit. 3, § 35; Ersk. iii. tit. 1, § 24.

Actio Quanti Minoris. See Quanti Minoris.

Actio Redhibitoria; was an action in the Roman law (founded on the implied warranty of the contract of sale), by which, when the purchaser discovered a latent fault in the commodity purchased, such as rendered it unfit for the purpose for which it was intended, he was entitled, within six months, to return the goods, and claim repetition of the price. This action seems to have been competent, wherever the defect was such, that, if the buyer had been made acquainted with it, he would not have become a purchaser. By the law of Scotland, an action of this kind is admitted, where it is brought immediately, that is, within a few days after the sale; for, if it be longer delayed, the presumption is that the purchaser is satisfied. It would appear that the law of England differs from the Roman and Scotch law in this respect, and that, by the English law, express warranty from the seller is necessary, in order to entitle the purchaser to any remedy. Brown on Sale, p. 287; Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 10; Ersk. B. iii. tit. iii., § 10; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825) p. 175.

Action. An action is the judicial process, whereby legal rights and obligations, whether personal or real, heritable or moveable, are asserted and ascertained, and vindicated or made effectual by the competent tribunals for determining the question at issue, and warranting the appropriate execution. Actions are either civil or criminal. Civil actions properly so called, are those which, whether founded on a civil right or obligation, or on a crime or delict, are prosecuted merely ad civilem effectum, for enforcement of the right or reparation of the private injury. Criminal actions, on the other hand, are actions in which the offender is prosecuted ad vindictam publicam; or for the punishment or penalty of his offence against the public. In the practice of the law of Scotland, although these two classes of actions occasionally present themselves in something of a mixed form, yet, generally speaking, the line of demarcation is sufficiently distinct for all practical purposes; as is explained under separate articles. In the Court of Session, civil actions are classified by institutional writers, as ACTIONS OF THE FIRST INSTANCE, including Petitory, Possessory, Declaratory, Rescissory, and Accessory actions, and Summary actions, such as petitions or petitions and complaints under particular statutes, or for contempts of court, or against members of the College of Justice for malversation or misconduct, or the like; and ACTIONS OF THE SECOND INSTANCE, such as Advocations, Suspensions, and Reductions of decrees. The nature of these several actions is explained under their respective heads. In Scotland, there is no classification of actions according to certain inflexible formulas. Such an arrangement, however captivating in theory, is not adapted to the exigencies of actual business, and to the blended and complex character which questions of civil right frequently assume. Hence, there is hardly any combination of circumstances, and no involution of conflicting claims either of right or of status, which may not be explicated in the Court of Session, by means of an action founded on the special circumstances of the particular case; and concluding for the proper legal remedy or redress. In the inferior courts this is not always attainable, their jurisdiction being limited, not only in territorial extent, but also with respect to the description of actions which may be competently brought before them. On the subject of civil actions, as comprehending not only the judicial processes, but the executorial, or diligences, as they are termed in the law of Scotland, whereby civil rights are made effectual, and enforced by legal execution, see Stair, B. iv. tit. 3; Bank, B. iv. t. 23; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1; Bell's Princ.; Shaw's Digest, voce Process; Thomson on Bills, p. 590, et seq.; M'Farlane's Jury Practice, 23, 39, 110; *Jurid. Actor; a Counsel or Advocate. The term is still used by the Clerks of the Court of Session, who, in prefixing the partibus or minute of appearance to interlocutors, designate the respective counsel for the parties Actor and Alter.

Actor Sequitur Forum Rei; a Roman law maxim, importing that the pursuer of an action must follow the forum of the defender; i. e., if the defender is not amenable to the courts of Scotland, the pursuer must raise his action against him in the country to the laws of which he is subject. See Abroad.

Actornatus; according to Skene, is he who makes answer for another in judgment, specially for the defender; as Prolocutor is he who speaks for the pursuer. Also an attorney or procurator for another. See Skene, De Verb. Sig.

Actus; one of the Roman law rural servitudes of passage or way. The servitude iter, in that law, signifies the dominant proprietor's right to a foot and horse passage for himself, his family, and tenants, through the servient proprietor's lands; and the servitude actus superadds to the servitus itineris the right also of using the road for carriages drawn by men, and for driving cattle. Ersk. ii. t. 9, § 12; Stair, B. xi. t. 7, § 10; Bank, i. 678, § 39. Adherence, Action of. By the act 1573, c. 55, where either of the spouses deserts the other without a reasonable cause, and remains in his or her "malicious obstinacy" for four years, the injured party may raise an action of adherence before the judge ordinary. If the pursuer obtain decree of adherence, and the defender disobeys the sentence, letters of horning may be obtained under the signet, to enforce the decree. If this fail, the church is directed to admonish the defender to adhere, on pain of excommunication; and if these several steps prove unavailing, the injured party may raise an action of divorce on the ground of desertion. An action of adherence cannot be raised until after at least one year's desertion; and the summons ought to be special as to the date and circumstances of the desertion, not only to show that it has continued for one year, but also, in contemplation of a divorce following thereon, to leave no doubt in reckoning the four years. When the action of adherence is at the instance of the wife, she may competently conclude in the same summons for aliment; and her husband's payment of the aliment decerned for during the three intervening years will not bar the divorce, if the desertion continue. The defender in an action of adherence must be subject, either actually, or fictione juris, to the jurisdiction of the Scotch courts; A. B., 1st March 1845, 7 D. p. 556; Gordon, 19th June 1847, 9 D. 1293; although it seems to be considered no bar to the action that the husband has left Scotland, if his absence be for the obvious purpose of depriving his wife of this remedy. See Desertion. Where the wife is the defender, there can be no difficulty as to jurisdiction, since she, fictione juris, follows the domicile of her husband; and if he seeks redress in this form, he must have his real domicile in Scotland. The action of adherence ought to be intimated personally to the defender, if abroad; Black, 4th February 1842, 4 D. 615. In Smith, 11th February 1854, 16 D. 544, it was held that the action of divorce might competently proceed upon edictal citation merely, in respect the previous process of adherence had also proceeded upon edictal citation, the defender having never been heard of since his desertion, though inquiries had been made after him. In the adherence, evidence must be led both of the marriage, and that the desertion was wilful; A. B., and Black, ut supra. If the decree does not mention the date of the desertion, evidence thereof must be led in the subsequent action of divorce; Maxwell, 29th Nov. 1851, 14 D. 126. The action of adherence, not being mentioned in 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 69, and 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 41, could only be instituted in the Sheriff Court, as coming in place of the inferior commissary, unless the defender was abroad, when it might be instituted in the Court of Session; but by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 16, this and all other consistorial actions can competently be brought in the Court of Session only. The recent statute, admitting the parties to a cause as witnesses, makes actions of adherence one of the exceptions in which the parties still continue inadmissible. The procedure before the presbytery after decree of adherence is given in Cook's Styles of Procedure before Church Courts, p. 239. See also *Fraser, Pers. and Dom. Adjournment. To adjourn a court is, by a regular act, to stop the proceedings for the present, and delay them to a future time. The proceedings in a service, or even in a criminal trial, may be adjourned on cause shown. But in a criminal case, no adjournment can take place after the assize have been sworn, excepting where the extraordinary length of the trial renders it absolutely necessary, and the adjournment must be to a day certain. Hume, ii. 263, 414, 417; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 90, and note; M'Farlane's Jury Prac. p. 245. Adjudication for Debt. Adjudication is the modern real diligence for attaching land and other heritable estate in satisfaction of debt. It was substituted for the apprising, which seems to have been originally a very summary proceeding, by which, where the debtor was not possessed of sufficient moveable property, the Sheriff was authorised to give him notice to sell his lands within fifteen days, to pay the debt, and failing his doing so, to transfer the property absolutely, to the creditor in satisfaction of his debt. The act 1469, c. 37, as a modification of the hardships of the older law, gave the debtor a power of redemption within seven years, on his repaying to the purchaser the price, and the expense of completing his titles. Where no purchaser appeared, the Sheriff was directed by that statute to apprise the lands by thirteen "of the best and worthiest of the shire," and to make it over to the creditor to the extent of the debt; the superior being bound to receive the creditor or purchaser on payment of a year's rent, or to take the lands himself and pay the debt. Under this statute, apprising appears to have been conducted for some time with a due regard to the mutual interests of the parties; but the execution of the act, in the country, having fallen into the hands of messengers-at-arms, abuses arose, which were attempted to be remedied by conducting the apprising in every case at Edinburgh. The expense, however, with which this was attended, introduced the practice of allowing the creditor to enter into possession on a general redeemable title, and to draw the rents and profits during the whole term of redemption, without being under any obligation to account for the surplus over the interest of the debt. This practice gave facilities to the grossest abuses; and to remedy some of the evils, the act 1621, c. 6, provided that the rents and profits, in so far as they exceeded the interest of the debt, should be imputed pro tanto to the payment of the principal. The same statute enacted, that the legal reversion of seven years should not run against minors. The act 1661, c. 62, prorogated the legal reversion of appraisings from seven to ten years, and provided, that all appraisings, within year and day of the first effectual one, should rank pari passu; defining the first effectual apprising to be that on which the first feudal right has been completed by sasine, or by charge against the superior. The expense of the first effectual apprising is also declared by that statute to be common to all who shall take benefit by it.

By the act 1672, c. 19, the form of adjudication was introduced. That statute, after narrating the various abuses of the old system of appraisings, enacted, that, in place of apprising, a process should be raised in the Court of Session against the debtor, in which the Court should adjudge from him a part of his lands, or other estate in use to be appraised, corresponding to the debt, interest, and the expense of entry and infeftment, with a fifth part more on account of the inconvenience to which the creditor is put by being obliged to take land instead of money. The value of the land so to be adjudged was to be ascertained by a proof of the rental, or profits, to be led by the debtor (if he choose) and the creditor before the Court. Upon the decree of adjudication thus obtained the creditor was entitled immediately to enter into possession; and as the land so set apart was considered as of the nature of a surrogatum for the debt, the creditor was under no obligation to account for the surplus, if there should be any, after paying the interest. The period of redemption under this form, which was called a special adjudication, was made five years after the date of the decree; and it was declared, that after the creditor had attained possession under the decree, he should have no farther execution against his debtor by arrestment, caption, or otherwise, except in the case of eviction under the warrantice. But as these statutory provisions proceeded on the supposition that the debtor was to produce a sufficient progress of titles, and to ratify the decree of adjudication, and cede summary and quiet possession to the creditor, it was farther enacted, that where the debtor did not comply with these requisites, it should be in the power of the creditor to adjudge, generally, all right vested in the debtor, in the same manner as he might have used apprising under the act 1661, c. 62, and under the reversion and with the powers competent to the creditor conferred by that act. This last was the general adjudication; and it concluded only for the principal sum, interest and penalty, but not for a fifth part more; Act of Sederunt, 26th Feb. 1684. In the case of a special adjudication, the creditor could not also resort to personal and other diligence against the debtor, but he was under no such restriction in the case of the general adjudication.

The action of adjudication introduced by the statute 1672, c. 19, could not proceed until the debt had been constituted either by a decree ascertaining its precise amount, or by a liquid ground of debt; and the summons of adjudication, after stating the manner in which the debt was constituted, narrated the statute 1672, and formerly concluded alternatively for a special or general adjudication. This alternative conclusion was formerly necessary, because, although there was hardly an instance of a special adjudication, yet it was only on the debtor's refusal to avail himself of the first alternative that the Court was authorised by the statute to pronounce a decree in the general adjudication. The decree in the action adjudges the lands, &c. to the creditor redeemably, and orders the superior to receive him as his vassal. In order to give the necessary publicity to such decrees, an abridged statement, called an Abbreviate, containing the names of the debtor and creditor, and an enumeration of the subjects adjudged, is signed by the extractor who signs the decree, and recorded within sixty days, in a register appointed for the purpose. See Abbreviate.

The subjects which may be adjudged, are heritable estate in its most extensive signification, including not only feudal rights, but all rights or interests affecting or connected with land, such as heritable bonds and real securities, or burdens or faculties of all kinds, as also annuities and all rights having a tract of future time, liferents, reversions, rights of tack where assignees are not excluded, heirship moveables, heritable offices of dignity or jurisdiction, personal rights to lands, personal bonds excluding executors, rights of patronage, stock of any chartered bank where the diligence of arrestment is excluded, the husband's right to the rents of his wife's estate, rights to reduce ex capite lecti, fair, harbour and ferry dues, entailed estates during the life of the heir, and the like. Jurid. Styles, iii. 329; Shand, ii. 662. As the adjudication is a diligence, the summons contains no conclusion for expenses of process; although, where decree is unduly opposed, it would seem that the Court may award expenses; decree for which, in such a case, ought to be taken in name of the agent disburser; Shand's Prac. ii. 675. The debt on which the adjudication proceeds must be liquid, and legally vested in the pursuer's person, by direct obligation, or by assignation, or by confirmation; and cannot be constituted in the process of adjudication itself, except in the case of adjudication contra hereditatem jacentem (which see.) By the mere citation of the debtor the subject to be adjudged becomes litigious. When the summons came into Court, there was formerly a difference in the procedure between a first and any subsequent adjudication; for the debtor in a first adjudication might have appeared and taken a day to produce his titles, &c. with the view, if he chose, of concurring in a special adjudication, which could not be done in any subsequent adjudication. It is also provided by the act 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 9, that the Lord Ordinary, before whom the first process of adjudication is called, shall ordain intimation thereof to be made in the Minute-book, and on the walls of the Parliament House, in order that other creditors, who are in a condition to adjudge, may be conjoined in the process; and for that purpose twenty sederunt days are allowed. At the expiration of the twenty days, those who can produce instructions of their debts, with summonses of adjudication, libelled and signeted, are conjoined in one and the same adjudication. This procedure is proper to the first adjudication only. In the action of constitution with a view to adjudication, where delay might exclude the creditor from the pari passu ranking, the Lord Ordinary will pronounce decree of constitution at once, reserving all objections contra executionem; and with the same view, the Court, on a special petition, will dispense with the induciae and calling of the summons, and with the reading of the decree in the Minute-book. But this indulgence will only be granted to secure the pari passu ranking, within year and day of the first effectual adjudication. After the lapse of the year it becomes a race of diligence, as against the residue, and no such favour can be shown to any one creditor. As to the form of process, so far as effected by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, the regulation is, that in processes of adjudication, it is in the power of the Court and of the Lord Ordinary to require the parties to proceed according to the forms applicable to ordinary actions, in so far as it shall appear fit or expedient to apply these; but in so far as compliance with these rules is not specially required, the forms in use before the passing of the statute remain in force; except only as to the review of interlocutors, which is regulated by the general rule of the Judicature Act, and relative Act of Sederunt; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 103. An ordinary adjudication is rarely opposed to the effect of rendering a record necessary. In a work such as the present, the minute practical details connected with this important step of real diligence would be out of place; but they will be found fully digested in Shand's Practice, ii. 656, 5741; Jurid. Styles, iii. 324, et seq.; and Bell's Styles, vi. 393, et seq.

The adjudication is made effectual, so as to compete with other heritable rights, by charter of adjudication and sasine (see Effectual Adjudication); and in all questions with other adjudications it will be completed by presenting a Note in Exchequer, when the holding is of the Crown, or by executing a general charge of horning against superiors at the market-cross of Edinburgh and pier and shore of Leith, where the holding is of a subject, and recording an abstract of the charge in the register of abbreviates of adjudication; 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 11. The adjudication, being rendered effectual, may become the foundation of a preference; but all adjudications led within year and day of the first effectual adjudication are, by the act 1661, c. 62, to be ranked pari passu. Adjudications, after the expiration of the year and day, are preferred upon the residue of the estate, according to the dates of recording the abbreviates; 1661, c. 31.

The right of the adjudger was redeemable in the special adjudication in five years, and in the general in ten, and in the adjudication contra hereditatem jacentem in seven. The redemption may be effected under the general adjudication by the creditor's intromission with the rents and profits, but in the special adjudication the rent went for the interest; and the debtor, before he can redeem the subject adjudged, must pay the debt and a fifth part more. The adjudication may be made the ground of an action of mails and duties (see Mails and Duties), by which the adjudging creditor will attain possession of the rents; but in that case he must account by a rental, and he will be liable in strict diligence in the recovery of the rents. The adjudger's right is rendered irredeemable by a decree of declarator of expiry of the legal, which is obtained in an action raised after the expiration of the period of redemption, in which action the debtor is required to redeem the lands, or to be foreclosed; and in this action of declarator the debtor in the general adjudication is entitled to insist that the creditor shall account for the rents and profits he has drawn, so as to have the precise balance ascertained. If the debt was not paid off within the legal, the adjudger's right formerly became ipso facto irredeemable, however small the balance remaining unpaid may have been. It is now settled, however, that a declarator of expiry is necessary, although it would appear that some eminent lawyers have doubted how far the rule is a proper one. See Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 705, 5th edit. A charter of adjudication and infeftment, followed by forty years' possession, forms a good irredeemable title without a declarator of expiry of the legal. Robertson v. The Duke of Athole, 10th May 1815, Dow's Reports, vol. iii.

An adjudication for debt, until it becomes irredeemable, is merely a pignus prætorium or judicial security, and not a sale under reversion. The true nature of an adjudication for debt was considered in the case of Cochrane v. Beyle, 2d March 1849. The pursuer held an estate under an entail defective in regard to the prohibition against sales, but valid in regard to the prohibition against contracting debt. A personal creditor of the former heir had adjudged the estate, and also the power to sell the estate, which was alleged to be in the debtor. A charter of adjudication was obtained, and infeftment followed. The debtor immediately thereafter died, and the next heir brought a reduction of the adjudication, and the infeftment following upon it. The defender pleaded that an adjudication was a sale under reversion, and that therefore it was not struck at by the entail, which was defective in regard to sales. The Court reduced the adjudication, and the judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords. Lord MONCREIFF observed,—“The question remaining is, Is adjudication equivalent to a sale? I am clear that it is not. Whatever the old apprising may have been in theory, I am clear that a decree of general adjudication in modern law is no more than a pignus prætorium,—a step of diligence which only creates a security for debt. It is not the act of the debtor, but a security taken by the act of the law. The debt remains unpaid. The security may be abandoned, and other remedies taken. The debtor is still the vassal.” The expiry of the legal does not, ipso facto, vest a right of property in the adjudger, but must be declared; and where a decree of the expiry of the legal is obtained in absence, it is liable to be opened up on certain grounds. Bell's Com. i. 705.

By 10th and 11th Victoria, cap. 48, § 17, bills for summonses of adjudication are abolished. By the same act, § 18, it is declared to be no longer necessary to libel a conclusion for special adjudication, and that it shall be lawful to libel, conclude, and decern for, general adjudication without such alternative. In virtue of the same act, § 19, the Court, when pronouncing decree of adjudication, whether for debt or in implement of a decree of sale, may grant warrant for infefting the adjudger or purchaser, and his heirs and successors, in the lands contained in the decree. The lands are to be holden alternatively by two several infeftments and manners of holding, the one of the party adjudged from, and the other of the immediate superior. In virtue of such decree of adjudication, or decree of sale, the adjudger or purchaser is entitled to complete his title by obtaining a charter of adjudication or of sale from the superior. Where, however, the person adjudged from is entered with his superior, or in a situation to charge his superior to grant entry by confirmation, the adjudger or purchaser has the option of taking infeftment in virtue of the warrant contained in the decree. An infeftment so taken, along with the decree of adjudication or of sale, constitutes an effectual feudal investiture in the lands holding base of the party adjudged from and his heirs, until confirmation thereof shall have been granted by the superior, in the same manner and to the same effect as if the party adjudged from had granted a disposition of the lands to the adjudger or purchaser in terms of the decree of adjudication or of sale, with an obligation to infeft a me vel de me, and a precept of sasine, and the adjudger or purchaser had been infeft on such precept. The effect of the charter of confirmation of the sasine proceeding on the warrant in the decree is to make the lands hold immediately of the superior; but the right of the superior to the composition payable by an adjudger or purchaser under the existing law is reserved entire, and the adjudger or purchaser, by taking infeftment on the decree, becomes indebted in such composition to the superior, and is bound to pay it on the superior tendering a charter of confirmation, whether the charter shall be accepted or not, and the superior is entitled to recover payment of such composition. The sasine on such decree, when duly recorded, is of itself sufficient to make the adjudication effectual in all questions of bankruptcy or diligence. Where the charter or other deed by which the vassal's right is constituted contains a prohibition against subinfeudation or alternative holding, the decree and sasine, notwithstanding such prohibition, forms a valid feudal investiture in favour of the adjudger or purchaser, but without prejudice to the right of the superior to require the adjudger or purchaser to enter forthwith, and to deal with him as with a vassal unentered.

Adjudication contra Hæreditatem Jacentem. When the debtor's apparent heir renounces the succession, the creditor obtains a decree cognitionis causa. The heir, in respect of his renunciation, is assoltized, but the hæreditas jacens of his predecessor is subjected to the creditor's diligence; and the decree is called a decree cognitionis causa tantum, because its purpose is to ascertain the amount of the debt, so that adjudication may proceed against the heritage of the deceased. In cases where it is expected that the heir is to renounce the succession, a conclusion for adjudication is introduced into the summons of constitution; and, when the heir renounces, decree of adjudication cognitionis causa is pronounced. If the heir should not renounce, the conclusion for adjudication goes for nothing. This adjudication carries right to the rents due prior to the date of the decree, and is redeemable within seven years by any co-adjudging creditor, either of the deceased debtor or of the heir who has renounced; but the heir himself can neither be restored against his renunciation nor redeem unless on the head of minority, although, if it be an object to the heir to redeem, it may be accomplished indirectly by a simulate bond to a confidential person, who will redeem as a creditor of the heir. The superior of the lands thus adjudged is under the same obligation to enter the adjudger as in the case of appraisings by 1669, c. 18. The adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem was in use before 1672, c. 19; and hence, as the exclusion of inferior courts applicable to adjudications substituted by that statute for appraisings did not apply, the adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem might have proceeded before the Sheriff court, provided that the subjects were within the sheriff's jurisdiction. No special or general special charge was necessary or competent after the heir's renunciation. This adjudication not being founded on the act 1672, the first alternative of that statute could not be concluded for, the adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem being always a general adjudication.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 48, it is no longer competent to use letters of general charge, or special charge, or general special charge. In an action of constitution of an ancestor's debt or obligation against an unentered heir, the citation on and execution of the summons is equivalent to a general charge, and infers the like certification with a general charge. In an action of adjudication against an unentered heir following on such decree of constitution, or in an action of adjudication against an unentered heir, founded on his own debt or obligation, the citation on and execution of the summons of adjudication is equivalent to a special charge or general special charge, as the circumstances may require, and infers the like certification with a special charge or general special charge, as the case may be. Again, in an action of constitution and adjudication, combined in the same summons, against an unentered heir, the same decree may be pronounced which would have been competent had the summons been preceded by letters of general charge, and decree of constitution and adjudication may be pronounced in the same interlocutor, and extracted on the same extract. A combined action of constitution and adjudication was only, under the old law, competent in the case of an adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem in case the heir should renounce; for if he renounced he fell to be assoltized in the action of constitution, and decree was given, not against the heir, but cognitionis causa tantum and contra hæreditatem jacentem of his ancestor. Where the heir did not renounce, decree of constitution could alone be obtained, and the debtor was then obliged to drop the adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem, and to proceed against the heir by a separate adjudication, preceded by a special or general special charge. The act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 48, has made no change in this respect, and in a combined action of constitution and adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem, if the heir does not renounce, the pursuer must drop the adjudication, and raise a separate adjudication against him. The principle of this is, that where the heir does not renounce he must be vested with his ancestor's estate, and the estate must then be adjudged from him. In order to vest the estate in the heir he required to be specially charged to enter heir to his ancestor by letters either of special or of general special charge, according to the nature of the right which was the subject of adjudication. These charges, therefore, preceded the adjudication. Where, however, the heir renounced, the ancestor's estate was not vested in him, and, accordingly, letters of special or of general special charge were unnecessary. By the act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 48, the execution of the adjudication is equivalent to letters of special or of general special charge in the ordinary case, but it does not state that the execution of a combined action of constitution and adjudication shall have that effect. Where, therefore, the heir does not renounce, it is still necessary to drop the adjudication contra hæreditatem jacentem, and bring a separate adjudication against the heir. Accordingly, in the case of Brown v. Wood, 28th January 1851, 13 D. 543, it was held that, in a combined action of constitution and adjudication against an unentered heir, no decree of adjudication could be pronounced, in respect that there was no renunciation by the defender to be heir. Lord MEDWYN observed,—“Such combined actions can only be used in the case where the heir has already recorded a renunciation, or the pursuer has ascertained that he will renounce. To combine the two shortens the process, and in such a state of matters with perfect safety to the heir who is not to enter. But if the heir does not renounce, whether he appear or not, the practice heretofore has been, and most correctly so, that the pursuer must proceed first by his summons of constitution, and then, after decree in it, call the heir in a separate process of adjudication, in so much, that if, under the impression that the heir was to renounce, he had combined the two actions together, he was obliged to take decree only in the constitution, and to stop short there, and then raise his adjudication, preceding it with a special or general special charge to be the foundation of the diligence against the lands, as now the heir's estate vi statuti.”

Adjudication on Debitum Fundi. Where there is a real burden, but no personal obligation, or where the personal obligation is ineffectual, as in the case of an heritable bond by a married woman, or where the object is to make the interest on interest equally preferable with the principal sum, decree is, in the first place, taken in a process of poinding the ground. And the letters of poinding the ground having been executed, an adjudication narrating the ground of debt, decree of poinding the ground, and execution of the letters is raised. This adjudication can affect no lands but those in the security, whereas the adjudication, when there is a personal obligation, may affect the whole heritable property of the debtor. Adjudications on debita fundi, as being preferable in respect of a real right, are not affected by the pari passu ranking of the act 1661, c. 62, which applies only to adjudications for personal debts. Bank vol. ii. p. 238. See Bell's Styles, vi. 445; Shand's Practice, ii. 687, 707. See also Debitum Fundi. Poinding the Ground.

Adjudication in Security. The adjudication in security is not founded on the above-cited statutes, but has been introduced and sanctioned by the Court from equitable considerations. It is the form to be followed where the claim of debt is contingent, future, or uncertain in amount. To authorise such an adjudication, the debtor must be vergens ad inopiam, or other creditors must be adjudging. If it be a first adjudication, it must be intimated in common form (54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 9); and under 1661, c. 62, may compete pari passu with ordinary adjudications. The adjudication in security is completed like an adjudication for payment; but it has no legal, and may be redeemed at any time. It would seem that an ordinary adjudger may restrict his adjudication to a security; and with that view, in one case, the Lord Ordinary was held entitled to recall his interlocutor adjudging, and to adjudge de novo in security only; Ker, 5th Feb. 1830, 8 S. & D. 462. See Bell's Com. i. 714; Ersk. ii. tit. 12, § 42; More's Stair, note, p. ccxcvii.; Bell's Prin. § 832, 2389; Shand's Practice, ii. 709; Bell's Styles, vi. 488; Jurid. Styles, iii. 403.

Adjudication in Implement. Where a party has granted a conveyance to heritable property without a procuratory of resignation or precept of sasine, for enabling the grantee to complete his feudal title; or where the grantee's right stands on a missive of sale, or other obligation to convey without procuratory or precept; and where the granter or his heir refuses, or is unable voluntarily to supply the defect, an action of adjudication in implement is competent. This action is directed against the granter, or the debtor in the obligation to convey, or his heir. The summons libels on the deed or writing containing or importing the obligation to convey, and the defender's refusal to implement it; and concludes that, in implement of the obligation, the subject ought to be adjudged from the defender, and declared to belong to the pursuer; who should be decerned and ordained to be infeft in the lands, to be holden of the defender's superior; that the defender should clear the subject of incumbrances, burdens, &c., or make payment to the pursuer of a sum necessary for that purpose; that he should deliver to the pursuer the title-deeds of the subject; and, finally, that he should pay expenses of process. A decree in this action is a warrant to the superior to grant a charter of adjudication in implement, infeftment on which completes the feudal right of the pursuer. In this adjudication there is no legal and no pari passu ranking, because the action being pursued for the purpose of completing the pursuer's right to a special subject, the subject necessarily must be carried irredeemably (if such be the nature of the right); and for the same reason the title so completed, if otherwise unobjectionable, necessarily must be exclusive. But this form of action is competent only when there is an obligation to convey, express or implied; and the obligation must be duly constituted against the defender, as in the case of adjudication for debt. The adjudication in implement does not require to be intimated when called in the course of the rolls, since no other adjudication can be conjoined with it; but an abbreviate must be recorded. In competitions of adjudications in implement, the first infestment gives the preference, without regard to the date of the decree, or diligence thereon; and the statutory prohibition of adjudications, during the dependence of a process of ranking and sale, does not apply to adjudications in implement; 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 10. In such cases judicial application is made to strike the subjects so adjudged out of the sale, or to except them from the warrant of sale. By the bankrupt statute, the Court of Session is required to adjudge the lands and other heritages belonging to the bankrupt to the trustee, absolutely and irredeemably, for sale, for behoof of the creditors; which adjudication being of the nature of an adjudication in implement, as well as for payment or security, is subject to no reversion; and the trustee is also required to record the act or order adjudging, within fifteen days, in the register of abbreviates of adjudication; 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 29, 30.

Superiors are bound to enter adjudgers in implement, and where two parties adjudge in implement and neither of them is infest, the party first charging the superior will be preferred. Sinclair v. Sinclair, M. 56. An adjudication in implement is not subject to be ranked pari passu, or with other adjudications of any kind. Campbell v. Macvicar, M. 277. In the case of M'Gregor v. Macdonald, 9th March 1843, a competition arose between two adjudications in implement. Colonel Macdonald obtained his decree on 10th March 1829, and the trustees of General M'Gregor obtained their decree on 12th November 1829. These trustees were also superiors of the lands in competition. Colonel Macdonald charged them to grant him a charter of adjudication, and on their refusal he denounced them, and then passing them over he obtained a charter from the next superior in March 1830, on which he was infest. The trustees, on obtaining their decree, granted themselves a charter, and were infest upon it in January 1830. The Court preferred Colonel Macdonald. Lord MONCREIFF observed: "The case is that the trustees knew that Colonel Macdonald held the first adjudication. They intentionally delayed to give him his charter, and as soon as their own adjudication was ready, they granted a charter to themselves for the avowed purpose of defeating his right. No superior is entitled to deal with the rights of third parties demanding that which he is bound to grant, and therefore the trustees are not entitled to found on the priority of the infestment obtained by them by means of what must be regarded as a tortuous act in law." By the act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 48, § 19, the Court, when pronouncing decree of adjudication in implement, may grant warrant for infesting the adjudger and his heirs and successors in the lands adjudged. See Adjudication for Debt. In Hutcheson v. Cameron's Trustees, 26th June 1830, it was held that neither the creditor who brought a ranking and sale, nor the common agent in the process, were entitled to compear in a process of adjudication in implement of missives of sale, and state grounds against decree being pronounced. In Wood v. Scott, 1st July 1830, a party holding a missive of sale, and who was in the course of leading an adjudication in implement, applied to the Court to have the property which formed the subject of the adjudication struck out of a ranking and sale, and the common agent prevented from proceeding with the sale. The Court granted the application, and excepted the subject to which the missive related from the ranking and sale. The holder of the missive of sale then effected the completion of a feudal title by decree of adjudication in implement, upon which he obtained a charter of adjudication from the superior, and having taken infestment he produced the charter and sasine in the process of ranking. The question then arose, what effect was to be given to the completed title in the competition between the adjudger and the common agent, as representing the general body of creditors. The Court found "That the adjudication in implement was not rendered incomplete under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act by the process of ranking and sale, and if duly deduced the subject must fall to be struck out of the sale." By the bankrupt statute 2 and 3 Vict., cap. 41, § 79, it is enacted that the whole heritable estates belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland shall, by virtue of the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee, be transferred to and vested in him for behoof of the creditors absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title, and interest, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment, and in security of debt, subject to the legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if a poiding of the ground had then been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and were not null and reducible.

Adjudication on Trust-Bond. The expedient of adjudging on a trust-bond, is a mode of making up titles to heritage, where an heir is apprehensive about incurring a representation of his predecessor; or when he wishes to challenge adverse deeds, which, if he incurred a formal representation of his predecessor, he might be bound to implement. According to Professor Bell, this expedient was invented by Sir Thomas Hope, and ever since his time the device has had the sanction of the Court and of the profession. The form is for the apparent heir to grant a bond to a confidential person, for a sum exceeding the value of the estate; the fiduciary nature of the transaction being explained by a back-bond, containing an obligation by the simulate creditor, to denude of the property when the adjudication is completed. The creditor in this bond then charges the heir to enter to his predecessor in common form; the heir renounces the succession, and adjudication, in favour of the fictitious creditor, follows in the usual way. The simulate creditor is then in a condition to set aside any deeds granted by the predecessor of the granter of the bond, on all the grounds which a creditor or singular successor may plead, although the heir himself, had he entered, might have been barred from availing himself of these pleas; and if by this expedient the trustee succeeds in acquiring the property as nominal creditor of the apparent heir, he fulfils his back-bond, by conveying it, free of these adverse deeds or claims, to the heir, as donee of the creditor. See on this subject, Ersk. iii. tit. 8, § 72; Bell's Prin. § 834, and authorities there cited; Shand's Practice, ii. 725.

An heir who grants a trust-bond on which his ancestor's estate is adjudged, and the adjudication assigned to him, cannot thereafter renounce to be heir. In the case of Glendinning v. The Earl of Nithsdale, 22d January, 1662, reported by Lord STAIR, the heir offered to renounce and to purge the adjudication, and to declare that it should not prejudice the pursuer, and that he should be accountable for the price of any lands he had sold, or any rents he had uplifted. The Court, "after long consideration and debate," sustained the offer, but "resolved to make and publish an Act of Sederunt against any such courses in time coming, and declared that it should be gestio pro haredite to intronit upon such simulate titles." An Act of Sederunt was accordingly passed February 28, 1662, entitled "Act against the Granting of Bonds of Appeairand Heirs whereupon apprising or adjudication may follow in prejudice of the defunct's debts." This act declares that such apparent heirs "shall be liable as behaving themselves as heirs to their predecessors, by intronission with the rents of the estate so adjudged or apprised, nor shall it be lawful to them to renounce to be heirs after such intronission." The mode of entering to an ancestor's estate by means of an adjudication or a trust-bond, is recognised by the act 1695, c. 24, entitled "Act for obviating frauds of Appeairand Heirs." An apparent heir may make up a title to his ancestor's estate by means of a trust-adjudication, although his right to be heir is disputed, and although the estate sought to be adjudged is held under the fetters of an entail. Craigie v. Ker, 19th Jan. 1808. In that case one of the competitors for the Roxburgh estates granted to trustees a bond for a million and a half, upon which they adjudged. The Court decerned in the adjudication. The President CAMPBELL's manuscript note on the case is "Adjudication upon Trust-Bond. This mode of making up titles recognised by various statutes; act 1621, c. 27; act 1695, c. 24, &c. It confers a safe, active, or tentative title, but till followed by possession or by ascertaining the right, is not a passive title. It cannot be stopped by any competing parties, but must proceed valeat quantum, reserving all objections contra executionem." An adjudication on a trust-bond is also competent where a donee of the ancestor is infert. In the case of Beveridge v. Coutts, 10th July 1793, an heir proposed to bring a reduction of a deed granted by his ancestor on death-bed, and on which deed the donee had taken infertment. As a preparatory step to the reduction he granted a trust-bond, upon which the trustee brought an adjudication. The donee under the death-bed deed appeared, and pleaded that the lands were not in hereditate jacente of the ancestor, and that therefore the heir-at-law could not be served to him, nor could he bring an adjudication against the lands. The heir pleaded that any settlement which he might make in the meantime would be of no avail if he should die before completing his title by service or by the mode now attempted. The Court adjudged, and it was observed on the Bench:—"As the pursuer is entitled to serve heir to his predecessor, the adjudication must be equally competent, and he ought to be at liberty to vest such a title in his person as may enable him to make a settlement."

Adjudication on Trust-Disposition. This, like the adjudication on a trust-bond, is another simulate device for completing a title to heritage. It is effected by the apparent heir granting a disposition of his predecessor's heritage, ex facie absolute, with a back-bond declaring a trust, or granting at once a trust-disposition of the subjects. The heir is then charged by the trust-dispensee to enter, and on his failure, a decree of adjudication in implement is taken against him, which forms the tentative title. But this mode of making up a title was held to be incompetent in the case of Dunlop, 4th July 1820, F. C., affirmed on appeal 31st March 1824; 2 Shaw's Appeals, 115. This case is very ill reported in the Faculty Reports; but see the House of Lords' Reports. It will probably have the effect of discountenancing this expedient. In this case another party was in possession of the estate on an ex facie good personal title. See Bank. vol. ii. 354; see also Shand's Practice, ii. 729, and cases there cited.

Adjudication, Declaratory. A declaratory adjudication is a very useful form of action, appropriately classed with adjudications. Where, for example, the radical right under a trust, or under an heritable security, is in a part indicated by the deed, but not feudally vested, the Court, nearly a century ago, suggested the expedient of a declaratory adjudication. In the case in which the suggestion was made, the right of the trustee was in the first place declared to have been merely fiduciary: it was further declared that the radical right of property was in the party beneficially interested; and this was followed by a decree declaring the trust at an end, and ordaining the superior to grant charters with precepts, for infesting the party to whom the property had been adjudged. At the same time the Court declared that they would follow the like course in all time coming; and the precedent thus established has been accordingly followed since, and received as a rule of great practical utility in analogous cases. See Dalzell, 11th March 1756, M. 16,204; Drummond, 30th June 1758, M. 16,206; Bell's Prin. § 1995, and cases there cited.

Adjunction; is one of the modes of industrial accession borrowed from the Roman law. It takes place where the property of one man is added to that of another; as, for example, where a man builds on the ground of another. In such a case it is held that the proprietor of the grounds is entitled to the building; but, as the presumption is that it was erected in the bona fide belief that the ground was the property of the builder, he is entitled in equity to be indemnified to the extent at least of the benefit which he has conferred. Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 6; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 15. See Accession.

Adjurnatus; an obsolete French word, adopted in the older Scotch law, signifying summoned, or called to a certain day. See Skene, De Verb. Sig.

Adjustment; in the law of insurance, is the settling and ascertaining the exact amount of the indemnity to which, under the policy, the insured is entitled, after all proper allowances and deductions have been made; and fixing the proportions to be borne by the underwriters respectively. Before any adjustment is made, the underwriters require to be satisfied that a loss within the terms of the policy has occurred; and in the ordinary case the duty of making the requisite inquiries is devolved on the underwriter who has first subscribed the policy. In complicated cases of average loss the papers are usually submitted to a professional referee, to calculate and adjust the percentage rate of loss. After an adjustment has been once made and signed, it is not usual for the underwriters to require further proof, but at once to pay the loss. It is not, however, conclusive and binding on the underwriters; for where the extent of the loss is disputed, the adjustment operates merely as a transfer of the onus probandi from the insured to the underwriters. Bell's Com. i. 613, et seq.; Princ. § 503, et seq. See Insurance.

Adminicle; is a term used in the action of proving the tenor of a lost deed; and signifies any writing, draft, or scroll, tending to establish the existence or terms of the deed in question. Stair, B. iv. tit. 32, § 6; Mr More's Notes, p. cccclxxvi.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 55; Bank. ii. p. 642, § 3. See Proving of Tenor.

Administrator-in-Law. By the law of Scotland the father is what is called administrator-in-law for his children. As such, he is ipso jure their tutor while they are pupils, and their curator during their minority. The father's power extends over whatever estate may descend to his children, unless where that estate has been placed by the donor or grantor under the charge of special trustees or managers. This power in the father ceases by the child's discontinuing to reside with him, unless he continues to live at the father's expense; and, with regard to daughters, it ceases on their marriage, the husband being the legal curator of his wife. Stair, i. t. 5, § 12; Bank. vol. i. p. 153, § 2; Bell's Prin. § 2068; Dow's Appeal Cases, i. 107; ii. 204, 214.

Administrator; in English law, is the person to whom, in default of an executor nominate, the Ordinary commits the administration of the goods of a person dying intestate. The administrator is accountable for his intrusions when required. Tomlinson, h. t. See Executor.

Admiral. By the act 1681, c. 16, the act 1609, c. 15, was ratified, and the High Court of Admiralty declared to be a sovereign judicature in itself, and in its own nature to import summary jurisdiction. The act farther declared the High Admiral to be the King's Justice-General upon the seas, and in all ports, harbours, or creeks, and upon navigable rivers below the first bridges, or within flood-mark, and that he had the sole privilege and jurisdiction in all maritime and seafaring causes, foreign and domestic, whether civil or criminal, within the realm; and over all persons concerned in the same; and all other judges were prohibited from interfering with the decision of such causes in the first instance. The act also subjected the decrees and acts of all inferior courts of Admiralty to the review of the High Court of Admiralty; it gave power to the High Court of Admiralty to review its own decrees; prohibited advocations of its judgments; and prescribed the form in which they might be suspended. The Judge-Admiral required to have been an advocate, who, for three years immediately preceding his appointment, should have bona fide attended practice in the Court; 26 Geo. III., c. 47, § 5. See next article.

Admiralty, Court of. The jurisdiction and powers of the ancient Court of Admiralty in Scotland, were fixed by the statutes referred to in the preceding article. Its jurisdiction was both civil and criminal. In civil matters the Judge-Admiral was judge in the first instance in all maritime causes; as in questions on charter-parties, freights, salvages, wrecks, bottomries, policies of insurance, and all questions relating to the lading and unlading of ships, or to any act to be performed within the bounds of his jurisdiction; he had jurisdiction also in all actions for recovery of goods, or their value, when the goods had been sent by sea from one port to another. In criminal matters he had exclusive cognizance in the crimes of piracy and mutiny on ship-board; but in the case of murder, and in general in all cases where the crime did not offend against the laws of navigation, this jurisdiction was not exclusive, even although the crime had been committed on ship-board. The Admiralty jurisdiction in Scotland was ratified and confirmed by the statute 5 Anne, c. 7, § 19; regulated by the statute 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c.

39; and finally abolished by the statute 1 Will. IV., c. 69. By this last statute, § 21, the civil jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court was transferred to the Court of Session, except in cases not exceeding £25 in value, which are made competent in the first instance in an inferior court, in the manner directed, and with the exceptions specified, in the act 1672, c. 16; and all applications of a summary nature, connected with such causes, may now be made to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills. Maritime causes include all questions as to policies of insurance on ships, and on goods sent by sea, freights, salvages, wrecks, and bonds of bottomry; all contracts as to the lading and unlading of ships, and with seamen as to their wages or employment on ship-board; as to the delivery of goods sent by sea, or for recovery of their value; actions for payment of the repairs on ships, or for provisions furnished for the crew; claims of ships'-husbands for such repairs or furnishings; actions for the sale of ships; against brokers for delaying to effect insurances on ships, or goods therein; and sundry other actions of a seafaring nature, requiring knowledge of maritime laws and practice—some of which actions are now made specially appropriate for trial by jury. (See Jury Trial.) Formerly in maritime causes the defender was bound to find caution de judicio sisti et judicatum solvi; the pursuer was also bound, if required by the defender, to find caution for damages and expenses. But the statute 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 22, provides, that in maritime causes or proceedings before the Sheriff Courts caution judicatum solvi or de damnis et impensis shall not be required from any party domiciled in Scotland, unless the judge shall require it on special grounds; and 13 and 14 Vic., c. 36, § 24, abolished the granting of bonds de damnis et impensis by the pursuer, and de judicio sisti et judicatum solvi by the defender, in maritime causes before the Court of Session. In maritime actions for sailors' wages, there is an exception to the common law rule as to the rights of unconnected parties to sue in the same summons, inasmuch as all the mariners of the vessel may sue in one action; and in such actions the master and owners are bound to produce the ship's articles. The criminal jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty is, by the same statute, merged in that of the Court of Justiciary and Sheriff-courts; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 21, 22. A Circuit Court of Justiciary has jurisdiction to try a crime charged as committed on the seas within the jurisdiction of that circuit; Bell's Supp. to Hume, pp. 146, 147. By the Judicature Act, the jurisdiction in questions of prizes and captures, and in the condemnation of vessels, at one time exercised by the High Court of Admiralty in Scotland, is entirely taken away, and vested exclusively in the High Court of Admiralty in England; (see 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 57.) The Court of Session summonses in admiralty or maritime causes are not different from ordinary summonses. Formerly, however, they were signed by a principal or depute clerk of Session, and did not pass the Signet. But by § 29 of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, it is declared that they may be raised and pass under the Signet, in like manner as other summonses before the Court of Session. Such actions are also exempted from the fee-fund of the Court of Session, and the other Court of Session exactions; and the agents conducting them are bound to charge according to the rate of charges in the High Court of Admiralty; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 40; see also note at end of Schedule of Fees appended to 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118. In Morrison, 11th July 1837, 15 S. 1293, the question was raised, whether, under § 21 (see supra) and § 22 of 1 Will. IV., c. 69, a maritime debt under £25, contracted to a merchant in Leith by a party domiciled in England, could be sued for in the Court of Session upon an arrestment juris. fund. causâ, or whether the action should not have been raised, in the first instance, before the Sheriff. The latter section of the statute enacts, that the Sheriffs shall, within their respective Sheriffdoms, hold and exercise original jurisdiction in all maritime causes and proceedings, civil and criminal, including such as may apply to persons residing furth of Scotland, of the same nature as that previously exercised by the High Court of Admiralty. To remove any doubts as to the meaning of this provision, it is enacted by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 21, that the act 1 Will. IV., c. 69, shall be construed and held to mean, that the powers and jurisdictions formerly competent to the High Court of Admiralty in Scotland, in all maritime causes civil and criminal, shall be competent to Sheriffs, provided the defender shall, upon any legal ground of jurisdiction, be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff before whom such cause may be tried; and provided also, that it shall not be competent to the Sheriff to try any crime committed on the seas, which it would not be competent for him to try if committed on land. See on the subject of this article, in so far as historically interesting, Stair, ii. tit. 2, § 5; and iv. tit. 1, § 37; Ersk. i. tit. 3, § 33; Bank. vol. ii. p. 538, § 1, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 497, et seq. 540, 596; *Kames' Stat. Admiralty Courts in England; are courts having jurisdiction in maritime causes, whether civil or criminal. In England, the Court of Admiralty is held before the Lord High Admiral, or his deputy, who is called the Judge of the Court. When there was a Lord High Admiral, the Judge of the Admiralty usually held his place by patent from him; but, when the office is executed by commissioners, the Judge holds his place by direct commission from the Crown under the Great Seal. The Court of Admiralty is twofold: 1st, The Instance Court, which has civil jurisdiction generally in marine contracts, and other questions of maritime right, such as disputes amongst part-owners of vessels, and questions relating to salvage, collision of ships, and the like. In criminal matters, this court, partly by common law, and partly under several statutes, takes cognisance of piracy, and other offences on the sea, or on the coasts beyond the limits of any county; and concurrently with the common law courts, as to certain felonies committed in the main stream of great rivers below the bridges. 2dly, The Prize Court, which has exclusive jurisdiction in all matters, civil and criminal, relating to prize of war; i.e. all acquisitions made, whether at sea or on land, by a naval force.

The trial of offences committed within the Admiralty jurisdiction has been further regulated by 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 36, and 7 and 8 Vict., c. 2. By the former statute the Judge of the Admiralty is made one of the Judges of the Central Criminal Court, and that court is authorized to try offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty; and by the latter any courts of assize, oyer and terminer, or gaol-delivery, may inquire of and determine such offences, without any special commission. The civil jurisdiction of the Admiralty Courts was greatly extended, and their practice improved, by the statute 3 and 4 Vict., c. 65, which effected almost an entire reconstruction of these courts. Additional regulations were made by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 26. An appeal lies in the last resort from the Admiralty Courts to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. See Stephen's Commentaries, iv. p. 20, 367; Comyn's Dig., voce Admiralty.

Admission to a Church; is an act of the presbytery of the bounds, admitting a minister to his church; or, as the law expresses it, collating him to his benefice. This act proceeds upon the presentation of the patron; or, should he delay to present beyond six months after a vacancy, the title to present belongs to the presbytery, in virtue of the jus devolutum which they enjoy. See Minister. Call.

Admissions. In the practice of jury trial, the admissions in point of fact, made by the parties respectively, are subject to the following regulations: 1. The parties may, after the record has been completed, by mutual admissions put upon record and subscribed by counsel, render any trial of facts unnecessary, leaving the law for the court; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 33. 2. The admissions prefixed to the issues are useful in narrowing and simplifying the questions for trial; but, although the Court expressed an opinion that this practice was expedient, they did not absolutely decide in the case in which the question was raised, that a party could be compelled to allow the facts admitted by him on the record to be set down as prefatory admissions to the issues; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 71. In practice, however, prefixed admissions are never inserted except with consent of both parties; Macfarlane's Notes on Issues, p. 23. 3. When parties are disposed to make admissions in regard to matters of fact, or to admit the authenticity of writings, a note of the admissions is made in writing, signed by the counsel or agent, and lodged in process. Such admissions are certified by the clerk, and may be used and read in evidence at the trial, if otherwise competent. This is usually matter of arrangement before the trial; and, in practice, is very useful, by saving the expense and trouble of adducing witnesses to prove facts, as to which there can be no serious doubt; A.S. 16th Feb. 1841, § 22; Macfarlane, p. 86. And 4. The judicial admissions of a party, made in the closed record, may be put in, and founded on as conclusive evidence at the trial; although loose argumentative pleadings are in this respect viewed differently, and are not held admissible as conclusive evidence of fact. Where admissions have been retracted, or merely dropped out, in making up the record, they are not conclusive; but the fact of their having once been made is an element of proof in the case, to be taken into consideration along with the other facts; Bathgate, 7th March 1840, 2 D. 811; Lowe, 24th June 1843, 5 D. 1261. Equally conclusive with an express admission upon record is an implied admission, as where the averment of a fact falling within a party's knowledge has not been denied by him. Macfarlane, p. 213; Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, § 6; Shaw's Digest, p. 1064; vol. iii. p. 370; Shand's Prac. p. 288; Dickson on Evidence, p. 701; M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Prac. p. 227.

Adoption. By the Roman law, one who had no children of his own might adopt the child or children of another, whether related to him or not. The ceremony by which this was accomplished was called adoption; and its legal effect was, that the adopted child, after having been emancipated, or taken from under the patria potestas of his natural father, was received under the patria potestas of the adopter. When the adopted person was already under the patria potestas, it was proper adoption. If he was sui juris, it was termed arrogation; but adoption, as a generic term, applies to both. The adopted son possessed the same right of succession to his adopter, which a child born in wedlock would have enjoyed. Adoption is not recognised in the law of Scotland, although, where one wishes to confer on another the patrimonial advantages of inheritance, he may attain his object by conveying his property, whether heritable or moveable, to the party favoured; and that, either mortis causa, or by a deed inter vivos, reserving his own liferent; and subject, of course, to the legal rights of the granter's heirs-at-law, which are to a certain extent indefeasible. Stair, iii. tit. 4, § 34; Bank. vol. i. p. 19, § 42. See also Deathbed. Legitim. Patria Potestas. Emancipation.

Adpromissors, or Cautioners. In the Roman law, the cautionary engagement was undertaken by a separate act from that by which the principal obligant was taken bound; he was therefore termed adpromissor. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 61; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 240.

Ad Quod Damnum; in English law, is a writ directed to the Sheriff, to inquire whether a grant intended to be made by the King will be to his damage or that of others. It ought to be issued before the King grants certain liberties, as a fair, market, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Adscripti, vel Adscriptitii Glebæ, among the Romans; were a kind of slaves perpetually attached to, and transferred along with the land which they cultivated. Their situation was very similar to that of the workmen employed in collieries and salt-works in Scotland, before the passing of the stat. 15 Geo. III. c. 28. Ivory's Ersk. p. 208; Stair, i. 2, 11. See Colliers and Salters.

Adultery; is the sin of incontinence in a married person. The older law of Scotland made a distinction between simple and notour adultery; notour being where issue is procreated between the adulterers; or where they live openly together at bed and board; or where they give scandal to the church, and have been excommunicated—simple, being the act unaccompanied by any of those aggravations. By 1551, c. 20, notour adultery is punishable by escheat of moveables; and by 1563, c. 74, it is made a capital offence. Both of these statutes are now in desuetude, although the records of the Court of Justiciary show that capital punishment was, in former times, frequently inflicted for this crime. The punishment of simple adultery was, in those times, arbitrary. Now, the offence is not prosecuted as a crime, but may be the ground of an action of divorce, and also of a civil action of damages, although that species of reparation for this injury seems to have been unknown in the law of Scotland, until a comparatively recent period. By 1600, c. 20, a marriage between a person divorced on the ground of adultery, and the person with whom the adultery is judicially declared to have been committed, is declared null and unlawful, and the issue of such marriage incapacitated to succeed to their parents. But this statute appears to be also now in desuetude, and, except in one instance, was never enforced. It has been maintained, however, that this statute is not in desuetude; Fraser's Domestic Relations, i. p. 84. See on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 4, §§ 7 and 18; More's Notes, pp. xxvii. xxxix.; Bank, vol. i. p. 132, et seq.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 43; Hume, i. 449, et seq.; Bell's Prin. §§ 1526, 1531, 1621; Watson's Statute Law, h. t.; Brown's Synop. h. t. and p. 2132; Shaw's Digest, pp. 588, 1170, and vol. iii. p. 214; Kames' Equity (1825), 312. See Divorce.

Advent; a time embracing about four weeks preceding Christmas, or the nativity of our Saviour. It begins on the Sunday falling on St Andrew's day (30th November), or next to it. In former times, this was held as a season of great sanctity, and many secular duties were laid aside. It was also one of the periods during which, in England, the solemnization of marriage, except by special license, was prohibited. Tomlins, h. t.

Adventure. See Joint Adventure.

Advertisement; generally applied to a notice published in the newspapers, or by handbills or placards. Advertisements may have important legal effects in many different ways; either as notifying the terms on which parties are willing to treat; or describing the subject of sale, location, &c.; or, as of the nature of offers to be completed by acceptance on the part of those who choose to avail themselves of the terms. Public notifications of this kind are also necessary under various statutes, as preliminary to the exercise of statutory rights, or as qualifications for statutory privileges or immunities; e. g. under road and bridge acts, the bankrupt statutes, and many others. In the case of public carriers, advertisements are distinctly of the nature of offers, which will bind the carrier to those who send goods, in terms of the advertisement. In like manner, an advertisement of a general ship for a particular voyage places the master on the footing of a public carrier, ready to receive goods for the port to which the vessel is advertised to sail. Such an advertisement entitles a merchant to bring his goods to the vessel, and to insist on their being received, unless the ship be already full, or the entire freight engaged. In this case also, the advertisement, and the shipping of the goods in reference thereto, completes the contract of affreightment between the owners and the shippers. Bell's Com. i. p. 541, 5th edit. See Charter-Party. Carrier. Private Bill.

Ad Vitam aut Culpam. An office is said to be held ad vitam aut culpam, when the tenure of the possessor is determinable only by his death or delinquency; or, in other words, which is held quamdiu se bene gesserit. See 28 Geo. II., c. 7, on Scotch Jurisdiction.

Advocate; the patron of a cause, who assists his client with advice, and who pleads for him. In Scotland, the barristers practising before the Supreme Court are called Advocates; and the same description is taken by the procurators or solicitors before the inferior courts in Aberdeen. The Faculty or Society of Advocates in Edinburgh is coeval with the institution of the College of Justice (A.D. 1532); and the profession of an advocate was known much earlier, provision being made, in the stat. 1424, c. 45, for securing the assistance of advocates for the poor. At the institution of the College of Justice the number of advocates was limited to ten; but there is now no limit; the number on the rolls of the Faculty being about 425, although the number of practising lawyers does not exceed 120. Before being admitted a member of the Faculty, it is necessary to undergo certain probationary trials. With that view the applicant for admission presents a petition to the Court, stating his wish to become an advocate, and intimating his readiness to undergo a trial of his skill. This application is remitted by the Court to the Dean of the Faculty, who disposes thereof by remitting the applicant to the private examiners, being six members of Faculty, nominated by him to discharge that duty, to make trial of his fitness. The candidate, having produced evidence that he is 20 years of age, and that he has paid the usual fees, is taken on trial, and examined, in the first place, upon general scholarship. This examination is conducted by three or more persons of learning, as assessors to the examiners, who report upon the candidate's qualifications. The subjects of examination are—1. Latin; 2. Greek, or (in the intransit's option) any two of the following languages, viz., French, German, Italian, Spanish; 3. Ethical and Metaphysical Philosophy; 4. Logic, or (in the intransit's option) Mathematics.—A list of the books on which the examination is made, is published by the examiners. Every intransit, however, is, without examination, deemed duly qualified in general scholarship, if he produce evidence that he is a Master of Arts of any of the Scottish universities, or a Bachelor of Arts or of Civil Law of Oxford, or a Bachelor of Arts of Cambridge, Dublin, or Durham, or a Master of Arts of the University of London, or of the Queen's University of Ireland, or a Bachelor of Laws of the University of London, or that he has attained such degree of a foreign university, as in the opinion of the Dean and his council, affords evidence of the same amount of scholarship as that afforded by the degree of Master of Arts of a Scottish university. If the intrant has been found qualified in general scholarship, it is competent for him, after the expiry of a year, to go in for his private examination on law. The examiners, however, cannot take him on trial if, during the year before such examination, he have been engaged (without the sanction of the Dean and his council) in any trade, business, or profession, either on his own account, or as assistant to, or in the employment of, another. It is also a necessary preliminary to this examination that the intrant produce evidence of—1. Attendance during at least one session at a class of Civil Law in a Scottish or other university; 2. Attendance in a different year, and during at least one session, at a class of Scots Law in a Scottish university; 3. Attendance during either of these two years, or during another year, at the class of Conveyancing in a Scottish university; or a second session's attendance at a class of Civil Law, or the class of Scots Law; 4. Attendance at any time on a course of lectures on Medical Jurisprudence. In conducting the law examination the examiners are assisted by one or more of the Law Professors of the University of Edinburgh. The examination is upon the Institutes of Justinian, with such commentary as has been appointed by the examiners for this purpose; and upon the title of the Pandects, De diversis regulis juris antiqui, also with a commentary. If the Civil Law trials are approved of, the intrant is forthwith examined in the Law of Scotland upon such books as have been previously fixed and announced by the examiners. The private examinations may take place in vacation. On receiving the certificates of the private examiners, the Dean assigns a title of the Pandects to the intrant for the subject of his thesis, which he is appointed to lodge on a particular day, the Saturday following that day being named for the diet of his public examination. The thesis, if approved of, receives the Impugnatur of two of the examiners, and is, thereafter, publicly defended by the intrant before the Faculty. If the defence be satisfactory, the question of the intrant's admission is decided by the Faculty, voting by ballot. The Dean then reports him qualified, and the Court admits him to the privileges, on his taking the usual oaths.

An advocate thus admitted is entitled to plead in every court in Scotland, civil, ecclesiastical, or criminal, superior or inferior, unless when debarred by special statute (as in the small-debt acts); and also before the House of Lords. Advocates are answerable for their official conduct to the Court of Session. Though a party may manage his own cause in the Court of Session, so far as oral pleading is concerned, yet every paper in process must be signed by an advocate, A. S. 5th March 1789. There is an exception, however, to this rule in the case of defences; Davidson, 29th June 1848, 10 D. 1457, and 11 D. 703. The mere appearance of an advocate in Court presumes a mandate, where the party is within Scotland. An advocate is entitled, without special mandate, to refer the matter in dispute to oath; to submit the case to a referee, 11 S. 548; to throw up the case at the trial, even against his client's wish; 9 D. 308. See also 12 S. 401; and Cowan, 4th March 1836, 14 S. 634, as to the presumption of mandate employed in the appearance of counsel. A party represented by counsel is liable for expenses, though he never authorized the suit; but he has relief against those who used his name without authority; Thomson, 25th May 1855, 17 D. 774.

The library of the Faculty of Advocates, founded in the year 1682 by Sir George Mackenzie, is the most valuable library in Scotland, consisting of about 160,000 volumes, besides manuscripts. It is one of the libraries entitled to a copy of every published book, 5 & 6 Vict., c. 45, § 8. There is also a statutory widows' fund belonging to this body. The Supreme Judges in Scotland are now invariably selected from the Faculty, as well as the Sheriffs-Depute of the several counties. The fees of admission, stamp for commission, &c., amount to about £336. The Faculty of Advocates has been, from time immemorial, considered as an incorporation, although no charter of incorporation now exists. The Faculty of Advocates are also members of the College of Justice, and as such entitled to its privileges. See as to the probationary trials of advocates, A. S. 28th Feb. 1750, and the regulations of 9th Dec. 1854; see also Ivory's Form of Process, vol. i. p. 58, et seq.; Beveridge's Form of Process, vol. i. p. 38, et seq.; Shand's Practice, vol. i. p. 73, et seq.; Stair, B. i. tit. 12, § 12, and iv. 43, 9; More's Notes, p. cxxvi. cccxv. and ccclxxiii; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 33, and note by Ivory, B. iv. tit. 2, § 25; Bank. vol. ii. p. 484, § 1, et seq.; *Kames' Stat. Advocates' First Clerks. The members of the Faculty of Advocates had formerly the privilege of nominating their first clerks to act as agents of Court. This privilege was abolished by A. S. 4th December 1850. See Solicitors before the Supreme Court.

Advocate, Lord, or King's (Queen's) Advocate. The Lord Advocate is the principal Crown lawyer in Scotland, and one of the great Officers of State of Scotland. Prior to the Union he sat in Parliament ex officio, without election. He is appointed by the Crown, and his duty is to act as public prosecutor, and to plead in all causes in which the Crown is interested, particularly in criminal cases. Originally it would seem that the Lord Advocate had no power to institute criminal proceedings, except at the instance of the injured party; but for the last three hundred years the Lord Advocate has been vested with a discretionary power in the prosecution for crimes, so far as regards the public interest. At the same time, when a private party has been injured, and when the Lord Advocate declines to prosecute, the private party, with the Lord Advocate's concurrence (which is essential and is granted as a matter of course), may prosecute, not only for reparation of the individual injury, but ad vindictam publicam. The Lord Advocate's powers are very extensive. He may issue warrants for arrestment and imprisonment in any part of Scotland; and he possesses other powers, which are purely discretionary, and not very well defined. In the law courts, he is entitled to plead within the bar, and, if so inclined, to plead with his hat on; although that is an exhibition now in desuetude. The Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General are the only members of the Scotch bar who have seats within the bar, and the distinction of silk gowns; and both of these officers, in addition to their official duties, accept of ordinary bar practice. In the discharge of his duties as public prosecutor the Lord Advocate has the aid of the Solicitor-General, and of four junior barristers appointed by the Lord Advocate, and called Advocates-Depute. Since the Union the Lord Advocate has usually been returned to Parliament, generally by one of the Scotch constituencies; and in Parliament, as first law officer of the Crown for Scotland, he is presumed to be able to answer inquiries concerning Scotch matters, and expected to take the superintendence of the legislation for that portion of the kingdom. The Lord Advocate cannot be constrained to pursue. He is master of his instance also to this effect, that, after he has brought his libel into Court, he may pass from, or restrict, the charge, or restrict the pains to an arbitrary punishment even after a verdict has been returned. He cannot, like a private prosecutor, be called upon to find caution for insisting in the prosecution, or to give the oath of calumny. In the case of a verdict of acquittal, costs cannot be awarded against him, as they may against a procurator fiscal who has been guilty of gross irregularity; see Prentice v. Newbigging, 19th June 1843, 1 Brown, 561. Prosecutions at the instance of the Lord Advocate do not fall by his death or removal from office. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 2 ; Hume, i. 9, ii. 118 ; and Bell's Notes, 164, 134; Kames' Stat. Law, voce King's Advocate. See Concourse. Criminal Prosecution. Commitment for Trial. Bail.

Advocates-Depute are four advocates appointed by the Lord Advocate to aid him in the discharge of his duties as public prosecutor. Their duty is to consider preconcognitions sent to them by the Crown agent; to determine whether there is sufficient matter for an indictment; and if so, to prepare the indictment or criminal letters. The advocates-depute attend and assist, generally as juniors, at trials before the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh; the Lord Advocate, or the Solicitor-General, leading. One of the depute advocates attends as sole public prosecutor at each of the circuits of the Court of Justiciary; and at these circuits the depute exercises all the discretionary powers of the Lord Advocate as to bringing on the trial, abandoning or restricting the libel, and so forth. It is generally understood that the senior depute advocate attends to the trials before the High Court, and that the other three attend at the Circuit Courts of Justiciary. There is an advocate-depute also for conducting prosecutions of importance before the Sheriff Courts; and, since two separate court-rooms have been authorized at the Glasgow Circuit (11 and 12 Vict., c. 79), he has officiated as supernumerary-depute in one of these courts. The salary of each of the four depute advocates is about £500 per annum. This appointment is not incompatible with ordinary bar practice. See Criminal Prosecution. Circuit. Advocate, Lord.

Advocation is a form of process, the object of which is to remove a cause from an inferior to the Supreme Court, in order that a judgment pronounced in the inferior court may be reviewed, or that the future procedure in the cause may be conducted in the Court of Session. Before the statute of 1838, all advocations originated by presenting in the Bill-Chamber a bill of advocation, which, on being passed, became the warrant for letters of advocation. Now, advocations, with the exception of those of final judgments and of petitions for service, still originate in the Bill-Chamber; but letters of advocacy are abolished, and written notes of advocacy, prepared in terms of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, and relative A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, have come in place of the former bills and letters.

Advocation of final judgments.—A “final judgment” is one whereby the whole merits of the cause are disposed of, although no decision or decerniture has been pronounced as to expenses; A. S. 11th July 1827, § 1; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 24. But a mere finding that damages are due, or laying the foundation for a final decree, or ascertaining certain principles without applying them, is not enough; Cameron, 29th June 1837; 15 S. 1220. If a judgment is extractable, it is competent to advocate; but the whole merits of the cause, as against all the parties called, must be exhausted, whatever be the grounds upon which the final judgment may have proceeded; and if the action has been conjoined with another which is not exhausted, the conjoined action must be either exhausted also, or disjoined, before advocacy is competent. Moreover, it must appear ex facie of the interlocutor, that the conclusions of the summons have been exhausted, and that no conclusion has been left undisposed of; so, where there are several conclusions, and decree has been pronounced relative to some of them, there must be absolviter or other judgment pronounced as to the rest, before the advocacy be presented. See Shand's Prac., i. 453; Barclay's Sher. Court Prac., 449. See also Macfie, 15th June 1850, 12 D. 1033, in which the judgment of a sheriff was held to be, as to one matter, final and capable of being advocated, and interlocutory as to another matter.

A party about to advocate must intimate his intention in writing to the clerk of the inferior court, and lodge, at the same time, a bond of caution for the expenses already incurred, and which may be incurred, in the Court of Session. Where a party is unable to find a sufficient cautioner, he may advocate on juratory caution. (See Juratory Caution.) Intimation must be made, and caution found, before extract; and fifteen days in the ordinary case, and thirty days in causes before the courts of Orkney and Shetland, are allowed, after final judgment, for presenting a note of advocacy. Extract is incompetent after such intimation, until the lapse of these periods. Thereafter, extract may be given out, unless a sist, or a note of advocacy, has been intimated, advocacy being competent at any time before decree has actually been extracted, on caution being found in common form; A. S. 10th July 1839, §§ 114, 119. The first section of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, enacts, that final judgments of inferior courts may be brought under review of the Court of Session by lodging a written note of advocacy with one of the depute-clerks of session, or his assistant. The note must be signed by an agent in the Court of Session, and have prefixed the interlocutors complained of, and judge's notes, and it must set forth in a prayer the remedy craved. Forms of notes of advocacy are subjoined to the A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, which also contains minute regulations for carrying out the enactments of the statute. The note is received and marked by the clerk, on caution being certified by the clerk of the inferior court to have been found. Certified notice of the receipt of the note being transmitted to the clerk of the inferior court puts a stop to all further proceedings in the original cause, and the process must be forthwith transmitted to the Court of Session. The regulations as to the transmission of the process from the inferior to the Supreme Courts are contained in A. S. 17th January 1797. When advocations are called, the inferior court process must be produced along with the note. The note of advocacy and certified notice must be intimated to the opposite party, and within fifteen days after the date of such intimation it is competent to call, and thereafter to enrol, the cause; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, § 1; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, § 11; A. S. 10th July 1839, §§ 127, 128.

As a general rule, advocacy is competent unless it be debarred either by statute or by confirmed practice. It is not competent (1.) in actions for payment of ministers' stipend, or the rents of their benefices; 1695, c. 27; or (2.) in actions founded on the statutes against profanity and immorality; 1696, c. 31. (3.) By 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 22, it is incompetent to advocate, or bring under review in any other manner of way, any cause not exceeding the value of £25. Formerly, this prohibition was directed against the advocacy of actions for sums under £12 only. Where the sum originally concluded for is under £25, but the amount of that sum with the interest accruing during the litigation exceeds £25 at the date of the judgment sought to be advocated, advocacy is competent; Mitchell, 10th March 1855, 17 D. 682. The expenses, however, decerned for in the inferior court do not enter into consideration in estimating the value of the cause, of which they do not, in any correct sense, form part of the subject-matter; Hopkirk, 21st Dec. 1855, 18 D. 300. If the libel in the inferior court concludes for more than £25, advocacy is competent, though decree has been pronounced for a less sum. It is also competent, where the value of the subject in dispute is uncertain, e.g., where it is a moveable, or where a right or principle is involved. (4.) The judgment of an inferior court ordaining a tenant to remove cannot be advocated, suspension being the remedy; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 44; although, where the tenant has been assoilzied from the removing, advocacy is competent; Beveridge on Bill-Chamber, 57. The judgments and orders pronounced by sheriffs in summary removing, brought in terms of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, are also final, and not subject to appeal or advocacy. (5.) Advocacy is made incompetent in a variety of actions limited to particular courts by express statute, e.g., the small debt acts, road acts, &c. (6.) Under the former poor-law, the mode of bringing the determinations of kirk-sessions under review of the Court of Session was by advocacy. But, by 8 and 9 Vict., c. 83, § 74, any poor person who receives a certificate from the board of supervision to the effect that he has just ground of complaint that his allowance is inadequate, is entitled to sue his parish or combination in the Court of Session in forma pauperis. (7.) Advocations of interlocutory judgments were, until lately, regulated by 50 Geo. III., c. 112, before which it had been competent to present bills of advocacy at any stage of an inferior court process. By that statute, bills of advocacy could not be competently presented against interlocutory judgments, except on the grounds, 1st, of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction, personal objection to the judge, and privilege of party; 2d, of contingency; and, 3d, of legal objection with respect to the mode of proof, or with respect to some change of possession, or to an interim decree for partial payment, provided that, in the cases specified under the third head, leave was given by the inferior judge; §§ 36, 37. Bills or notes of advocacy under the first and second heads were passed without caution; in those under the third head caution was required. Advocations of interlocutory judgments are now regulated by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80.

Advocation of Interlocutory Judgments.—The last-mentioned statute enacts, in § 24, that it shall be incompetent to take to review any interlocutor, judgment, or decree of a sheriff, not being an interlocutor sisting process, or giving interim decree for payment of money, or disposing of the whole merits of the cause. The former statute, 50 Geo. III., c. 112, is repealed in so far as inconsistent with the latter enactment. This statute does not, however, strike at advocations under § 40 of the Judicature Act (see infra), or at those under 50 Geo. III., in which the object of the advocacy is, not the review of a judgment, but the general removal of the cause, e.g., on the ground of contingency; Harrington, 20th Jan. 1854, 16 D. 368. The same section of the statute (§ 24) provides, that, when any interlocutor is brought under review of the Court of Session, it is competent for that court also to review all the previous interlocutors pronounced in the cause.

An advocacy of an interlocutory judgment is brought by lodging in the Bill-Chamber a written note of advocacy, with an articulate statement of the reasons of advocacy, and a note of pleas in law, annexed. On caution being certified to have been found in the inferior court, the note is received and marked by the Bill-Chamber clerk, and forthwith laid before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, who pronounces the requisite order. If answers are ordered, they must be in similar form to the reasons of advocacy. If the note is passed, the cause may, after the expiry of fifteen days from the passing of the note, be called and thereafter enrolled; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, § 13. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary passing or refusing the note is final; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 45. If the procedure, however, have been irregular, the interlocutor may be brought under review; Walker, 5th July 1832, 10 S. 766. The presentment of the note in the Bill-Chamber must be certified in manner prescribed in A. S. 24th Dec. 1838, § 1. When the note is passed de plano, or without answers, intimation of the interlocutor passing it must be made both to the clerk of the inferior court and to the opposite party or his agent, and a certificate thereof returned to the Bill-Chamber, before the cause is transmitted to the Court of Session; ib. § 2. The caution for expenses in advocations of interlocutory judgments was formerly found in the Bill-Chamber; but now, in all advocations, whether of final or interlocutory judgments, it must be found in the inferior court; ibid. When the cautioner has become bankrupt during the dependence of the process, new caution cannot, as a matter of right, be insisted for; Brown, 14th July 1849; 21 Jurist, 539.

Advocation with a view to Jury trial.—In all cases originating in an inferior court, where the claim exceeds £40, as soon as an interlocutor or order has been pronounced allowing a proof, (unless where it is to lie in reletis, or is a mere diligence for the recovery of writings), either party, who may conceive that the case ought to be tried by jury, may remove the process into the Court of Session by note of advocacy, which is passed at once without discussion and without caution. If the parties, however, proceed to proof in the inferior court, they are held to have waived their right of appeal to the House of Lords against any judgment of the Court of Session finding or declaring the several facts established by the proof; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 40. Where the proof is taken in the inferior court, the Court of Session must, in reviewing the decision, and whether affirming or reversing it, specify distinctly in their judgment the facts material to the cause which they mean to decide, such judgment, in so far as relates to the facts, having the effect of the special verdict of a jury conclusively fixing the facts so specified; ib.; and see 17 D. 63, 6 Bell's Appeals, 394. The Court, however, notwithstanding the proof has been taken in the inferior court, have the power to send the case to a jury, either for the determination of the whole cause or of certain facts which they may consider not to have been satisfactorily proved; or they may remit the case with instructions back to the court below.

The note of advocation of an interlocutory judgment ordering a proof, where the claim exceeds £40, is similar to that in the case of a final judgment, although no caution is required. It contains no statement, and refers simply to the section of the statute; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 6; see form in schedule 2 to A. S., 24th Dec. 1838. But it must pass through the Bill-Chamber; Corry, 12th July, 1842, 4 D. 1514, the provision in § 10 of A. S., 1838, ordering the procedure in this class of cases to be the same as in advocations of final judgments, not being sufficient to dispense with the statutory direction of the Judicature Act. If the claim is not simply pecuniary, so as to show that it is in value above £40, the party wishing to advocate must apply by petition (duly intimated to the opposite party) to the inferior judge for leave, and, if required by the judge, he must make a solemn judicial declaration that the claim is of the true value of £40 and upwards; and leave being granted and proved by a certificate to that effect from the clerk of Court, the note of advocation may be presented; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 5. After the date of the interlocutor allowing a proof, neither party can proceed to proof before the expiry of fifteen free days (thirty for Orkney and Shetland), in order to give time for an advocation; but, unless the passing of the note be intimated within said periods, the proof will proceed, and advocation become incompetent. Of consent it may be taken without any delay; A. S. 10th July 1839, § 126.

An order upon a party to undergo a judicial examination is not a proof within the meaning of the statute; Turner, 11th Feb. 1826, 4 S. 449. So also, an interlocutor before answer, allowing a proof scripto vel juramento, has not been held sufficient to warrant an advocation under this section, the Court holding that the proof contemplated by the statute was a proof at large, or prout de jure; Hamilton, 10th June 1837, 15 S. 1105. On the other hand, where such an advocation has been competently brought, the Court have not held it imperative upon them to remit the case to a jury; Sands, 20th Jan. 1829, 7 S. 290; Baird, 9th June 1830, 8 S. 893. In the latter case, it was laid down from the Bench, that the Court might, if they saw cause, allow a proof without a jury, but that, unless they named the sheriff as a commissioner to lead the proof, they could not remit to him. Where, in a case before a Dean of Guild Court, a remit had been made to tradesmen, and was followed by their report and judicial examination, and subsequently a proof at large had been allowed, advocation under § 40 of the statute was held incompetent, on the ground that a party, after allowing a fraction of proof to be taken, is not entitled to come forward and insist for a jury trial; Tulloch, 10th March 1838, 16 S. 983. See Macfarlane's Jury Practice, pp. 20, 35.

By the Service of Heirs Act, 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, § 17, it is made competent, in cases in which there are competing petitions conjoined, or in which any person has appeared to oppose a petition, for any of the parties, at any time before the proof is begun to be taken, to present a note of advocation, praying the Court to advocate the proceedings, in order that the case may be tried by jury. This note is to be proceeded with in like manner as notes of advocation under § 40 of the Judicature Act. If it appear proper that the case be tried by jury, the proceedings are to be in the usual form. A record may be ordered to be made up in the Court of Session, at least where there has been no closed record in the Sheriff Court; Livingstone, 25th Nov. 1853, 16 D. 104. Where a verdict has been found in favour of a petitioner, the Court must, at the same time with applying such verdict, remit to the Sheriff with instructions to pronounce decree of service.

Advocation of Brieves and Petitions for Service of Heirs.—All questions originating in brieves for services must be brought in the first instance before the inferior judge, to whom the brieve is directed. Where any difficulty occurred, or injustice had been done, in the course of the proceedings, it was, under the old practice, by an advocation of brieves to the macers that the remedy was sought. In the service of an heir, in certain cases, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills was in use also to authorize commission to be granted to the macers in the first instance, and the brieves to be directed to them as sheriffs in that part. This was also sometimes done in brieves of cognition; Beveridge on Bill-Chamber, 59. By 1 & 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, the macer's jurisdiction was abolished; and such special commissions were subsequently granted, and brieves issued, to the Sheriff of Edinburgh. That act provided, that in all cases of competition of brieves, or where a party claimed right to oppose a service, either party might apply for and obtain advocacy of the brieves to the Court of Session, either from an inferior judge, or from the Sheriff of Edinburgh acting under special commission. The provisions of 50 Geo. III., c. 112 (see supra), have been held not to apply to these advocations, a brieve being competently advocated before any procedure under it. By 1 & 2 Vict., c. 86, § 2, it was enacted, that, in competitions of brieves, as well as where a party claiming right to appear and oppose a service had made appearance, it should be lawful to any party to remove the cause to the Court of Session by written note of advocacy, to be laid before a Lord Ordinary named therein, who should advocate the brieve, and be judge in the service. By 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, the old mode of procedure in the service of heirs was entirely altered. That statute abolished the use of brieves in such cases, instituting in their stead the petition for service, directed either to a new officer, called the Sheriff of Chancery, or to the Sheriff of the county within which the deceased had his domicile, or the lands are situated. It enacts in § 18, that, where the Sheriff has refused to serve a petitioner, or dismissed his petition, or repelled the objection of an opposing party, it shall be lawful to bring the judgment under review by note of advocacy. It must be presented fifteen, or, in the case of Orkney and Shetland, thirty, days from the date of the judgment; and if the judgment was pronounced after opposition duly entered, or in competition, the note must be intimated to the opposite party, and a bond of caution lodged with the Sheriff Clerk; ibid. The procedure is the same as in advocations of final judgments. The Court may order additional evidence, or remit to the Sheriff to take it, or appoint the case to be tried by jury. When the petitioner succeeds in his advocacy, the Court is required to remit back to the Sheriff to pronounce a decree of service. Where no appearance has been made before the Sheriff, a decree of service can only be challenged by reduction; ibid. See Jurid. Styles, i. 298. See also supra, Advocation with a view to Jury Trial, in fine; Shand's Prac. 480; Barclay's Sheriff Court Practice, 461; Ersk. vii. tit. 8, § 60, et seq.; More's Notes on Stair, cccxxvi.

All notes of advocations not specially provided for in 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, must be presented in the Bill-Chamber, and have a statement of facts annexed. The procedure therein, after passing the note, is the same as in advocations of interlocutory judgments; § 6.

As to the procedure in Advocations after calling and enrolment in the weekly printed roll.—In advocacy of final judgments, where the record has been made up in the inferior court, and is not objected to, it is held to be in point of fact the record in the Court of Session, and as such, along with additional pleas in law, which it is competent for the parties to lodge, is declared to be closed. If it be alleged that the record has been improperly completed in the court below, this must be distinctly pleaded, and the Lord Ordinary may order a new record to be made up; see A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 25, 49. After the record has been closed, the Lord Ordinary, if it appear that it has been improperly made up in the inferior court, may open it up, and order a new record, or remit to the inferior judge, with instructions to that effect; ibid., § 52. In advocations other than those of final judgments, the reasons of advocacy and answers are ordered to be revised, if the advocator is not ready to close, or condescendence and answers may be ordered, and the cause thereafter proceeds as in ordinary actions, in terms of the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, §§ 3, 4, 6; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 9. Such is the earlier and the general mode of procedure; but, by recent enactments, advocations may, after enrolment, take a different course:—(1.) In an advocacy where the record has been closed and proof led in the inferior court, the Lord Ordinary before whom it is enrolled may, at the first calling, if moved to that effect, report the case to the Inner House, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 32. An oath on reference is not "a proof" within the meaning of this section; Siday, 28th January 1851, 13 D. 543. If the case be not so removed, the advocacy must run its course before the Lord Ordinary, his decision being reviewable in the Inner House. The same statute gives in all advocations, except in the case of counter conjoined processes, or of competitions, or advocations of brieves, to the pursuer or petitioner in the inferior court the privilege of fixing the Lord Ordinary and Division of the Court to whom the process shall belong. This must be done not later than the twelfth day from the date of the intimation of the note, and notice of its receipt by a clerk of the Court of Session, to the respondent, or not later than the twelfth day from the date of the passing of the note, § 33. (2.) The privilege conferred upon advocations after concluded proof has been extended to all advocations, so that either party may, at the first calling, move for the removal of the case to the Inner House by report, 16 and 17 Vict., c. 86, § 25, as explained in Balfour, 27th January 1854, 16 D. 413. (3.) Upon any advection being brought before a Lord Ordinary, the parties have it in their power to enter into a judicial contract, whereby they consent to his judgment being final, and not subject to review. But the express consent of both parties is necessary for this, otherwise the case proceeds in common form, 16 and 17 Vict., c. 86, § 25, as explained in Balfour supra.

Where the judgment of the inferior court is affirmed, the form of the ultimate interlocutor is to "remit simpliciter" to the inferior judge, with a finding and decerniture for expenses. Where the judgment is altered, an interlocutor is pronounced, advocating the cause, and altering or varying the judgment, as the justice of the case may require; or a remit may be made with instructions without advocating the cause. It is always competent to find the advocator entitled to the expenses incurred, not only in the Supreme, but also in the inferior court.

In advocations of interlocutors pronounced by sheriffs, it is competent to the inferior judge, on the application of either party, and having due regard to the eventual issue of the cause, to pronounce an order regulating the interim possession. This order is not subject to review, except by the Lord Ordinary or the Court, in the course of discussing the advection; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 42; A. S. 11th July 1839, § 130.

In Mutrie v. Lowe, 23d May 1844, 6 D. 1045, the question was discussed, whether an advection brings up the whole cause to the effect of allowing a respondent, without any counter advection, to renew pleas which had been unsuccessful in the court below. In that case, a party who had gained his cause, but without expenses, presented, with the view of obtaining his expenses, a note of advection, having prefixed the whole interlocutors in the cause. No counter note of advection was presented by the unsuccessful party, who, however, in a reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary (which had advocated the cause), craved that the prayer of his original petition in the Sheriff Court should be granted. The opinions of the whole Judges were taken, and it was held that, to enable a respondent to obtain a review of pleas unsuccessfully maintained by him in the inferior court, a counter advoca-

tion at his instance was necessary. This rule, however, was held to apply only where a substantive review was brought, and not in the matter merely of expenses. Accordingly, after consulting all the Judges, it was decided in Murdoch v. Brown, 8th March 1832, 10 S. 445, that, though a sheriff had found no expenses due, and the party unsuccessful on the merits had brought an advection, but there was no counter advection as to expenses, it was nevertheless competent to award the expenses in the Sheriff Court in favour of the respondents. It is enacted by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 24, that when any interlocutor of an inferior judge is brought under review of the Court of Session, it is competent for that Court also to review all the previous interlocutors pronounced in the cause. Affiance; the plighting of troth between a man and a woman upon an agreement of marriage. Tomlins, h. t.

Affidatio; used in the Regiam Majestatem to signify mutual faith and obligation to fidelity, as between husband and wife, superior and vassal, and the like. Skene, h. t.

Affidavit; an oath in writing, or a declaration to the truth of which an oath is sworn before a person legally authorized to administer an oath. In England, affidavits are necessary in a variety of cases, in order to bring facts under the cognizance of courts of justice. Where evidence in England is to be acted on by juries, it is given by oral testimony; where it is to inform a court or judge, it is usually reduced to the form of an affidavit. In point of form, an English affidavit, if in a depending suit, sets out with the names of the parties. The name and description of the party making the affidavit are then written at length, and he signs it at the foot; and the paper being shown to him, he is requested to swear to his name and handwriting, and that the contents of the paper are true. The affidavit closes with the Jurat, specifying the officer before whom, and where, and when, the affidavit was sworn. This is signed by the officer or magistrate. If the affidavit be sworn in open court, that circumstance is mentioned in the jurat, and no officer is named. In Scotland, voluntary affidavits are not, generally speaking, admissible as evidence, or at all countenanced, because they are emitted ex parte, and there is no opportunity for cross-examination; but to this rule there are exceptions; e. g., the Bankrupt Statute requires claimants to lodge their claims with affidavits, or oaths of verity. Such affidavit, when not framed according to statute, may be rectified, but the amendment must have the sanction of an oath; Gibson, 17th Dec. 1853; 16 D. 233. So also, according to the form of process in jury trial, certain motions for delaying the trial, examining old or absent witnesses, and the like, can only be made on affidavit by the agent for the party as to the truth of the facts on which the application rests; A. S. 10th Feb. 1841, §§ 17, 25. In applications also under the Entail Amendment Act, 11 and 12 Vict., c. 36, § 6, a petitioner must lodge an affidavit as to the debts affecting the estate, technical objections to which affidavit are obviated by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 94, § 1. In like manner, at common law, an affidavit is required in applications for meditatio fugæ warrants. Many other instances might be given, such, for example, as the affidavits required from half-pay naval and military officers: as to all which it may be observed generally, that such affidavits are what are called matters of voluntary jurisdiction, and consequently the magistrate administering the oath may do so beyond the limits of his territorial jurisdiction. Nay, it has been held that a Scotch justice may take an affidavit under the Entail Amendment Act in England, or in any part of Her Majesty's dominions within the jurisdiction of the Great Seal; Kerr, 12th June 1852, 1 Macqueen, 736. The statute, 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 62, was passed to check the unnecessary use of oaths and affidavits. Among other cases to which this act does not apply, are oaths or affidavits in judicial proceedings; and, by a subsequent statute, 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 43, it was further declared not to extend to ratifications by married women. By 6 and 7 Vict., c. 82, the Lord Chancellor of England is empowered to grant commissions for taking affidavits, affirmations, and declarations, in Scotland, and persons wilfully swearing falsely in any affidavit, &c., so taken, are liable in the penalties of perjury. See Barclay's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Hume on Crimes, p. 370; Bell's Notes, pp. 95, 97; Dickson on Evidence, p. 54; Tomlins, h. t., &c. Affinity; is the relationship arising from marriage between the husband and the blood relations of the wife, and between the wife and the blood relations of the husband. Thus, the relations of the husband stand in the same degree of affinity to the wife in which they are related to the husband by consanguinity. But there is no affinity between the kinsmen themselves. Thus, the husband's brother and the wife's sister have no affinity. That species of connection has received the name of affinitas affinitatis, a term borrowed from the Roman law; and is not by our law an impediment to marriage in any circumstances, although it was so by the Roman law, when the parties were in the direct line. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 15; Mr More's Notes, p. xv. and cccxlvi.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, §§ 8 and 9; Bank. vol. i. pp. 118 and 133; vol. ii. p. 646; Bell's Princ. § 1527; *Hutch. Affirmanti Incumbit Probatio; a Latin maxim, inferring that the negative of an assertion is presumed to be true, and that the onus probandi lies on the party making the averment. This abstract proposition, however, is necessarily controlled by the operation of various legal principles and presumptions. Hence, nothing is more common than for a party to rest his case on an averment which it is not legally incumbent on him to prove, but which, on the contrary, it lies on his antagonist to redargue. Stair, B. iv. tit. 39, § 4; Dickson on Evidence, p. 3. See Presumptions.

Affirmation. By the statutes 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 49; 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 82; and 1 and 2 Vict., c. 77, Quakers and Moravians, and persons who had been of either of these persuasions, as also persons belonging to the sect called Separatists, who, from conscientious scruples, refuse to take an oath in courts of justice, and on other occasions, are permitted, in lieu of an oath, both in civil and criminal cases, to make a solemn affirmation according to a statutory formula. The formula is, "I do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm;" and in the case of Separatists, the statutory affirmation farther bears to be made, "In the presence of Almighty God." These affirmations are declared to have the effect of an oath, "in all places, and for all purposes whatsoever, where an oath is or shall be required," either at common law or by statute. The penalty of affirming or declaring falsely is the same as in the case of perjury. There is also a statutory form of affirmation in lieu of the oath of abjuration. The privilege of substituting a solemn affirmation or declaration instead of an oath has, by 18 Vict., c. 25, been extended to the case of all persons called as witnesses in any court of civil judicature, or requiring or desiring to make an affidavit or deposition, who shall refuse or be unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives, to be sworn. The judge must, however, be satisfied of the sincerity of the refusal. The statute prescribes the formula of the affirmation, and a false affirmation is declared to infer the pains of perjury. Dickson on Evidence, p. 979; Hume on Crimes, i. p. 370; ii. p. 376; *Ersk. Age. A person is said to be of lawful age when he or she attains majority, or the age of twenty-one years complete. The earlier period of life is described generally as minority, but is sub-divided into pupilarity, which extends in males to fourteen years, and in females to twelve years; and puberty, which extends from the termination of pupilarity until the attainment of majority. A minor who has attained puberty may make oath and give evidence as a witness. No one under the age of twenty-one years can vote at an election for member of Parliament, or be elected a member; but a man is of age on the day preceding his twenty-first birthday. Chamber's Election Law, h. t.; Stair, B. i. tit. 5, § 2, and B. iv. tit. 43, § 7; Mr More's Notes, p. ccccx. i.; *Ersk. Agent. An agent may be defined generally as one whom another puts in his place, and authorizes or delegates to transact business for him, and, within the limits of the particular business to which the agency or mandate extends, to bind his constituent. The rights and powers of mercantile agents will be found explained voce Factor. See also Mandate. Principal and Agent.

Agent and Client. Under this title, in our dictionaries and digests, are classed a very comprehensive series of cases, embracing all those questions which have arisen as to the responsibilities, duties, and privileges of law agents in the conduct of the business of their clients. Generally speaking, a law agent is presumed to have competent professional knowledge, and will be responsible to his client for the consequences of professional ignorance or negligence in the conduct of the business entrusted to him. And, on the other hand, in addition to his claim against his client for payment of his account of expenses, a law agent has a preference, of the nature of hypothec, over the expenses of process, where awarded or likely to be awarded against the opposite party in the suit, of which right the agent cannot be deprived by any arrangement between the parties to the cause. The agent has also a preference by retention over the papers and title-deeds of his client, which have come lawfully into his custody, until satisfied for the account of his business, or professional account. A law agent is not liable for damages on account of an error committed by him, unless the error amount to gross ignorance or negligence, and the state of this law at the time that the error was committed will be an element in the consideration. In order to recover damages, it is not enough to show that something which the agent was employed to do has not had the effect which was expected from it. It is incumbent on the employer to show an act of gross ignorance, such as could not have been committed by any other ordinarily informed member of the profession. In Purves v. Landell, it was observed in the House of Lords, that it was of the very essence of an action against a professional person by his employer, that there should be gross ignorance; that the man who had undertaken to perform a duty of an attorney, or of a surgeon, or apothecary, as the case might be, should have undertaken to discharge a duty professionally for which he was ill qualified, or, if not ill qualified to discharge it, which he had so negligently disobeyed, as to damnify his employer, or deprive him of the benefit which he had a right to expect from employing him; Landell v. Purves, 4 D. 1300; reversed, 4 Bell, 46; Cook v. Falconer's Representatives, 6 D. 149. In Thompson v. Davidson, 12 D. 179, the agent of a trust, who was himself a trustee, sold a subject held by the trustees in security of a debt, in virtue of the powers contained in the bond and disposition in security in their favour. The articles of roup stipulated that the purchaser should find security for the price within three weeks, failing which the expositors were entitled to bring the subject to a second sale. The subject was bought by the debtor himself, and the agent failed to demand security, or to expose the subjects a second time. Several years after the agent's death, and before the debt was paid, the debtor became bankrupt, and the subject having proved insufficient for payment of the debt, the agent's representative was found liable to make up the deficiency. On appeal, the judgment was affirmed, but in the House of Lords the judgment appears to have been rested on the circumstance of the agent being a trustee rather than on the ground of agency. Lord St Leonards, C.—"No man can be permitted to sell an estate as a trustee, and then leave it optional whether that sale shall or shall not be completed by payment of the purchase-money. He is bound, from the very necessity of the transaction, if he does not himself find the money, to pursue the matter until he has brought it to a satisfactory conclusion. The act of Mr Thompson, therefore, was an intrusion which bound him to answer for his neglect; and I am clearly of opinion, that this was a manifest and gross breach of trust." 1 Macqueen, 236. See on the subject of this article generally, *Ersk. Alba Firma. In the language of the feudal law, alba firma is money-rent, in contradistinction to rent in victual. In blanch charters, where the duty consists of some trifling payment in acknowledgment of the right of superiority, it is usually expressed to be nomine albe firmæ, and it is also usual to add the words, si petatur tantum; by which, if the duty be not demanded within the year, the right to demand it is lost. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 7.

Alderman; an associate to the civil magistrates of an English city or town corporate. He ought to be resident in the place. The aldermen of London are exempt from serving in inferior offices, or on juries or assizes. Alderman was a degree of nobility amongst the Saxons: literally, it imports no more than a senior or elder. Tomlins, h. t.

Ale; anciently could not be imported and sold within a barony without the consent of the baron. Ersk. B. ii. t. 6, § 8.

Alehouses; are not allowed to be kept without a license obtained from justices of the peace, or other magistrates empowered to grant them; act 44 Geo. III., c. 55, § 5, &c.; 48 Geo. III., c. 143, &c. Persons engaged in collecting the ale-duties are not eligible as members of Parliament; *Chamber's Dict. h. t. See also Swint. Alias. Alias dictus. Where a party, either in a civil or criminal process, is known by several names, he is, as it is technically expressed, described by an alias dictus; e. g. "John White, alias (otherwise called) Huffy White." Tomlins, h. t.

Alibi; elsewhere. In criminal prosecutions, this term is used to express the panel's defence of having been in a different place, at the time libelled, from that in which the crime was committed. Of course, when true, this defence is the best proof of innocence; but there are several reasons for regarding it with suspicion. 1. The alibi offers the readiest and most obvious opportunity for false evidence. 2. When the prosecutor's evidence is direct, there is a necessary discrepancy between it and that which is brought to establish the alibi. 3. Time is not very apparent, and is seldom regarded, except when the witness's attention has been called to it by some circumstance. Hence, the witness's having particularly noted it is in general not very probable. When, therefore, a witness speaks pointedly as to time, it is of importance to ascertain his reasons for having observed and remembered it so exactly. In cases where the prosecutor is allowed a certain degree of latitude in charging the place of the crime, if the panel offer a proof of alibi, the prosecutor must bring evidence of the precise place where the act was committed, that the jury may know whether the proof of alibi meets the depositions on the other side; consequently, a broad or alternative charge has no effect in excluding an alibi, where such a proof is naturally applicable. The charge of time is, by uniform practice, extended to three months; but this must, in like manner, be precisely fixed, when an alibi is pleaded for part of the time. In regard to those crimes, the place of committing which is immaterial, a proof of alibi will be of no avail, as e. g. the act of fabricating the plates, or of throwing off the spurious notes in a case of forgery. The plea of alibi is a special defence, of which intimation must be given at latest on the day previous to that of the trial; and, in order to enable the public prosecutor to meet such a defence, it must be minute in its specification of the place where the panel alleges he actually was at the time libelled. Hume, ii. 206-224, 410-413; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4. § 71; *Ersk. Alien; one born in a foreign country out of allegiance to the British Crown. By 4 Geo. II., c. 21, § 1, all children born out of the allegiance of the Crown of Great Britain, whose fathers are natural-born subjects of Britain at the time of the birth of such children, shall be held to be natural-born subjects, unless such fathers have been attainted of high treason, or are liable to the penalties of high treason or felony in case of their returning to Britain, or are in the actual service of any foreign prince or state at war with Great Britain. By the act 13 Geo. III., c. 21, § 1, the same privilege is extended to all persons born out of allegiance, whose fathers, in virtue of the former act, are to be deemed natural subjects, although their mothers are aliens. By the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 66, § 16, to be afterwards more fully referred to, women married to natural-born subjects are to be deemed naturalized. To be considered a natural-born subject under the first of these statutes, a person must have been legitimate from his birth, and not legitimated per subsequens matrimonium merely; for, to be within the act, the child must be born to a British father, while a bastard is filius nullius; Shedden v. Patrick, 6 July 1854; 1 Macqueen, 535. The consideration of the whole Court was given to the construction of the statutes in regard to aliens, in Dundas v. Dundas, 15th Nov. 1839, 2 D. 31, where it was held, that a domiciled American, born in America after the declaration of independence, and whose father and grandfather, though British subjects, had adhered to the United States, was incapable, from alienage, of succeeding to a Scotch estate. The children of aliens, if born in Britain, are, generally speaking, natural-born subjects. Aliens residing in any place surrendered to Great Britain may act as merchants, &c. on taking the oath of allegiance; 37 Geo. III., c. 63, § 5. This statute saves the rights of the East India Company. An alien enemy coming into this kingdom, and taken in war, shall suffer death by the martial law. No alien can be returned on any jury in a trial between subject and subject. Aliens are subject to the laws, and, in the greater crimes, are liable to the ordinary course of justice, although it seems doubtful whether they will be punished on local statutes.

The influx of foreigners to Great Britain in 1792 and 1793, caused by the French revolution, led to the passing of various acts of Parliament, known by the name of the Alien Acts, by which masters of ships arriving from foreign countries are required to give an account to the custom-house officers of the number and names of the foreigners on board. The present Peace Alien Act, as it is termed, which has superseded all the former enactments, is 6 Will. IV., c. 11 (1836). Under its provisions, masters of vessels arriving from abroad must, under a penalty, immediately declare what aliens are on board, or have landed from their vessels—except foreign mariners employed in the navigation (§ 2). Every alien must, under a penalty, immediately on his arrival, produce his passport to the chief officer of customs, and declare his name, description, &c. (§ 3). The officer must register this declaration, deliver a certificate to the alien, and within two days transmit a copy of the shipmaster's declaration and of the alien's certificate to one of the Secretaries of state in Great Britain, or to the secretary for Ireland, if the arrival was there (§§ 4, 5). When an alien departs from the realm, he delivers up his certificate, which must be forthwith transmitted by the officer of customs to a secretary of state (§ 6). The statute farther provides for the punishment of offences against its enactments before justices of the peace; and it exempts from its operation foreign ministers and their domestic servants, registered as such according to law—aliens resident three years in the realm, and obtaining a secretary of state's certificate to that effect—and aliens who are below fourteen years of age at the time of any act done or omitted to be done by them. The proof of not being an alien lies on the party alleged to be such.

The general rule has been that aliens (not enemies) may acquire right to moveables, except in the case of British ships. But an alien is not entitled either to acquire or to succeed to heritage in Scotland. These disabilities may be removed by an Act of Naturalization, or by letters of denization, or by naturalization in virtue of a certificate of a secretary of state, in terms of the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 66 (1844). Within the British colonies or possessions, aliens may, by 10 and 11 Vict., c. 83, be naturalized by act or ordinance of such colony or possession.

An act of naturalization is an act of parliament, conferring on the individual the privileges of a natural-born subject. No bill for naturalization can be received without a clause in it disabling the person so naturalized from obtaining thereby any immunity in trade in any foreign country, unless he shall have resided in Great Britain for seven years after the commencement of the session in which he is naturalized; 14 Geo. III., c. 84.

Letters of denization are letters-patent issued by the Crown, conferring on the person in whose favour they are granted the privileges of a British subject. A denizen is in a sort of middle state, between a natural-born subject and an alien. He may purchase and transmit lands, but cannot succeed to them. The issue of a denizen born out of the kingdom before denization cannot succeed to him. But all persons, natural-born subjects of this kingdom, may inherit as heirs to their ancestors, although their ancestors were aliens; 16 Geo. III., c. 52. No denizen can be a member of the privy council or of parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military, or be capable of any grant of lands, &c. from the Crown.

Naturalization by certificate was introduced by the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 66, of which the following are the chief provisions:—Every person, wherever born of a mother being a natural-born British subject, can take any estate, real or personal, by devise, purchase, or succession (§ 3). Every alien (friend) may hold every species of personal property to the same effect as if he were a natural-born subject (§ 4). Such alien, residing in the United Kingdom, may hold lands and houses for the purpose of residence or business, for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, to the same effect and with the same rights as a natural-born subject, except the right of voting (§ 5). Every alien, residing in the United Kingdom, with intent to settle therein, upon obtaining the certificate, and taking the oath of allegiance, prescribed by the statute, is entitled to all the rights and capacities of a natural-born subject, except those of being a member of parliament or privy council, or those which may be specially excepted in his certificate (§ 6). An alien, when desirous of obtaining a certificate of naturalization, must present a memorial to that effect to one of the secretaries of state, who, after consideration, may issue the certificate, which must be enrolled for preservation in chancery. Within sixty days of the date of the certificate, he must take the oath of allegiance, and obtain a second certificate to that effect (§§ 7, 8, 9).

Every foreign seaman, who, in time of war, serves two years on board a British ship, by virtue of the royal proclamation is, by statute 13 Geo. II., c. 3, ipso facto naturalized, under the like restrictions, however, as to grants of lands and offices, as in the case of denizens. And all foreign Protestants and Jews, upon residing seven years in any of the American colonies, without being absent above two months at a time, and all foreign Protestants serving two years in a military capacity there, or being three years employed in the whale fishery, without ever absents themselves from the Queen's dominions for more than one year, and none of them falling within certain incapacities, shall, on taking the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, be naturalized, except as to sitting in parliament or the privy council, and holding offices and grants under the Crown in Great Britain or Ireland. See 13 Geo. II., c. 7; 20 Geo. II., c. 44; 2 Geo. III., c. 25; 13 Geo. III., c. 25; 20 Geo. III., c. 20; 58 Geo. III., c. 97.

The act of the Scotch parliament, 17th July 1695, instituting the Bank of Scotland, provides, that all foreigners who shall become partners in the bank shall thereby be and become naturalized Scotsmen to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and, as all Scotchmen became British subjects at the Union in 1707, it was thought, for upwards of a century thereafter, that an alien who had purchased Bank of Scotland stock thereby became a naturalized British subject. This notion, however, and the practices following on it, was brought into question, and after a solemn trial, it was decided, first in the Court of Session, and afterwards in the House of Lords, that the privilege was limited to the original partners of that bank; Macao v. Officers of State, 14th Nov. 1820, F. C.; 1 Shaw's App. Cases, 138.

Alienation; is the act of transferring pro-

erty; and, in the Scotch law, it signifies the transference of heritable property. The seller says, "I hereby sell, alienate, and dispend," as expressive of a complete onerous conveyance to the purchaser; or, when the deed is given gratuitously or without a price, the terms of conveyance are, give, grant and dispend. Aliment; maintenance, food and clothing. By the law of Scotland, persons who, by reason of nonage, or from other causes, are unable to support themselves, are entitled, in certain circumstances, and in respect of certain relationships, judicially to enforce a claim for aliment.

(1.) Parents are bound to aliment their lawful children until they are of an age and in a condition to aliment themselves. This obligation must be construed, so far, with reference to the rank and circumstances of the parties, although anything more than a bare subsistence and necessary wearing apparel is discretionary on the part of the parent, and cannot be enforced. The obligation ceases with forisfiliation; but it continues in all ranks until the child is physically able to earn a livelihood; and, in the upper ranks still longer, if the child be destitute, especially in the case of daughters. If a child, after forisfiliation, fall into indigence, the obligation revives; and, as the obligation is of the nature of a debt, it transmits against the representatives of the father. Failing the father, the mother is liable if she have the means; and failing father and mother, the grandfather is liable where the means of the father and mother are exhausted. The name of a profession is not enough to liberate the father: it must be such occupation in a profession, or otherwise, as enables the child to support himself or herself. The father will also be discharged, if the child be otherwise provided with the means of aliment, or of raising money requisite for that purpose. The obligation also includes the son's wife in the upper ranks, during her husband's life, and after his death also, it would seem, if she be the mother of an heir of entail. In two cases of comparatively recent date, the law on this subject has been fully considered, both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords. See Maidment, 25th May 1815, F. C., and 6 Dow, 257; and Maule, 9th July 1823, F. C., and 1 Wilson & Shaw, 266. See also More's Stair, p. 29, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1630, et seq. and cases there cited.

(2.) Parents, when in indigence, have a claim of aliment against their children for separate aliment, where the children are in circumstances to afford it. Bell's Princ. § 1634, and authorities there cited; More's Stair, p. 31.

(3.) The father of an illegitimate child is bound to aliment the child until it can support itself. Generally speaking, the obligation continues until the child attains the age of puberty; although, if from disease or any other cause, the bastard is unable to earn a livelihood, the obligation may last for life. Bell's Princ. § 2062, and cases there cited. See Bastard.

(4.) A husband is bound to aliment his wife in family with himself. But if, from ill usage on his part, or from any other cause, the spouses live apart, this obligation to aliment will be enforced. So also, during the dependence of an action of divorce or of adherence, the husband, whether he be pursuer or defender, must not only aliment his wife, but must also provide the means of defraying her expenses in the action. Bell's Princ. § 1538, et seq., and cases there cited.

(5.) It is laid down in our law books, that the liferenter of a landed estate is bound to aliment the fiar or heir when he has no other means of subsistence. This obligation seems to have originated in an extended construction of the statute 1491, c. 25, under which the superior in a ward estate was bound, while the estate was in ward, to aliment the heir. But in whatever way this rule may have originated, it is probable, after the decision of the House of Lords in Maidment's case, and the dicta in that of Maule, that, in the abstract, this doctrine would not now be enforced; since, in every case of fee and liferent, it may be said, as was observed in the House of Lords in Maidment's case, that the fiar has a marketable commodity, on which he may raise money by sale or otherwise for his maintenance. And although it may be inexpedient to countenance that species of improvidence, yet there appear to be no considerations, either of equity or of expediency, sufficient to warrant a court of law in imposing on a liferenter the burden of supporting, it may be, a strange fiar. See Bell's Princ. § 1065, and authorities there cited; More's Stair, cccxx.

(6.) Under the Act of Grace (1696, c. 32), creditors who choose to detain their debtors in prison after a surrender of their property and effects in terms of that statute, and of the statute 6 Geo. IV., c. 62, are bound to aliment them. See Act of Grace. As to the aliment of the poor, see Poor.

Alimentary Fund; is a fund set apart by the destination of the giver, for an aliment to the receiver. A fund so vested at least to the extent of a moderate aliment, is not arrestable, or otherwise attachable by the direct diligence of creditors. But although the bestower of the fund has, in this manner, a right to fix its destination, no one can exempt his own funds from the diligence of his creditors, by setting apart the whole or any portion of them as an alimentary fund for himself. Pensions from the King are held to be alimentary, although they do not bear an express clause to that effect; and in the statutes authorizing the establishment of widows' funds it is usual to declare the widow's annuity to be alimentary. In one case, a party left to his nephew, a peer, a liferent annuity of £1500, declaring that it should be considered as purely alimentary, and not attachable by creditors. The creditors of the liferenter having arrested the fund, it was held that the liferent provision was not exorbitant, reference being made to the rank and circumstances of the annuitant, and that, therefore, no part of the annuity was attachable by creditors for debts contracted before the annuity took effect, whether those debts were for aliment furnished to the annuitant or otherwise; but that the annuity was subject to arrestment for debts purely alimentary, contracted posterior to the annuity taking effect. It was further held that the furnishers of each year had a preference on the annuity of that year over the furnishers of preceding years; but that such purely alimentary creditors were preferable inter se according to the priority of the diligences used by them for attaching the annuity. Earl of Buchan v. his Creditors, 13 S.

Alimony; seems to be used by Erskine as synonymous with Aliment; but in English legal phraseology the term is confined to the allowance which a married woman sues for, and is entitled to, on separation from her husband. Tomlins, h. t. See Ersk. i. 6, 56, and B. iv. t. 3, § 28. See Aliment.

Alloy, or Alloy; is a mixture of several metals with silver or gold. It is used to defray the expense of coinage, and render the gold or silver more fusible. The alloy in gold coin is silver and copper; in silver coin, copper alone. The standard of gold is 22 carats of fine gold, and 2 carats of alloy in the pound Troy; the standard for silver is 11 ounces 2 pennyweights, and 18 pennyweights alloy of copper. In the Mint, a pound of standard gold is coined into 44 guineas and a half; and a pound-weight of standard silver is coined into 62 shillings. Tomlins, h. t.

Allegiance; is the fidelity due by every natural-born subject to the Crown. It is also due by every person who has been naturalized; and a temporary allegiance is due, during the period of his residence, by every foreigner who resides in the kingdom, and has the protection of our laws. Since the period of the Revolution, allegiance has been enforced by an oath, termed the Oath of Allegiance; 1693, c. 6. The person taking it "sincerely promises and swears that he will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the Sovereign." This oath must be taken by all those bound to take the oath of abjuration. See Abjuration. Ersk. B. i. t. 2, § 33; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 2133; Hutch. Justice of Peace, i. 44; Hume, i. 526-7. See also Oaths. Affirmation. Alien.

Allenarly; only, merely. This is a technical word of some importance in Scotch conveyancing. Thus, where lands are conveyed to a father "for his liferent use allenarly," the effect of that form of expression will be to restrict the father's right to a mere liferent, or, at best, to a fiduciary fee, even in circumstances where, but for the word "allenarly," the father would have been unlimited fiar. See Conjunct Rights.

Allodial; is used in contradistinction to feudal; in which sense all moveable property is allodial. But in a more limited sense, the term is applied, 1. To the property belonging to the Crown; 2. To the superiorities reserved by the Sovereign; and, 3. To churches, churchyards, mansees, and glebes, the right of which does not flow from the Crown. To these may be added the udal lands of Orkney, which are held by natural possession, provable by witnesses, without any title in writing. This form of holding remains to this day, in every case where the property has not been feudalised, by the vassal's accepting of a charter from the Crown. In practice, it is common to obtain a Crown charter of lands, formerly udal lands, by an adjudication in implement, proceeding on a trust-disposition, without procuratory or precept; though, according to principle, it might proceed at once on a resignation by the udal proprietor in the hands of the Crown. There is also a holding not properly feudal, peculiar to a small property called the four towns of Lochmaben, which is held by a tenure somewhat like the copyhold right of England. The proprietors are enrolled as kindly tenants in the rental-book of the proprietor of the estate, which constitutes their title. This title has been judicially recognised; see M. p. 15195. See on the subject of this article, Stair, B. ii. t. 3, § 4; Mr More's Notes, p. clvii.; Ersk. B. ii. t. 3, §§ 8 and 18; Bank. i. p. 84, 529; Menric's Conveyancing.

Allowance of an Apprising. The allowance was a decree in confirmation of an apprising, written on the back of it by the clerk to the bills, stating the amount of the debt, the lands appraised, and the names of the appriser, debtor, superior and messenger, and the dates of the executions, and authorizing letters of horning, &c., against the superior. On the change of form from the apprising to the adjudication, the allowance gave rise to the abbreviate. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 22; and B. iii. tit. 2, § 24; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 26; Bank. vol. ii. pp. 217 and 222; Ersk. Princ. 11th edit. 268. See Abbreviate. Adjudication.

Alluvio; is that addition which a river, running between the grounds of different heritors, may insensibly make to one of the properties, and which accretes to the owner of the ground to which the addition is made. But if, in place of a gradual increase, the course of the river should be altered by a violent flood, or by any convulsion of nature, the ground which may thus be added to one of the properties does not belong to the owner of that property, but remains the property of that person to whom it originally belonged. Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 35; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 14; Bank. vol. i. p. 506; Ball's Princ. § 935; Ersk. Princ. 11th edit. 124. See Accession. Avulsio.

Almoner; the person appointed to distribute the king's alms. A clergyman is usually appointed to the office.

Alms; relief bestowed on the poor. A parliamentary voter, whether in England or Scotland, who has received alms or parochial relief during the preceding twelve months, is disqualified to vote; and by the English and Scotch Reform Acts such a person is not entitled to be registered as a voter in any city, burgh, or town. The disqualification in Scotland is the receipt of parochial relief within twelve calendar months next previous to the last of July; 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65, § 11. See Chambers' Dict. h. t.

Altarages. Altarages were donations granted for the singing of masses for the souls of deceased friends, &c. at particular altars: and when, at the Reformation, these came to be suppressed, the founders were allowed to convert the endowments to the maintenance of bursars in any of the universities; 1567, c. 12; Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 3; Bank. vol. i. p. 558.

Alternatives. If there be an alternative in the manner of performing an obligation, the debtor has the choice, on the maxim, In alternativis electio est debitoris; but Bankton says, that after commencing a suit for the performance, the creditor has the right to choose. A conventional penalty for non-performance is not an alternative. The party entitled to the option retains his right, until he has declared under which alternative he has been acting. Thus, it was decided, that a tenant who was granted a lease for nineteen years, or for two lives, and who had held the farm for fourteen years without declaring his election, might insist on choosing to have the lease for two lives. But acting upon one of the alternatives for a time fixes the choice, and bars a recurrence to the other. In an obligation to do one of two things for a certain period annually, it is doubtful whether the first choice fixes the alternative, or the debtor continues to have an annual option. It is thought, however, that a tenant or other party, bound to pay either a money or a grain rent, may avail himself of the choice each year. In alternative legacies the right of election seems to depend on the intention of the testator, as implied in the form of expression which he makes use of: thus, when he bequeathes one of two things to the legatee, the legatee would appear to have the option; when he enjoins his executors to pay one of two things, the choice seems to be left to them. Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 20; Mr More's Notes, pp. cxxi. ccxlv.; Bank. vol. i. p. 474, §§ 80-83; iii. 89; Brown's Synop. h. t. and p. 1430; Hume, i. 501, ii. 169, 194-2-8, 208-223.

Altius non Tollendi; was a Roman law servitude, whereby the servient proprietor was restricted from raising a building within his own ground to a height prejudicial to the dominant tenement. There was also, it is said, in the Roman law a servitude Altius tol- lendi, which, according to some commentators, imported a right in the dominant proprietor to raise his house higher than was permitted by the regulations for the height of buildings in Rome. But this is a very doubtful interpretation; and in Scotland, at least, would receive no countenance, as applicable to those towns (such as Edinburgh) where there is a statutory limitation in the height of the houses. It would rather appear, indeed, that, properly speaking, there was no servitude altius tollendi, and that the term merely signifies an immunity from the servitude altius non tollendi. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 10; Bell's Princ. § 1007, and authorities there cited; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 9; Mr More's Notes, p. ccxi.; Brown's Syn. p. 2256, 2362. See Edinburgh. See also Light.

Amand; is synonymous with a fine or penalty. In our older practice, a defender who proposed improbation was required to consign a certain sum to be forfeited as an amand, in case it should turn out that he had proposed the plea animo differendi litem. Prior to the peremptory statutory regulations introduced by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, it was usual for the Court, or for the Lords Ordinary, to pronounce orders for the lodging of pleadings or other papers in the course of a process, "under an amand" (as it was expressed) "of 40s.," or some such sum; although, as these amands were seldom enforced, the compulsitor was practically ineffective, and is now in desuetude. Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, §§ 12 and 39; tit. 1, § 63; Bank. i. p. 297.

Ambassador; a person sent by one sovereign power to another, vested with authority to transact state affairs, and to act as representative of his constituent. The persons of ambassadors are protected under the law of nations. An ambassador will lose his privilege if he commit an offence against the state to which he is sent; and for treason against the sovereign's life he may be condemned and executed; but, were he guilty of crimes of a less serious character, he would, in courtesy, be sent back to his sovereign, to be punished by him. By the civil law, the person of an ambassador cannot be arrested, or his moveables taken in satisfaction of debt. The law of nations regarding the privileges of ambassadors is part of the law of Great Britain; and, by express statute (7 Anne, c. 12), ambassadors and their domestic servants are exempted from arrest. A resident merchant in this country, who acts as consul to a foreign power, is not thereby exempted from arrest. Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 11, and tit. 12, § 13; Bank. vol. i. pp. 35 and 521; Swint. Abridg. h. t.; Hume, i. 536. See Tomlins' Law Dict.; Wharton's Lexicon.

Ambidexter; one who plays on both sides. In English legal phraseology it signifies a juror who takes money for his verdict. Tomlins, h. t.

Amenable to a certain court, signifies to be subject to the jurisdiction of that court.

Amendment of the Libel; is an addition to, or alteration on, the averments or conclusions of the action, made by judicial authority after the summons has been signeted and brought into Court. The amendment must be made in a writing separate from the summons, and can only be lodged by permission of the judge, on a motion from the bar. After it has been allowed to be seen by the opposite party, an interlocutor is pronounced, admitting it as part of the summons, if no objections are made. But no such amendment can be competently made after the record is closed, except in the case of res noviter veniens ad notitiam (6 Geo. IV., c. 120, §§ 6, 10; Hill, 19th June 1855, 17 D. 958); although amendments have been allowed after the record was prepared, under a reservation of the defender's claim for expenses. So also, in a process of reduction, it is competent to the pursuer, before the record is made up, to state additional reasons of reduction in the form of an amendment of the libel, on his furnishing the defender with a copy of the amendment forty-eight hours before it is given in, and paying such expenses as the Lord Ordinary shall think reasonable; and the defender shall give in defences applicable to such amendment; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 51; Miller, 2d Feb. 1850, 12 D. 653. The alterations on, and additions to, a summons which may be made by amendment of the libel are very considerable; but any fundamental change on the nature or grounds of the action is not admissible in this form; and the specialties of each case must be considered in dealing with questions as to the competency of an amendment. New pursuers cannot be so sisted; nor can a party who has raised an action in his own individual name be allowed to libel in an amendment, that he sues in the character of executor; Smith, 5th July 1850, 12 D. 1185. Neither is it competent to amend the libel in cases where the defender has not appeared. In such a case the pursuer may put in a minute restricting the conclusions of the libel (which may be done at any stage of the process), but he cannot add to or alter these conclusions; the presumption being, that the defender having had due notice and certification of what will ensue if he make no appearance, is prepared for decree in terms of the libel, although it is impossible to assume, in his absence, that he would also have acquiesced in the summons as altered. The remedy in such cases is by supplementary action. An amendment of the libel, where otherwise competent, cannot be made in the form of a minute; see Blair, 1st June 1848, 10 D. 1095.

Amendments of the libel are regarded with great jealousy in criminal proceedings before the Court of Session, as in cases of forgery and fraudulent bankruptcy; and it is also a general rule, that no amendment of a summary petition is competent after procedure has taken place therein. In Hutton, 1st March 1851, 13 D. 804, no fewer than three separate amendments of a libel were allowed, reserving all questions of expenses. In Dallas v. Mann, 14th June 1853, 15 D. 746, the Lord Justice-Clerk said,—“We have consulted the whole Judges, and are prepared to lay down a general rule in regard to the question which arises in this case. That rule is, that in everything which is of the essence of the action, whether in the averment of what is an essential quality, or of what is a proper ground of action, the summons and condescendence must be perfect and complete ab initio, and that no change can be introduced into the revised condescendence which alters the summons or the annexed condescendence, which is a part of the summons, in such matters. Such change can only be made by an amendment of the summons on leave obtained. This rule we are prepared to enforce in regard to the pleadings in this Court as well as in the Sheriff Court. Such being the general rule which the Court is to enforce, then, we in this Division hold, that, in this case, want of probable cause was of the essence of the action, and, therefore, as the statement of it was omitted in the condescendence annexed to and forming part of the summons, it was not competent to insert it by way of revisal merely, but that it could only be added as an amendment on leave granted.” A pursuer of an action of damages for slander was, however, allowed, on payment of the expense of revisal, to state in his revised condescendence two new instances of alleged slander, uttered at different times and places, and before different parties, from those stated in the summons; Hewatson, 15 D. 519. At the adjustment of the record at chambers with a view to closing, the Lord Ordinary may allow or require such alterations and amendments to be made on the record as may seem proper; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 2. Similar regulations as to amendments and restrictions of the libel are in observance in the inferior courts, though, under the short forms recently introduced by the Sheriff Court Act, there is less room for error, and leave to amend is more scrupulously granted than formerly. The Sheriff, when a case comes before him in appeal, may ex proprio motu open up the record for the purpose of allowing an amendment; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 16. See also A. S. (Sheriff Courts), 10th July 1839, §§ 11, 13, 41, 99. Notes of suspension may be amended to the effect of offering caution or consignment, by lodging a minute to that effect, in terms of A. S. 24th December 1838, § 4.

Amendment of the Libel (in criminal prosecutions). It is a general rule, that the prosecutor cannot alter or amend the libel at the bar without the pannel's permission; but in some cases retrenchments upon it have been allowed without his consent, provided there remains thereafter a relevant charge against him. Retrenchment, however, is never allowed where its effect is the production of a substantial variation in the libel, and the consequent injustice of obliging the pannel to go to trial on a charge for which he was not prepared; Speirs, 25th March 1836; 1 Swinton, 171; M'Gregor, 28th April 1842; 1 Brown, 331. An instance of permissible retrenchment is afforded by the case of M'Caffer (Glasgow, Sept. 1823), where it was allowed, on the motion of the prosecutor, before the pannel pleaded to the indictment, that the words, “Parish of Gorbals and,” in the description of the place where the crime was committed, should be struck out. Where there are several charges, or several pannels, the prosecutor may depart from one or more of the charges against one or more of the pannels, and proceed with his proof as to the rest. In some cases, also, the prosecutor is allowed to restrict the charge to a lower crime, but of the same kind, as, for instance, to homicide instead of murder. The prosecutor is likewise entitled at the bar to restrict the pains of law. Hume, ii. 280; Bell's Notes, 180, 232; Steele, 195; Alison's Princ. 365.

Amendment. In parliamentary proceedings, an amendment is an alteration proposed in the draught of any bill, or in the terms of any motion. No member, except when the House is in committee, is allowed to speak more than once on the same question; but he may speak again on an amendment, which is considered to be a new question. When a motion for the adjournment of the House is made, it is in the words, “That the House do now adjourn;” and if it be carried, the House will adjourn to the next sitting day; unless, at a previous part of the evening, a resolution has been come to, that, at its rising, the House shall adjourn to some particular day. It is not competent, therefore, on a motion for adjournment, to move an amendment, specifying any particular day to which the House shall adjourn. An amendment may be proposed on an amendment. The parliamentary rule as to putting motions and amendments to the vote differs from that usually observed at public meetings. In Parliament, the motion which has been first made and seconded is always put first from the chair; and hence, when an amendment has been proposed, instead of the question that it shall be adopted being directly put, a vote is taken on the question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question," and if this motion is carried, the main question, which is really the same thing, is next put, and of course agreed to. But if the question, "That the words stand part of the question," be negatived, the main question is put with the omission of those words; so that the amendment separately is never put at all. Hatsell, ii. 111, et seq.; May's Practical Treatise on the Law, Privileges, &c., of Parliament, p. 236.

Amerciament, or Amercement; is properly an English law term, where an offender is at the mercy of the King in regard to the quantum of a fine: when it is used at all, it means a fine imposed on an offender. Tomlins, h. t.; Wharton's Law Lexicon.

Amerciamentum, or Forisfactum Curie; used in the Regiam Majestatem to signify the unlaw, or fine for absence. Skene, h. t.

Amicable Sentence; is applied to a decree-arbitral. See Arbitration.

Amicus curie; a bystander who, not being interested in the cause, of his own knowledge, and tantum amicus, makes a suggestion in point of fact or in point of law, for the information of the Court, or to correct a mistake. See Tomlins, h. t.

Amnesty; an act of pardon or of oblivion.

Ancestor; in Scots law, is one from whom a landed estate is derived, and who is represented by the person in possession. In this respect an ancestor differs from one to whom the estate has previously belonged, and from whom it has passed to the present proprietor by purchase, or what is called a singular title; such a person being termed the author. Stair, B. iv. tit. 35, § 16; Mr More's Notes, pp. cccxxvi. and ccclviii; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 101, et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 727, et seq. 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 1931, et seq. 3d edit.

Anchorage; is a duty payable by a vessel on its entering a port.

Animals; injury done by. See Dammum.

Ann, or Annat; is the half-year's stipend payable for the vacant half-year after the death of a clergyman, to which his family or nearest of kin have right under the act 1672,

c. 13. Thus, if a clergyman die after Whitsunday, his executors have right to the first half of that year's stipend, and his widow and nearest of kin have right to the other half, as ann. If he survives Michaelmas, he has right to the whole of the year's stipend, and his nearest of kin draw the first of the next half-year's stipend, as the ann. The right to the ann is not vested in the clergyman, but in his next of kin, and therefore can neither be assigned by him even in a mortis causa deed, nor attached for his debts. The rule for dividing the ann between the widow and children does not seem to be very clearly fixed; but Erskine inclines to adopt the same rule of division which would be followed in regard to executry; that is, to give one-third to the widow and two-thirds to the children per capita. Where there are no children, one-half goes to the widow, and the other to the nearest of kin: where there are children, but no widow, it goes wholly to the children; and where there are neither children nor a widow, it goes to the nearest of kin. Confirmation is not required to vest a right to the ann in those by law entitled to it. By the act 50 Geo. III., c. 84, whereby provision is made for augmenting small stipends to L.150, it is enacted, that the executors or personal representatives of the minister whose stipend shall be augmented under this act, shall be entitled to one half-yearly moiety of the augmentation to be so granted, in name of ann, over and above the stipend due to the deceased minister in the same manner as in ordinary stipends, and the Barons of Exchequer are empowered to grant precepts for payment of this ann to those having right thereto, on their receipt, without confirmation or making up any other titles; 50 Geo. III., c. 84, § 16. See also 5 Geo. IV., c. 72. See on the subject of this article, Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, §§ 67, 68; Stair, ii. tit. 8, § 34, and Mr More's Notes, cccxlv.; Bank. vol. ii. p. 77; *Kames's Stat. Annexation; as used in the Regiam Majestatem, signifies "a fast-knitting and binding." Skene, h. t.

Annexation; is the act of uniting lands to the Crown, and declaring them unalienable. It also signifies the appropriating of Church lands to the Crown; and the union of lands lying at a distance from the parish church to which they belong, to the church of a parish to which they are more contiguous.

1. Annexed Property of the Crown.—The liberality of our sovereigns during the fifteenth century had reduced the Crown to great poverty, and it was the object of Parliament to put an end to such alienations. But this determination was not long acted on; the ancient system having been resumed, under the specious pretence of improving the country, by giving out the property of the Crown in feu for payment of a rent. By the act 1455, c. 41, the annexed property of the Crown is described, and declared unalienable, unless the gift receive the approbation of parliament. But that enactment seems not to have checked the evil; and it was followed by other statutes, and particularly by the acts 1457, c. 71; 1540, c. 15 and 16; 1584, c. 6; 1597, c. 233 and 234; some of which, by sanctioning subinfeudation in Crown lands, had the effect of dissipating, or greatly depreciating, the value of the annexed property, in so much, that now, with the exception of the Castles of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Dumbarton, the palace of Holyroodhouse, and the feu-duties of the ancient domains feued out under the above statutes, little remains of the once extensive territories of the Crown. Ersk. ii. tit. 3, § 14.

2. Annexation of Temporality of Benefices.—This annexation was made by the act 1587, c. 29, on a narrative of the poverty of the Crown, and his Majesty's desire to support the royal dignity without taxing his subjects, and, for that purpose, what had formerly been given by the Crown to religious houses is resumed, the cause of the disposition (that is, the support of the Popish religion), now ceasing, as the act expresses it. On these grounds, the whole estates, profits, and emoluments, belonging to the church and to ecclesiastical persons of every description, are, from and after July 29, 1587, declared to be the annexed property of the Crown under certain exceptions, and reserving a power to his Majesty of subfeuing. Ersk. ii. tit. 10, § 19; Stat. 1587, c. 29; Mackenzie's Observations, p. 226. See Teinds.

3. Annexation quoad sacra tantum; is the annexation of lands lying at a distance from the church to which they belong, to another church to which they are more contiguous, in so far as relates to the pastoral charge. Such lands still continue part of the parish from which, quoad sacra, they are separated, and remain subject to parochial burdens in it, such as the expense of building or repairing the manse, supporting the poor, paying stipend and the like, although it has been decided (contrary to the dictum of Erskine), that lands annexed quoad sacra tantum, are liable in the expense of upholding the church of the parish to which they are so annexed. *Ersk. Annualrent; interest of money. Before the Reformation, it was not lawful to lend money at interest, and, to evade this law, persons lending money received a yearly rent out of land. The profit of the money so lent was denominated annualrent, and thus the term annualrent came to be synonymous with interest. Stair, B. i. tit. 15, § 7; Bank. vol. i. p. 436; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Watson's Statute Law, h. t.; Menzies' Conveyancing. See Interest.

Annualrent Right was a deed, by which, in consideration of a certain price paid to him, a proprietor of lands granted a yearly rent out of his property, redeemable by him on repayment of the purchase-money. This was a device to evade the laws in force previous to the Reformation against the taking of interest. But, after the Reformation, when it was made lawful to take interest, a bond was given by the borrower to the lender, by which he gave an heritable security for the whole debt, principal and interest. Hence, when these two securities came into competition, the annualrent right, though preferable to the heritable bond, extended merely to the annualrent, while the surplus was carried by the heritable bond. This form of security is now in desuetude. Stair, B. ii. tit. 5; Mr More's Notes, p. ccix.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 31, et seq.; tit. 2, § 5; Bank. vol. i. pp. 487, 648, et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 671, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 909, 3d edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Menzies' Conveyancing. See Burdens.

Annual; a word used in the older law of Scotland, to signify a yearly revenue or duty payable at certain terms, either legal or conventional. Skene, h. t.

Annuity of Teinds; was an allowance to the King by the Commission of Teinds, at 6 per cent., from the teind of erected benefices, ratified by the act 1633, c. 15. They were disposed by the Crown in security of a debt, but the drawing of them was put a stop to in 1674, and the right has since that time lain dormant. Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 13, and B. iv. tit. 24, § 3; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 39; Bank. vol. ii. p. 58; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t. See Teinds.

Annuities, Public. See Public Funds.

Annuity Tax; a local tax levied within the royalty of Edinburgh for the support of the eighteen endowed clergymen of the fifteen city churches. The annuity is an assessment of $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on the rents of houses and shops within the royalty, which was first authorized about the year 1634. It originated in suggestions which had been made by James VI., and repeated by Charles I., to the magistrates of Edinburgh as to the best means of supporting the Established clergy of the city. Acting on these suggestions, the magistrates applied to the Scotch Parliament for authority to levy the assessment. Parliament remitted the matter to the Privy Council, with power to act as they saw just; and in March 1634 the Privy Council ordained the levy, and in January 1636 the King approved of it. When first imposed the aggregate sum to be levied was limited to a maximum; but afterwards a general assessment of 6 per cent. on the rental was authorized, by a statute passed 6th June 1661, which is now the leading authority for the assessment. The more recent statutes in which this assessment is recognised are 7 Geo. III., c. 27, 25 Geo. III., c. 28, 26 Geo. III., c. 113, and 49 Geo. III., c. 21, by which last statute the assessment is made applicable to the support not only of the ministers of the then existing churches, but of those of such churches as, in virtue of that statute, might be erected in the extended royalty. The other sources of emolument to the endowed clergy of Edinburgh are the interest of a sum of £2000 in lieu of the duty of a merk per ton and pack formerly levied upon goods brought into Leith and Edinburgh, and applied to the payment of the ministers of the city of Edinburgh, but which duty was abolished by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 55, § 16,—and, also, the interest of 5000 merks mortgaged by Lady Yester. The annuity-tax is by far the most important of these sources of income, and the produce of the whole yields the very moderate stipend of about £500 per annum to each minister. Members of the College of Justice are exempted from the annuity-tax. Montrose, it is believed, is the only other town in Scotland in which a similar provision is made for the support of the clergy. See Paterson, 11th March 1829, 7 S. 573. See on the subject of this article First Report of Commissioners of Religious Instruction, 1837.

Annuities. An annuity is the right to a yearly payment in money. When secured on land it becomes a conventional liferent, and a debitum fundi, differing from annualrent rights chiefly in this, that it has no relation to a capital sum or stock. Annuities are either settled as a permanent aliment on the annuitant for family purposes, or from favour; or they are constituted by bond of annuity, whereby the obligor engages to make to the obligee a certain yearly payment, in consideration of a price deemed adequate at the time. Such as are for a fixed term of years are called An- nuities Certain; such as depend on the duration of human life are called Annuities on Lives. The creditor in an annuity may adjudge heritable property sufficient to answer his claim, and it has also been held that he may arrest a fund of lying money sufficient to cover his annuity. An annuitant, in bringing his action for recovery of his annuity, claims a capital sum sufficient to produce an annual interest equal to the annuity. If he succeed, the requisite sum is recovered and invested or secured, and the interest of it is paid to him until the expiration of the annuity, when the capital is restored to the debtor in the annuity; or the same object may be attained under an arrangement for the purchase of an annuity from an insurance company. In bankruptcy a dividend corresponding to this capital was in like manner taken, which capital, on the expiration of the annuity, became the property of the creditors. In ranking annuities and contingent debts, however, a more convenient custom has of late been introduced of putting a value upon them as at the period of division, taking into account the interest of money, the chances of life, and other circumstances; and the creditor is ranked for this value in full of his claim, and entitled to draw a corresponding dividend. There was often necessarily much doubt and difficulty in fixing this value; for a full exposition of which see Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 339, 5th edit.

By the Bankruptcy Statute 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, it is enacted, that no creditor, in respect of an annuity granted by the bankrupt, shall be entitled to vote and draw a dividend until such annuity shall be valued. The Sheriff, before the election of a trustee, and the trustee thereafter, is directed to put a value on the annuity, regard being had to the original price given for the annuity, deducting therefrom such diminution in the value of the annuity as shall have been caused by the lapse of time since the grant thereof to the date of the sequestration, and the creditor is entitled to vote and draw dividends in respect of such value and no more, but it is provided that the judgment of the Sheriff or trustee shall be subject to review; and any creditor who has claims on the estate may appeal or appear and be heard on any appeal.

Redeemable Bonds of Annuity are, generally speaking, mere expedients for securing the lender of a sum of money in high interest, and in repayment of the capital on the expiration of the life. They are contracts by which the borrower becomes bound to pay to the lender, while the selected life endures, an annuity of sufficient amount to cover not only a high interest, but also a premium of insurance upon the life selected. Caution is given, or lands are conveyed, in security of the payment, and the borrower has it in his option to redeem the right on repayment of the sum advanced. Annuities, as having tractum futuri temporis, are heritable, and an obligation to pay them falls, like other similar burdens, upon the heir of the deceased. They do not vest de die in diem, but at the specified terms of payment, which are usually Whitsunday and Martinmas. Arrestment of an annuity before the term when it fell due has been sustained to carry the annuity, when the annuitant actually survived that term. Certain annuities, as that of a minister's widow or of the widow of a writer to the signet, are, under special statutes, not arrestable, the principle of such enactments being that these are truly alimentary annuities. Annus deliberandi; is the year allowed by law to the heir to deliberate whether he will enter and represent his ancestor. The entry of an heir infers serious responsibilities, and therefore the year is allowed for consideration. The annus deliberandi commences on the death of the ancestor, unless in the case of a posthumous heir, in which case the year runs from the heir's birth. But the period for deliberating will not be extended on account of the heir's ignorance of the ancestor's death, as, for example, where the ancestor has died abroad. A poiding of the ground, however, at the instance of the predecessor's widow for her jointure may proceed against the lands within the annus deliberandi, to which process the heir may be competently made a party; M. 6876. The heir may also be charged to enter; but no procedure can follow on the charge within the year. And he may be cited in an action, provided the diet of comparance falls beyond the year; for within the year he is not bound to answer in any action in which he must appear as heir. If the apparent heir die within the year, the next heir has his own entire year, from the death of the apparent heir. The privilege of deliberating is terminated not only by the lapse of the year, but by the apparent heir's intermediate service to his predecessor, or by his incurring a passive representation; and the annus deliberandi will not interrupt the progress of an action of ranking and sale which has been raised against the predecessor. Answer; the title of a written pleading given in to a court of justice by a party, either as a replication to the claim of the pursuer, or to a statement ordered by the judge, or in support of a judgment which has been brought under review by a representation or petition.

Antichresis. In the Roman law, pactum antichreseos was an agreement, by which the creditor in a voluntary pledge had the use and profits of the thing pledged, in lieu of the interest of the debt. It might also be agreed that the surplus should go to the extinction of the debt. This pactum bore some analogy to our wadset. Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 11; Bank. vol. i. p. 384. See *Wadset. Apocha Trium Annorum. In the Roman law, three annual receipts, and, in the law of Scotland, three consecutive receipts for termly payments, raise a presumption that all prior arrears are discharged, Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 35; Mr More's Notes, p. cxxiii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 10; Menzies' Conveyancing. See Discharge.

Apparent Heir; in common language, is applied to the eldest son, as the person to whom the succession will probably open. But, in Scotch legal phraseology, an apparent heir is the person to whom the succession has actually opened, but who has not completed his title to his predecessor's estate, or taken up the succession by service, or by infeftment on a precept of clare constat. An apparent heir is entitled to the annus deliberandi, within which time he may consider the consequences of his entry, and resolve to take up or to renounce the succession. (See Annus deliberandi.) With that view, the apparent heir is entitled to pursue an action of exhibition ad deliberandum; that is, he may compel those who are possessed of his ancestor's title-deeds to produce them for his inspection and information. He may also defend the titles of his ancestor when challenged. He may draw and discharge the rents, or even pursue for them. His executor seems to be entitled to draw what may have fallen during the heir's apparenacy, and which remained undrawn at the time of his death. An apparent heir, however, cannot remove his predecessor's tenants. To enable him to do so, he must have completed his title. But in the case where the tenant has taken his lease from the apparent heir himself, during his apparenecy, the tenant cannot defend himself against a removing, by disputing the title of the person with whom he has thus contracted. An apparent heir may pursue a judicial ranking and sale of his ancestor's estate, whether it be bankrupt or not; 1695, c. 24. The expense of the action is paid from the estate, when there is no surplus after paying the creditors; but, when there is a surplus, the expense must be taken from it. An apparent heir is, in certain circumstances, entitled to an aliment from a liferenter in possession of the estate; see Aliment. He may also, in virtue of his apparenecy, reduce deathbed deeds. The creditors of an apparent heir are postponed to those of his immediate ancestor, as to the defunct's heritable estate, provided the ancestor's creditors do diligence against the apparent heir, and the real estate belonging to the deceased, within three years after his death; 1661, c. 24. The same statute declares that no right or disposition affecting the heritage of the defunct, made by an apparent heir, even after his entry and infestment, shall be valid to the prejudice of the predecessor's creditors, unless such right or disposition be made and granted a full year after the defunct's death. By the act 1695, c. 24, the onerous acts of an apparent heir, three years in possession, are rendered effectual against the estate which he possessed under his right of apparenecy; it being thereby declared, that an heir passing by his immediate ancestor, and entering to one more remote, or succeeding by adjudication on his own bond to one more remote, shall be liable for the debts and deeds of the interjected person (who has been three years in possession) to the value of the estate; but when the heir obtains possession without having completed his title, he is not held to represent the apparent heir. This is an omission in the statute. Titles of honour, leases held by his predecessor, and rights not feudal having a tract of future time, vest in the apparent heir ipso jure, and without service. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 61, and B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 54, 77; Bell's Com. i. 99, 664; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 1, et seq., and § 50; B. iv. tit. 26, § 8; Mr More's Notes, cccxxx. cccxxvi. cclviii.; Bank. vol. ii. pp. 310, 322, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1677, et seq., § 1929, et seq., and authorities there cited; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Sandford on Entails, 76, et seq., 96, et seq.; Bell on Purchaser's Title, p. 81, et seq., 2d edit.; *Watson's Stat. Appeal to the House of Lords. Appeals are competent from final judgments of the Court of Session, Court of Exchequer, and Commission of Teinds, but not from the Court of Justiciary, or from the verdict of a jury, or from the judgment of the Court of Session, reviewing a judgment of an inferior court proceeding upon a proof, in so far as it finds certain facts to be established by such proof; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 40. And when the Court of Session pronounces a judgment out of the ordinary course of its public jurisdiction, as when the parties have by agreement substituted the Court for a jury, no appeal lies; Dudgeon, &c., 1st Aug. 1854, 1 Macqueen, 714; Craig, 22d Feb. 1849, 6 Bell, 308. Appeals are also competent from interlocutory judgments of the Court of Session, if with the leave of the Division pronouncing such interlocutory judgment, or, in cases where there is a difference of opinion among the Judges, such leave, or difference of opinion, being certified by two of the counsel in the cause; 48 Geo. III., c. 151, and Standing Order of the House of Lords, 9th April 1812. As to jury causes, the result of some rather perplexing statutory enactments seems to be, 1st, That the determination of questions of law or relevancy, previous to trial, is not open to appeal without the express leave of the Court, reserving the effect of the objection in any appeal to be finally taken; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 33. 2d, In all cases of general verdicts, the order of the Court, granting or refusing a new trial, is not subject to appeal; 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 16. 3d, But if a bill of exceptions have been tendered, or a motion made for setting aside the verdict, on the ground of misdirection by the judge at the trial in matter of law, or of the undue rejection or admission of evidence, the party against whom judgment is given may appeal; 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 17; 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 7. The appeal must be presented to the House of Lords within fourteen days after the interlocutor has been pronounced, and if Parliament be not sitting, within eight days after the commencement of the next session. The case of Melrose & Co., 28th Feb. 1854, 1 Macq. 698, shows how imperative this regulation is, and that it supersedes, in so far as regards the particular appeals to which it refers, the 15th section of 48 Geo. III., c. 151, which makes it competent, when a judgment or decree is appealed from, to either party to appeal from all or any of the interlocutors that may have been pronounced in the cause, so that the whole, so far as it is necessary, may be brought under review of the House of Lords. It is competent too to appeal against a judgment pronounced upon a question as to the admissibility of evidence, reserved at a jury trial for the opinion of the Court; Matheson & Son, 27th March 1849, 6 Bell, 374. 4th, Unless in the case of bills of exceptions, or of motions for new trial on the ground of misdirection, or of the undue admission or rejection of evidence, appeal against the judgment refusing a motion for a new trial on any other ground is not competent; Macfarlane's Prac. 258. 5th, Such appeals, when otherwise competent, have the privilege of a summary hearing; 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 7. 6th, The House of Lords cannot order a new trial, unless they allow the bill of exceptions; and, in all cases where they are of opinion that the law directed at the trial, or the determination to receive or reject evidence, was correct, they are to make an order that the exception be disallowed, and the verdict carried into effect by a judgment thereon for the party in whose favour it was found; 7 Will. IV., c. 14. See also 1 Will. IV., c. 69, incorporating the Jury Court with the Court of Session: and Macfarlane's Prac. pp. 63, 258, 279. An appeal is competent against a judgment applying a verdict, where it involves a question of law arising out of the verdict; Morgan, &c., 26th July 1855, 2 Macq. 342; 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 9. An appeal to the House of Lords on the mere question of expenses is incompetent; Stand's Prac. 1029. It is also incompetent to appeal directly from an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary unreviewed by the Court. 48 Geo. III., c. 151.

A party intending to appeal must, by his agent in the Court of Session, give written notice to the agent of his adversary that a petition of appeal against the judgment will be presented on a stated day, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be; "and the day on which such notice was given shall be indorsed by the agent or agents of the petitioner on the back of the said appeal;" Standing Order, 9th April 1812. The petition of appeal (see Juridical Styles, vol. iii. p. 877) narrates the grounds of action without entering into discussion of the merits, and the procedure in it down to the date of the last interlocutor appealed from; and in cases of advocacy of an inferior court process, the interlocutors of that court, if adverse, ought also to be included in the appeal. It prays that the judgments or parts of judgments adverse to the interests of the appellant may be reversed, varied, or altered. It must be signed by two counsel, who must also certify that, in their opinion, there are reasonable grounds of appeal; and it must be presented to the House of Lords within two years from the extracting of the decree, or at least within fourteen days after the first day of the session or meeting of Parliament next ensuing the expiration of the said two years. When an appeal is taken against a judgment pronounced during the sitting of Parliament, the petition must be presented within twenty days after the date of the judgment, otherwise it cannot be received that session. Where, however, the party entitled to appeal is under age, or covert, non compos mentis, imprisoned, or out of Great Britain or Ireland, the period for appealing is extended to "two years after his full age, discoveriture, coming of sound mind, enlargement out of prison, or coming into Great Britain or Ireland, and fourteen days to be counted from and after the first days of the session or meeting of Parliament next ensuing the said two years, but not afterwards or otherwise; and it is further ordered, that in no case shall any person or persons be allowed a longer time, on account of mere absence, to lodge an appeal, than five years from the date of the last decree or interlocutor appealed against; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 25, and Standing Order, 24th March 1725, amended 22d June 1829. A petition for leave to appeal against an interlocutory judgment more than two years after its date is incompetent; 11 D. 1193.

When a petition of appeal is presented, an order of service is granted as a matter of course, and the respondent is ordered to put in his answer in four weeks. The order is served on the agent or counsel of the other party, by delivering him a copy, and showing him at the same time the original; and the service is proved by an affidavit, which may be written on the back of the order, sworn by the person who has served the warrant in presence of a judge or justice of peace. Within fourteen days from the presenting of the appeal, the appellant (with the exception of the Lord Advocate), or some responsible person for him, must enter into a recognisance to the extent of £400, to answer the expense which may be awarded to the respondent in case of an affirmance; and without this recognisance, the appeal falls. A pro forma answer is lodged by the respondent, and cases are prepared for both parties. That of the appellant must be lodged within four weeks after the time appointed for the respondent to put in his answers to the petition of appeal, under penalty of dismissal of the appeal. But the appellant may present a petition, within the prescribed time, craving a prorogation, which petition is referred to the Appeal Committee. The case of the respondent must be lodged within the same period; but non-compliance on the respondent's part only subjects him to the danger of having the cause set down for hearing ex parte, which he can remove by stating a satisfactory reason for his delay, and paying the expenses thereby occasioned to the appellant. It is ordered, that "the appellant alone, in his printed case, shall lay before this House a printed copy of the record as authenticated by the Lord Ordinary, together with a supplement containing an account, without argument or statement of other facts, of the further steps which have been taken in the cause since the record was completed; and containing also copies of the interlocutors or parts of interlocutors complained of; and each party shall, in their cases, lay before the House a copy of the case presented by them respectively to the Court of Session, if any such case was presented there, with a short summary of any additional reasons upon which he means to insist; and if there shall have been no case presented to the Court of Session, then each party shall set forth in his case the reasons upon which he founds his argument, as shortly and succinctly as possible;" Standing Order, 12th July 1811, amended by Ord. 22d June 1829, and 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 26. The case must also contain a copy of such proofs taken in the Courts below as the parties intend respectively to rely on at the hearing, together with references to the documents; Standing Orders, 24th Feb. and 8th Dec. 1813.

The cases are exchanged by the agents in London, and counsel are heard at the bar when the cause is on the list of the day for hearing, it being the duty of the appellant within a certain time to move that the cause be set down for hearing, under penalty of dismissal of his appeal; Standing Order, 29th March 1720, amended 5th April 1734. Judgment is usually pronounced soon after the hearing, affirming or reversing the judgments appealed from, or remitting the cause to the Court of Session for reconsideration. The execution of the judgment is obtained by presenting an authentic copy of it, with a petition, to the Court of Session, praying that it may be applied; and the procedure after appeal is regulated by the forms of the Court of Session and of the statute.

A successful pursuer may apply by summary petition to the Court for interim execution, pending an appeal to the House of Lords; 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 17. This statute empowers the Court to regulate all matters relative to interim possession or execution, and payment of costs and expenses already incurred, according to their sound discretion, having a due regard to the interests of the parties, as they may be affected by the affirmance or reversal of the judgment. The applicant must find caution to refund in the event of a reversal. An order for interim payment does not found a right of action in England; Patrick v. Shedden, 22 Law Journal, N. S. 283. The respondent may also apply by petition to the House of Lords to have an appeal, of which he has received notice, dismissed as incompetent and irregular. Parties are heard before the Appeal Committee, who report to the House their opinion, which is invariably adopted; or the question may be ordered to be argued at the bar of the House; and if the appeal be dismissed, a certificate to that effect is furnished to the respondent, and the interlocutor or decree appealed from is revived, to the same effect as if no appeal had been entered. Provision is made for appeals "dismissed for want of prosecution," by 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 20. Where a respondent desires to present a cross-appeal, this must be done within a fortnight after his answer is given in to the original appeal. It is presented, and an order made as upon the appellant's petition. Recognisance is not necessary, nor is an additional case from either party required.

An appeal to the House of Lords does not remove the process from the Court of Session as regards any point not necessarily dependent upon the interlocutor submitted to review; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 13. The interlocutor of the Inner-House, pronounced on review of the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary closing the record, is not appealable as an interlocutory judgment; Ibid. § 5. In processes of cessio, a petition of appeal must be lodged within ten days from the date of the judgment during the sitting of Parliament, if it sit for so many days, otherwise within six days after the next session shall have met; 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, § 19.

Appeal to Circuit Court. The Jurisdiction Act (20 Geo. II., c. 43) allows an appeal to be taken to the Circuit Court of Justiciary; 1st, In criminal cases against the judgment of an inferior court, inferring neither death nor demembration; and, 2d, In civil causes, where the sum in dispute does not exceed £12 sterling (extended to £25 sterling by 54 Geo. III., 67, § 5). These appeals must be lodged with the clerk of the inferior court, within ten days after the judgment has been pronounced; and the adverse party, or his agent, and the inferior judge himself (where the appeal contains any conclusion against him), must be served with a copy of the appeal fifteen days at least before the sitting of the circuit court. No such appeal is competent except against a final judgment of the inferior court; i. e., a judgment by which the merits of the cause, as well as the expenses, are disposed of; but it is not necessary that expenses, where found due, be taxed and decreed for; Dundee Whale Fishing Company, 13th Oct. 1848, Shaw's Just. Rep. 15. By the Acts of Sederunt regulating inferior courts, these appeals in civil causes may be taken and minuted in open Court, at the time of pronouncing the judgment; or they may be taken by lodging a written appeal in the hands of the clerk of Court, and serving a duplicate of it upon the opposite party or his procurator, personally, or at his dwelling-house, and in either case within ten days after the date of the sentence, and fifteen days at least before the sitting of the Circuit Court. Along with his appeal the appellant must lodge a bond of caution for answering and abiding by the judgment of the Circuit Court, and for costs, should they be awarded, the circuit judges being empowered to award the opposite party's expenses against the appellant. In point of form these appeals are variously framed; but in general they are short and articulate, containing a series of reasons of appeal, and a prayer for recal or alteration of the judgment. The circuit judges must proceed with such cases summarily; and their decision is final, and not subject to review of any kind. But in cases of difficulty, the case, where a criminal one, may be certified to the High Court of Justiciary; and where civil, to the Division of the Court of Session to which the judge who hears the appeal belongs; the judgment of the Court on the point so certified being also final. Where the sentence of the inferior court is recalled, and the case does not appear to the circuit judge to be matured, he may recal the judgment appealed from, and remit to the inferior court with instructions; and under such a remit, if the question of expenses be reserved, the inferior judge has power to decern for the expenses incurred in the Circuit Court; but in that case, as the sentence appealed from is recalled, the cautioner in the appeal will not be liable for the expenses. Here, as in advocations, it is to the conclusions of the summons or original petition in the cause that regard must be had in estimating the £25. If the sum concluded for (exclusive of the conclusion for expenses of process) exceed £25, or where no particular sum is concluded for, if the subject-matter of the action truly exceeds £25 in value, the appeal is incompetent. The act 20 Geo. II., c. 43, has been held not to warrant appeals from the sentences of justices of the peace to the Circuit Court; nor from the sentence of the water-bailie of Glasgow, nor, so far as appears, from a judgment of the dean of guild; per curiam, in Donaldson, 21st Nov. 1828 7 S. 41. Neither is it competent to appeal a case of nuisance; or an action of removing or ejection. The entry of an appeal to the Circuit Court, which has not been insisted in, or which has been dismissed as incompetent, is no bar to an advocacy, where that mode of review is otherwise competent.

By 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 22, it is declared not to be competent to remove from a sheriff court, or to bring under review of the Court of Session, or of the Circuit Court of Justiciary, or of any other court or tribunal whatever, by advocacy, appeal, suspension, or reduction, or in any other manner or way, any cause not exceeding the value of £25 sterling, or any interlocutor, judgment, or decree, pronounced in such cause by the sheriff. This prohibition excludes all appeals to the circuit from the sheriff, but not from magistrates of burghs; and it does not exclude appeals from the sheriff's judgment in the Small Debt Court, upon the limited ground of review stated in 1 Vict., c. 41; 2 Irvine's Rep. 156. See 20 Geo. II., c. 43; 31 Geo. II., c. 42; 54 Geo. III., c. 67, § 5; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; A. S. 10th July 1839; *Ersk. Appeal. Appeals in Sheriff Courts are now regulated by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80. It is competent to appeal to the Sheriff any interlocutor disposing in whole or in part of the merits of the cause. But by § 19, it is enacted that, until such an interlocutor has been pronounced, it shall not be competent to appeal against any interlocutor, not being one—(1.) Disposing of a dilatory defence; or (2.) Sisting process; or (3.) Allowing a proof; or against any interlocutor on the admissibility of evidence pronounced during the leading of a proof, except as provided for in §§ 17 and 18; but that it shall be competent, in every case in which an appeal against an interlocutor is taken, also to appeal against all or any of the interlocutors previously pronounced. By § 17, it is not competent, prior to the closing of the proof, to appeal to the Sheriff against any interlocutor on the admissibility of evidence pronounced during the leading of the proof; but it is competent to appeal on the proof being declared closed, or within seven days thereafter. § 18 provides that nothing in the act shall preclude any person pleading confidentiality, or objecting to produce writings on pleas of hypothec, or otherwise, from taking to review any judgment of the Sheriff-substitute or Sheriff disposing of such pleas;

but such judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is only reviewable by appeal taken at the time in open Court, and minuted. By § 16 it is enacted, that an appeal to the Sheriff must be entered within seven days from the date of the interlocutor. Within eight days thereafter, the appellant may either lodge a reclaiming petition, or intimate his desire to be heard orally, and the Sheriff disposes of the case on reclaiming petition, or reclaiming petition and answers, or on the oral debate. If there is no reclaiming petition, and no intimation from either party of a desire to be heard orally, the Sheriff may dispose of the case without farther argument. For the mode of review of decrees of the Sheriff-substitute granting cessio, see 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 7. No appeal to the Sheriff is competent against judgments of the Sheriff-substitute in summary removings from premises let for less than a year under 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, except when such actions have been remitted to the ordinary roll; A. S. 1839, § 149. See M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Prac. p. 301. See also Reclaiming Petition. Cessio. Sequestration.

Appeal; in the old criminal law of England, was a vindictive action at the suit of the party injured by some heinous offence, in which the appellant, instead of merely seeking pecuniary compensation, as in civil actions, demanded the punishment of the criminal. Tomlins, h. t.

Appearance; in legal phraseology, means the stating of a defence in a cause. Where a defender states a defence, he is said to have appeared; and, in consequence of that appearance, the judgment pronounced becomes a decree in foro, and cannot be opened up when allowed to become final, unless where new facts have come to the knowledge of the party. An exception to this rule is also admitted, where decree has been pronounced against a party in consequence of his inability through poverty to carry on his case. See Ballenden v. Duke of Argyll, 6th July 1792; M. p. 7252; Shand's Prac. 284, 311, 314; M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Prac. 198, 305; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80.

Appellant; is the party by whom an appeal is made: the other party in the proceedings in the House of Lords is termed the respondent.

Appenage; a child's part or portion, and properly the portion of the King's younger children in France. Tomlins, h. t.

Apprehending of a Debtor; is the act of arresting a debtor under a legal warrant, on account of his failure to pay the debt. This may be done in certain cases under an act of warding (see Act of Warding), but formerly the ordinary warrant for apprehending a debtor was a caption issued in the sovereign's name, and under the signet, charging messengers-at-arms to apprehend and imprison the debtor, and to call upon magistrates for assistance in doing so. Letters of caption are still competent; but under the Personal Diligence Act (1 and 2d Vict., c. 114), within year and day of the expiration of a charge to the debtor upon the extracts set forth in the act, the extract and execution of charge may be recorded in the Register of Hornings; and on presenting the extract, execution, and certificate of registration in the Bill-Chamber, with a minute endorsed in the terms of schedule 4 annexed to the act, the Clerk of the Bill-Chamber writes his "fiat" on the extract, which is now the usual warrant for imprisonment. A similar course is competent in Sheriff Courts in regard to the extracts of Sheriff Court decrees, or extracts from Sheriff Court books; and also with regard to the imprisonment of Crown debtors by 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56 (Court of Exchequer Act). All magistrates and sheriffs are bound, when required, to assist in executing a caption, under pain, on refusal, of being made responsible for the debt. The messenger-at-arms who is entrusted with the caption or warrant, and his cautioner, are liable to pay the debt, if the messenger delays to execute the warrant after having received instructions to do so; Bell's Com. vol. ii., p. 543, 5th edit. Imprisonment for debt being one of the proofs of notour bankruptcy under the act 1696, c. 5, and the law having recognised a species of constructive imprisonment, it is of importance to attend to the manner of apprehending the debtor. According to the most regular form, there are three successive steps in apprehension—1st, The display of the blazon; 2d, Showing the warrant; 3d, Touching the debtor with the wand of peace, after which he is held in law to be in custody; and should he thereafter escape and take refuge in the sanctuary, the messenger may follow and seize him there, and take him to prison. A sist on a bill of suspension, obtained by the debtor posterior to such apprehension, will not prevent his incarceration, a bill of suspension and liberation, where there are grounds for it, being then the remedy. Either the regular apprehending, or the actual incarceration, has been held sufficient to render the debtor notour bankrupt. The apprehension, however, requires to be in all respects formal. Bell's Com. ii. p. 169, 5th edit.; Ersk. B. iv. t. 1, § 42, and Notes by Mr Ivory. In the case, however, of Scott, 18th Jan. 1855, 17 D. 292, it was held that it is not essential to the validity of such a constructive imprisonment that the messenger-at-arms in executing the diligence make use of his wand of peace. By the Bankruptcy Act, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, it is now enacted, that, on and after 1st Nov. 1856, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted, inter alia, by insolvency concurring with a duly executed charge for payment, followed by imprisonment or formal and regular apprehension of the debtor, § 7. Peers and married women are secured against personal execution on civil debts—also pupils by special statute, 1696, c. 41. A warrant to imprison for civil debt cannot legally be executed on Sunday. 2 Bell's Com. 569, 5th edit. For an exception to this, see Meditationes Jurae. See also Bankrupt. Imprisonment.

Apprentice. An apprentice is one who engages by indenture to serve a master for a certain number of years, in order to be instructed in some profession, art, or manufacture, which the master becomes bound to teach him. The terms of such an engagement, as to its endurance, apprentice-fee, the recompense given to the apprentice, &c., must depend on the nature of the employment, and the particular agreement of the parties. Though a pupil (that is, a boy under fourteen, or a girl under twelve, years of age) may enter into an indenture, yet he must have the concurrence of a parent or tutor, who alone can be liable in the penalty for the non-performance of the engagements on the part of the apprentice. After pupilarity, when the minor has no curators, he may effectually enter into an indenture, the conditions of which will bind him. Where the apprentice deserts his service, the master is entitled to the apprentice-fee, without deduction. In England, it would appear, that, by a general law, an apprentice serves during seven years for a privilege which extends over all England; whereas in Scotland, an apprentice by his service acquires merely the privilege of his master's incorporation in the particular burgh where he has served, and in which his master carries on his business. At common law an apprentice cannot enlist, or enter the royal navy; and by 9 Geo. IV., c. 4, § 103, apprentices who enlist are liable to be punished not only as having obtained money under false pretences, but also with imprisonment and hard labour for two years, besides being liable to serve as soldiers when their apprenticeship expires, and seizable as deserters, if they do not then deliver themselves up to an officer authorized to receive recruits. *Tomlins, h. t.; Ersk. Approbate and Reprobate. A person is said to approve and reprobate, where he takes the advantage of one part of a deed, but rejects the rest. A deed must be taken altogether, or rejected altogether. To this doctrine there is an apparent exception in the case of an heir founding upon a deathbed deed in so far as it revokes a prior deed which is to his prejudice, but reducing it in so far as he is also prejudiced by it. In such a case it is held that the ancestor having himself revoked the prior deed, it is in the same position as if it had been cancelled by him, or had never existed. The revocation is the act of the ancestor himself, and the prior deed being thus out of the way, the heir is entitled to reduce the deathbed deed as, 1 L. C. 617, being to his prejudice, although the prior deed was equally prejudicial to him. This apparent exception to the rule of approve and reprobate was established by the House of Lords in the case of Crawford v. Coutts.

In that case the heir pleaded that the doctrine of approve and reprobate could not apply, because he did not claim the estate under either of the deeds executed by his ancestor, but in virtue of his right as heir-at-law. The donee of the ancestor pleaded, on the other hand, that the revocation of the prior deed and the conveyance by the new deed were "partes ejusdem negotii," and could not be separated,—that the revocation was made for the sole purpose of giving effect to the new conveyance,—and that, if the latter was ineffectual, so also must the former be held to be. The Court decided in favour of the donee under the deathbed deed. The heir having appealed to the House of Lords, the case was remitted for the purpose of parties being reheard. In moving the remit Lord Rosslyn, C., delivered an opinion adverse to the judgment, and observed:—"The respondent founded part of his argument upon what is termed in Scots law the maxim of approbate and reprobate. Says Mr Coutts, 'If you approbate the revocation of the deed to Sir Hugh, contained in the posterior deed in my favour, then you cannot reprobate the other clauses of that deed.' But this is false reasoning. The Court cannot say to the heir-at-law—Under what deed do you claim? It is enough for him to say—God and nature have made me heir-at-law, show me by what deed my right is cut off. The title of an heir-at-law is always complete, inasmuch that a conveyance or devise to such heir in fee is held null, and of no avail. The law of England in such a case says, the heir is in by descent, and not by purchase." On the case returning to the Court below parties were reheard, when the Court adhered to their former judgment; and the heir having again appealed, the judgment was reversed. Lord Eldon, C., observed:—"I think that this is not a case where the doctrine of approbate and reprobate will apply. The heir does not claim under the deathbed deed. He says, 'Your deed does not give you a title unless you can show me a deed executed in liege pousie existing at the death of the granter. If there be no such deed, the deed executed on deathbed is gone.'" See L. C. vol. i. p. 617. The doctrine established in the case of Crawford v. Coutts was applied in the subsequent case of Bailey v. Small, Feb. 1, 1815, and again in Mudie v. Moir, March 1, 1824, 2 S. Ap. 9. In this last case the conveyance in the deathbed deed was in favour of the same party as in the prior but revoked deed, but making certain alterations on some of the other interests provided in that deed. The donee pleaded that the second deed being substantially the same with the prior one, the heir's right of challenge was excluded. The Lord Ordinary decided in favour of the heir, but the Second Division of the Court was equally divided in opinion, and one of the Lords Ordinary having been called in, he concurred in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in the cause. On appeal this judgment was confirmed. Lord Eldon, C., observed:—"There is this peculiarity in the law of Scotland, that though a deed is bad as a deathbed deed, it may be good for one purpose, that is to say, that the heir-at-law can insist that it is a good deed, provided the effect of it be to revoke a former settlement, though in itself it would be bad. In this case it has been strongly contended that it ought not to operate as a revocation, although there are express words of revocation in it, because there had been a former deed, and that it was an affirmance of that former deed. Now, in truth, in respect of that, there is hardly a single interest which is given in the former deed, which is not somehow in its nature and quality altered by this. It does therefore appear to me, that whatever might be the case—in respect of which I beg to be understood to give no opinion whatever—if the dispositions had been exactly the same,—I give no opinion whatever upon the principles which might or might not apply to such a case,—they do not apply to this case; and, therefore, however much I may regret the hardship of the case, it appears to me your Lordships can give no other judgment but that of affirmance of this judgment."

In Anderson v. Fleming, May 17, 1833, the deathbed deed was almost identical with the one executed in liege pousie. It, however, contained a revocation of all former deeds of settlement. Lord Moncrieff, Ordinary, ordered cases to the Court on the question, "Whether the prior deed was to be considered as so effectually revoked by the clause of revocation in the deathbed deed as to entitle the pursuer, as the heir-at-law, to reduce the last deed as an independent deed to his prejudice, executed on deathbed?" The Court decided in favour of the heir-at-law. Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle observed:—"I have paid every attention to the argument that there is a distinction between the principle in the case of Moir and Mudie and this, but I can see no ground for it whatever. It is settled law that the plea of approbate and reprobate does not apply, and the decisions in the cases of Bailey, and of Moir and Mudie, though in the latter there was a variation in the deeds, go to the same principle, as stated by the Lord Ordinary, viz., That in all the cases the Court never entered into the view of the supposed intention of the testator. Then that being decided, all that is said on the other side is, that Lord Chancellor Eldon, according to his uniform practice of not deciding any cause not actually before him, refrained from giving an opinion as not necessary to the decision. And I have not seen any authority for departing in this case from the principle in the cases of Bailey, and Moir and Mudie, that the revocation being absolute, effect must be given to it."

In the cases just cited, the prior deed was revoked by an express clause of revocation in the deathbed deed; but a different rule is applied where the revocation is not express, but implied merely from the execution of a subsequent deed. In such a case the right of the heir is not restored, and he is not entitled to reduce the subsequent deed on the head of deathbed. This rule was established in the case of Rowan v. Alexander, Nov. 12, 1775. The defence was, that as the first deed was not expressly revoked by the last, the first should still subsist, although the second should be taken out of the way, a virtual revocation not being sufficient. The defence was sustained on the ground, that, since the deathbed deed contained no revocation of the former one, it could not subsist as a revocation after it was cut down on the head of deathbed. This judgment was disapproved of by Lord ROSSLYN, C., who, in the case of Crawford v. Coutts, observed:—"The Court of Session here made a distinction between an express revocation and an implied one, which I confess I do not feel. If a person makes a disposition of his estate and locks it up in his repositories, and at the distance of ten years makes another disposition of the same estate, I should be of opinion that the former deed was revoked, and that the posterior one must take effect." Lord ELDON, C., also disapproved of the judgment in Rowan v. Alexander; and in the subsequent stage of Crawford v. Coutts, observed:—"It was said in that case that there was no express revocation; but it is difficult to perceive what could be a more express revocation than giving the estate wholly to another. That case must now be held to stand upon the principle that the testator did not mean the former deed to be revoked, unless the second deed was found to be good; and expressing nothing as to a revocation of the former deed must be held to have meant in effect that both should stand to accomplish the purpose he wanted of giving the estate to the donee in the last deed. This would apply also to the case of the donee under the second deed being unwilling to take, or incapable of taking. But the same principle will not apply to a case of express revocation." In the same case his Lordship also intimated, that though he disapproved of the judgment in Rowan v. Alexander, he would hold the point determined by it to be the law, and observed:—"There is a manifest difference between what might have been fit and proper to be done when that case was recent, and what may be so at this day. No man can say that many titles may not rest on the principle of that case of Rowan v. Alexander." See L. C. vol. i. p. 635. Accordingly, the principle of that case was applied in the case of Reesburghe v. Wauchope, May 25, 1820, where the judgment of the Court in favour of the donee was affirmed in the House of Lords. In moving the affirmance, Lord ELDON, C., observed:—"As to the question of implied revocation, if we are to act on the maxim of Stare decisis, the judgment cannot be disturbed. The deed in liege poustie reserves a power of revocation. By making another disposition under the authority of the power, it must be supposed that the donee intended to do something effectual, and it cannot be implied that, by the exercise of the power, he meant to revoke it. L. C. vol. i. p. 665."

The doctrine of election in England is similar to that of approbate and reprobate in Scotland, but a difference occurs in the application of it in certain cases. Thus, where a deed is inoperative to carry real property, the heir is not put to his election unless there is an express condition attached to the bequest in his favour, to the effect that he shall convey the real property according to the wish of the testator. The ground for limiting the doctrine of election in such a case is, that the will, being improbate, is so completely void as to the real estate, that it cannot be read so as to raise the implied condition arising from the disposal of it, and that the deed is therefore to be dealt with as if it had contained no disposal of the real estate, and only a personal bequest in favour of the heir. This limitation of the doctrine was first applied by Lord HARDWICKE, in Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 695. In that case an infant had made a disposition of her inheritance, which in law is null. Lord HARDWICKE decided that the heir was not obliged to elect, and observed:—"Where a man executes a will in the presence of two witnesses only, and devises his real estate from his heir-at-law, and the personal estate to the heir-at-law, this is a good will as to personal estate, yet, for want of being executed according to the Statute of Frauds, is bad as to the real estate; and I should, in that case, be of opinion that the devisee of the real estate could not compel the heir-at-law to make good the devise of the real estate before he could be entitled to his personal legacy, because there is no will of the real estate, for want of the proper forms and ceremonies required by the statute. In the present case there is no instrument which could pass the real estate." Where, however, there is an express condition annexed to a bequest to the heir-at-law, he cannot take the bequest without complying with the condition; and therefore if the condition is to the effect that the heir shall convey the real estate to the party named by the testator, he must execute such conveyance before being entitled to the bequest. This distinction was established in the case of Boughton v. Boughton, 2 Vesey, 12. In that case the will purported to give the real estate to the testator, but was not executed agreeable to the Statute of Frauds. It, however, expressly directed that if any who received benefit by the will should dispute any part of it, they should forfeit all claim under it. It was held that, there being an express condition in this case attached to the bequest to the heir, he was bound to elect. Lord HARDWICKE observed:—"In the case of Hearle v. Greenbank, my opinion was grounded upon there being no instrument executed sufficient to pass land, and there were none of the cases in which it was determined that there should be such an election, but where there was a will concerning land, but that there was no ground for the Court to imply a condition to abide by a will of land when there was none; but that it would be dangerous to break in on the Statute of Frauds to make an estate pass by instrument not sufficient to pass real estate—not by the words of the testator, but by a condition implied by the construction of the Court. Therefore it could not be, nor was it, warranted by any proceeding; for it was only guessing at the intent of the testator, who might leave it for that very reason. But the question is, Whether this case did not differ from that from the express clause in the will? In the case of Hearle v. Greenbank, where the Court were to make such a construction by implication from the face of the instrument itself, the Court must see the will, and could not know or take notice of a will of real estate. But here, if there is such a condition annexed to a personal legacy, the Court must consider every part of that, whether it is a matter relating to real estate or not. You must read the whole will relating to the personal legacy, let it relate to what it will; which is a substantial difference, and will prevent going too far to break in upon the Statute of Frauds, and at the same time will allow natural justice, which requires, as far as may be, such a construction to be made, otherwise the intent of the statute may be overturned.”

The soundness of this distinction in the doctrine of election in England has been frequently doubted; but, being once established, it has been thought advisable that it should be retained. In Carey v. Askew, 1 Cox, Lord KENYON, Master of the Rolls, observed:—“As to the question of election, the cases which have been decided are certainly great authorities; but I must confess I should have had great difficulty in making the same distinction if they had come before me. They have said, You shall not look into a will unattested so as to raise the condition which would be implied from the devise, if it had appeared; but if you give a legacy on condition that the legatee shall give the lands, the heir must elect. However, I am bound, by the force of those authorities, to take no notice whatever of the unattested will, as far as it relates to the freehold estates, and therefore the plaintiff cannot be put to his election.” In Brodie v. Barry, 2 Ves. & Ben. 127, Sir WILLIAM GRANT observed:—“I do not understand why a will, though not executed so as to pass real estate, should not be read, for the purpose of discovering in it an implied condition concerning real estate annexed to a gift of personal estate, as it is admitted it must when such condition is expressed to such gift. For if by sound construction such condition is rightly inferred, the effect seems to be the same as if it were expressed in words.”

The case of Kerrs v. Wauchope, affirmed in the House of Lords, 1 Bligh, 1, was the case of two heirs-portioners, who, having reduced a deathbed deed in so far as it affected the heritage of the testator, still claimed an interest under the deed. It was held that they could not approbate and reprobate the deathbed deed. Lord ELDON, C., observed:—“It is equally settled in the law of Scotland and of England that no person can accept and reject the same instrument. If a testator gives his estate to A, and gives A's estate to B, courts of equity hold it to be against conscience that he should take the estate bequeathed to him, and at the same time refuse to give effect to the implied conditions contained in the will of the testator. The Court therefore will not permit him to take that which cannot be his but by virtue of the disposition of the will, and at the same time to seize what by the same will is given, or intended to be given, to another; it being contrary to the established principles of equity that he should enjoy the benefit, while he rejects the conditions of the gift. As to the difficulty raised from the invalidity of the deed to carry land, from which it is inferred that that part of the deed is to be held pro non scripto, the distinctions are undoubtedly thin and unsubstantial, it having been held that, although a will be not duly executed according to the statute to affect land, yet if by the same will personality is given upon condition that the legatee shall convey land, in such case, inasmuch as the condition of personality cannot be read without reading at the same time the condition on which it is given; the giving of the condition is inseparable; and such was the feeling of Sir William Grant in Barry's case.” The case of Kerrs v. Wauchope, however, was not the case of heritage conveyed by an informal or improbativ deed, but the case of a deathbed deed which is not null in law, but only reducible at the instance of the heir of the investiture to whose prejudice it is granted. Accordingly Lord ELDON observed:—“There is besides a ground on which this case may be consistently determined, namely, that a deathbed deed is not null, but only voidable, and in many cases will regulate the succession, and the doctrine is directly applicable to prevent the Ladies Kerr from claiming under this deed while they have repudiated any part of the succession, and while they have made this election to reject.”

The importance of this difference between the English doctrine of election and the Scots doctrine of approbate and reprobate arises, when the testator, whose will is under consideration of the courts in Scotland, has died domiciled in England. In such a case the will is construed according to the law of England, and it is left to English lawyers to say whether, by the English law, the heir would be put to his election or not. Accordingly, in the case of Trotter v. Trotter, Dec. 5, 1826, 5 S. 72, which was the case of the will of a party who had died domiciled in India, and which was ineffectual to convey heritable bonds in Scotland, the opinion of English counsel was taken, whether, according to the law of England, the heir would have been obliged to elect between the heritable bonds and his interest under the will. The opinion returned was in favour of the heir, and judgment was pronounced accordingly. Lord ALLOWAY dissented, and observed:—"I perfectly agree with the opinion of the English counsel consulted here, that the heir is entitled to take under the settlement, and also as heir-at-law, if it was not the intention of the testator to dispose of the heritable property by that settlement, and so far I think it right to follow the English law, which, however, agrees with our own. But when we come to ascertain what was the intention of the deceased, I conceive that we are entitled to throw out of view the technicalities of the English law, which seem in a great measure to depend on whether the property be freehold or copyhold, and whether there be two or three witnesses, and to judge of the intention for ourselves. The will here is a military testament made in a remote colony, and no technical language is used in it. I know it cannot carry the real estate, but the intention to do so is clear. All I ask is to construe the will according to the fair colloquial meaning of the language; and in this view the intention to settle his whole estate in Scotland, as well as elsewhere, is evident." On appeal, the judgment of the Court was affirmed. Lord ELDON, C., observed:—"The question is simply a question of construction—Does it appear upon the face of the will that it was the intention of the testator to dispose of these heritable bonds? Now, the rule of law in England, with respect to subjects of this kind, is well ascertained and well defined, and it is this—That you are not to proceed by probability or conjecture, but that there must be a clear and manifest expression of the intention on the face of the will to include that property which is not properly devised before the heir can be put to his election." The ground, however, on which it must be held that the intention to include the heritable bonds was not clearly expressed was just this, that they had not "been properly devised" in respect that the will was inoperative to carry heritable property in Scotland. This is clear from the opinion of English counsel on which the judgment proceeded, and which is in these terms:—"Considering heritable bonds in Scotland as real estate to which the heir-at-law is entitled, unless they are conveyed away by his ancestor with due solemnities, we think the heir-at-law would be entitled in this case to claim them without being put to his election, if the question had occurred in a court of justice in England."

The case of Dundas v. Dundas, 7 S. 241, was the case of a party domiciled in Scotland conveying by his settlement real property in England, but which was ineffectual to do so, not being attested by three witnesses, according to the law of England. In this case, the Court decided without taking the opinion of English counsel, on the ground, that the testator being a domiciled Scotsman, his will fell to be construed according to the law of Scotland; and applying the doctrine of approbate and reprobate, they decided against the heir. Lord J. C. BOYLE observed:—"This is a Scotch deed, and we must determine as to the intention expressed in it, according to the principles of the law of Scotland alone; and it is clear that the intention of General Dundas was to pass all his estates, and he attempts to convey a landed estate in England, which he does ineffectually, but the intention is clear. Then the question comes to be, Is the heir entitled to take the English property in face of his father's intention expressed in the trust-deed, and also to claim a share of the other funds under that deed? I am decidedly of opinion that this would be to approbate and reprobate the same deed, and that he must therefore collate the English estate, or give up his claim for a share of the trust-funds." Lord PITMILLY observed:—"The case of Trotter is just the converse of this; and the same principle which led us to decide by the English law there leads here to a decision according to the Scotch law. Then, if it be a question of Scotch law, there cannot be the slightest doubt." In the House of Lords, it was contended for the heir-at-law, that, as the case related to real estate in England, it must be dealt with according to the law of England, and that according to that law, as the trust-deed was improbativ to the effect of transferring the estate in England, it could not be dealt with as probative to the effect of establishing that it was the intention of the testator to convey that estate to his trustees, but that the deed being improbativ as to the alleged act of transfer, it must be read as if that property had not been mentioned in it. In affirming the judgment of the Court below, Lord LYNCHURST, C., observed:—"If this decision should stand, it will not by any means tend to show that the Court of Session has a right to set aside in any manner the Statute of Frauds as to a will with respect to an English freehold estate. The decision does not infringe on the English law, it only operates on Scotch personalities and Scotch reality, over which the Scotch Courts have an undoubted right, and they say, 'We, according to your principle, take the whole of this deed together. We do not say the deed has any effect on landed estates any more than Lord Kenyon said in the case of Carey v. Askew, that the will would affect an English estate. We do not say that this would take, in an English Court, from the heir-at-law his landed estates; but we are called upon to construe, according to the principles of our law, the Scotch deed; and knowing it to be a Scotch deed, we say, by the principles of Scotch law, not that you shall not have your estate in England, but that you shall not have your Scotch share unless you bind yourself to fulfil what we call and construe to be the plain intent of the party.' It is taking up the matter upon the condition: the personal and real estate in Scotland the Court of Session can deal with, but not this English landed estate, except so far as the Court makes the vesting of the estate, real and personal estate, or the share of it, to depend upon the voluntary act of relinquishing the English right. Now, as I am not prepared to say that the Scotch Court has not that power, and as I am prepared to say that they can exercise that power without violating the English law upon the ground stated, I should incline humbly to advise your Lordships to affirm the judgment."

Where an heir repudiates his ancestor's settlement, and takes the heritage which was intended for another party, the question arises—What is to become of the portion of the succession intended for the heir but forfeited by him by his repudiation of the settlement? By the repudiation of the heir the scope of the settlement is deranged, and the intentions of the testator are frustrated. Does the portion of the succession forfeited by the heir lapse, and is it to be dealt with as if forming part of an intestate succession; or is it to be given to the party who is prejudiced by the heir's repudiation as a surrogation or compensation for what he has lost? Equity determines in favour of the latter view, on the principle, that to do so would be to follow out, as nearly as possible, the presumable intention of the testator. The objection to doing so is, that the Court would be making a will for the testator, and not giving effect to the will left by him. But effect cannot be given to the will left by the testator, in consequence of the derangement of the settlement produced by the heir's repudiation of it. As, therefore, the state of matters is different from what was contemplated by the testator, the heir's repudiation not having been anticipated by him, it comes to be a question in equity, Whether the derangement produced by that repudiation ought not to be lessened by transferring to the party prejudiced by the repudiation the share forfeited by the heir repudiating. This course has been adopted in the law of England, and is called the doctrine of compensation—a doctrine engrafted on the primary one of election. In Kerrs v. Wauchope, 1 Bligh, 1, Lord ELDON observed:—"A question then arises, What is to become of the life-interest, which the appellants cannot take either as legatees or as next of kin? In our Courts we have engrafted on the primary doctrine of election the equity, as it may be termed, of compensation. Suppose a testator gives his estate to A, and directs that A's estate should be given to B. If the devisee will not comply with the provision of the will, another condition is implied as arising out of the will, that, inasmuch as the testator meant that his heir-at-law should not take his estate, which he gives to A in consideration of A giving his estate to B, if A refuse to comply with the will, B shall be compensated by taking the property, or the value of the property, which the testator meant for him, out of the estate devised, though he cannot have it out of the estate intended for him. The Court has not yet determined whether the respondents are or are not entitled to take a compensation until the death of the survivor of the appellants. The Court below having given no opinion, it is impossible we can give an opinion on that point. It is for their determination in the first instance. The cause must, in point of form, be remitted, with a view to have that question decided. It appears to me very easy of solution." The question, however, was not decided on the remit. The term "compensation" has not been adopted by the law of Scotland, but the equitable principle implied in that term exists, and is founded on the presumable intention of the testator in the unprovided-for event of his settlement being repudiated by his heir. Accordingly, in the case of M'Innes v. Macallisters, June 29, 1827, 5 S. 801, the liferent of a sum of money which had been bequeathed to the heir-at-law, but which was forfeited in consequence of his taking as heir an estate which had been left to another party, was transferred to that party as a partial compensation for what she had lost. The same principle was applied in the case of Peat v. Peat, Feb.

14, 1839, D. i. 508, where a widow having repudiated her husband's settlement, and thereby forfeited her interest under it, which consisted of the life-rent of a sum of money, it was held that the interest so forfeited did not accrue to the legatees to whom the principal sum had been bequeathed, but that it accrued to the residuary legatees, who were the parties whose interest under the settlement had been impaired by the reprobatory act of the widow. Lord GILLIES observed:—"There is no ground, either in law or equity, for holding that the parties to whom the principal of the sum affording those life-interests was provided by the settlement, are entitled to benefit by the widow's exercise of her right. The reprobatory act occasioned great loss to the residuary legatees. It occasioned no loss whatever to the special legatees; and I can see no ground for holding that it should in any way redound to their benefit. Their whole right under the settlement in the £2000 was to obtain payment of it after the death of the widow. It is true that, since the testator's death, his widow has repudiated the settlement, and carried off a large portion of what was destined to the residuary legatees; but surely the fact that the widow has caused the residuary legatees to get less than the testator designed for them, is no reason why the special legatees, by a second and unnecessary deviation from his will, should get more than he ever intended for them."

In the case of Breadalbane's Trustees v. Pringle, Jan. 15, 1841, 3 D. 357, the testator had directed his trustees to pay over the free rents of his unentailed lands to his two daughters equally between them while both should be in life, and to the survivor, and to continue to do so as long as both or either of them should be alive. One of the daughters successfully claimed her legitim, contrary to the scope of the settlement of her father, and thereby forfeited her interest in the bequest. The other daughter then claimed the whole of the rents of the unentailed lands, on the ground that the settlement contained no direction regarding the half of the rents which her sister had forfeited. It was held, however, that her interest was not enlarged by the forfeiture of her sister's interest, but that the forfeiture operated during the lifetime of that sister in favour of the heirs of entail, who had been prejudiced by the legitim having been claimed. Lord MEDWYN observed:—"It is argued, that if the claim of the trustees was to be sustained, it would be making a will for the testator different from what he has made, and different perhaps from what he would have made if he had anticipated the event which has occurred.

But this argument will apply with equal force to the claim on the other side. During the lifetime of her sister, Lady Elizabeth Pringle was only to have the half of the rents, and it cannot possibly be discovered, from the tenor of these settlements, that if the Marquis had known that the Duchess of Buckingham would claim her legitim, and therefore interfere with the purpose of the trust, his meaning would have been to enlarge Lady Elizabeth's provision by one-half. On the contrary, as his object had been to leave his personal succession, free from any claim of legitim, for the benefit of the heirs of entail, when that object was in part defeated by this claim, it is natural to suppose that he would wish the forfeited interest in the unentailed rents to go into the general trust, to supply in part what had been taken out of it against his will. This principle of surrogatum was given effect to in the case of Kerrs v. Wauchope, 3d May 1819, in the House of Lords; of Macalister, 29th June 1827; and of Peat, Feb. 14, 1839."

In the case of Nisbet's Trustees v. Nisbet, Dec. 5, 1851, 14 D. 145, a testator directed his heritable and moveable estate to be divided between the children of his two brothers and sister, and declared that, should either of his brothers or sister challenge the settlement, they should forfeit all right under it for themselves and their families. The eldest brother obtained a reduction of the settlement, in so far as it conveyed heritage, on the head of deathbed, and thereby forfeited his children's share of the succession. The next of kin of the testator then claimed the forfeited share, on the ground that the settlement contained no provision that the forfeited share should be divided among the other beneficiaries, and that, therefore, so far as regarded that share, the testator must be held to have died intestate. It was held, however, that the forfeited share did not fall to be divided between the next of kin, as being intestate succession, but fell to be paid to the beneficiaries under the trust-deed, to whose prejudice the reduction of the settlement, on the head of death-bed, had operated. Lord FULLERTON observed:—"I must hold that the forfeiture was presumably intended for the benefit of the remaining legatees, and most certainly not for the benefit of the next of kin, who have no interest whatever under the settlement; and I think this is the principle which we may extract from the different decisions referred to of Kerr, Macalister, Peat, and Breadalbane. None of them, perhaps, are in point; but all of them will be found to involve this principle, that the forfeiture or repudiation of a settlement by a party interested in it will not confer on any party a benefit not contemplated by the settlement, at the expense of the parties whose interests have been diminished by the challenge of the settlement occasioning the forfeiture. I think this principle, perfectly sound and reasonable in itself, is quite sufficient to determine the present competition in favour of the remaining beneficiaries under the trust and against the next of kin."

Appropriation; signifies the annexing of an ecclesiastical benefice to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house, bishopric, college, or spiritual person, to enjoy for ever. Tomlins' Dict.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Approved Bill; in mercantile law and usage, is a bill to which no reasonable objection can be made. The person who sells goods for approved bills is not entitled arbitrarily to repudiate the bill offered: he must state a reasonable objection. Brown on Sale, p. 41.

Approver. In English law language, an approver, or prover, is one who confesses participation in a felony, and bears evidence against his accomplice or accomplices. A person who has once pleaded guilty of the crime cannot be an approver. A prisoner is seldom, and only in very special circumstances, convicted upon the uncorroborated evidence of an approver. Tomlins, h. t. Wharton's Lexicon, h. t.; Taylor on Evidence, 778. An approver is admitted to give evidence upon an implied promise of pardon, if he make a truthful confession. See Accomplice.

Apud Acta. This expression is applied to judicial notices or intimations given in open court, the parties, or their counsel or agents, being present. Thus, if an adjournment of a proof or other judicial proceeding is made by the court, or by a commissioner, and the parties and witnesses, being present, are convened to attend at a future day, this is called a citation apud acta. So, in a criminal process, the court may adjourn a trial to a future day specified in the deliverance, which being intimated apud acta to parties, witnesses, and assizers, is sufficient notice without further citation. *Hume, ii. 275. Appurtenances; are things either corporeal or incorporeal, appertaining to another thing as principal, as hamlets to a chief manor, &c. Tomlins' Dict. See Pertinent; Part and Pertinent.

Aqueductus; a known rural servitude, signifying the right to conduct water by conduits, canals, pipes, &c. in the servient tenement. This servitude may be acquired by immemorial possession; and as the owner of the dominant tenement has the benefit of the servitude, so he is bound to maintain the aqueducts, pipes, &c., in such a condition as to prevent their injuring the servient lands. The servient proprietor, on the other hand, is bound to allow reasonable access for repairs, cleansing, and the like. The dominant proprietor is not bound to repair the injury occasioned by restagnation from floods. Ersk. ii. 9, 13; Bell's Princ. § 1012; Stair, B. ii. t. 7, § 12; Bank. i. 681.

Aqueshastus; or watering of cattle, is another known rural servitude, under which the dominant proprietor has right to water his cattle at a stream, well, or pond, in the servient lands. It does not prevent the servient proprietor from making a similar use of the water for his own cattle, or from covering it over, provided he leave open a portion sufficiently extensive to admit of a reasonable exercise of the servitude, with free access. Ersk. ii. 9, 13; Bell's Princ. § 1011; Bank. i. 681.

Arage; (from averia), an old law term still employed by conveyancers, signifying services due by a tenant to his landlord or superior, and performed by horses, or carriage by horses. Skene, h. t.

Aratrum Terræ; a ploughgate of land. It consists of eight oxgates of land, because, anciently, the plough was drawn by eight oxen. Balfour's Practicks, p. 441.

Arbiter; a person voluntarily chosen by parties to decide a difference between them.

Arbitration; this term is applied to the voluntary reference of a dispute to the determination of one or more persons appointed for that purpose by the parties; and to the decision or award following thereon. It is usually effected by means of what is called a submission, i.e. the contract of reference, and a decree-arbitral, i.e. the form in which the award is promulgated. Submissions are either general or special; the former including all disputes subsisting at the time, and the latter applying merely to one or more particular subjects, e.g. a previously depending process. The deed of submission commonly contains the following clauses, viz., 1st, The proper clause of submission, describing the nature of the reference and the name of the referee. 2d, A clause defining the arbiter's or oversman's powers, which, in the ordinary case, are declared to be of the most comprehensive character, including, in effect, all the rights possessed by the ordinary tribunals which determine matters of the particular description submitted. 3d, A clause specifying the time within which the award or decree-arbitral is to be pronounced. 4th, A clause obliging the parties to implement the award under a specified penalty. To these clauses, in the ordinary case, there is annexed a provision, that the reference shall be binding on creditors or representatives, notwithstanding the death or bankruptcy of either party before its determination; and also a declaration, that in case the submission shall terminate without a final decree-arbitral having been pronounced, any proof which may have been taken shall be received as legal, in any after submission or process. The deed concludes with the usual consent to registration both of the submission and consequent decree, in order to their being the warrant of diligence. The first procedure under a submission is usually the acceptance of the submission by the arbiter, and the appointment of a clerk, by a minute indorsed on the deed of submission. The pleadings, when written, commence by a claim lodged by one of the parties, which is followed by answers, replies, &c., or by the making up of a record, when the arbiter deems that necessary; after which, the arbiter either determines the case de plano, or allows a proof, or orders further pleadings or procedure. When there are two arbiters, the deed of submission usually provides that they shall have power to name an umpire or oversman, in case they shall differ in opinion; or sometimes such an oversman is named in the deed; and when the arbiters differ, the reference, or devolution, as it is sometimes called, is made to the oversman, who, if he chooses, may order further debate before deciding. The decree-arbitral commences with a narrative of the nature of the submission, and of the consequent procedure; and, after stating that the pronouncer of the decree has ripely advised the whole matter, and has "God and a good conscience before his eyes," it gives forth the findings and decerniture. It concludes with an order on the parties to implement the decree, under the penalty specified in the submission, and mutually to discharge each other of the matters submitted, on that implement being effected. Lastly, It ordains the submission and decree to be recorded in terms of the clause of registration in the submission; and the extract of both forms a warrant to either party for diligence against the other. A decree-arbitral is tested and executed in the form of a regular deed. By act of regulations, 2d Nov. 1695, c. 25, decrees-arbitral are declared not to be reducible, except on the grounds of bribery, corruption, or falsehood. It is necessarily implied, however, in their nature, that such decrees are also reducible when the arbiters exceed the powers with which the submission invests them, for by it their jurisdiction is defined; or where the proceedings of the arbiter are palpably irreconcilable with the principles of impartial justice; as, where he has not fully heard the parties, or where he has taken a proof, or any other important step in the submission, in absence of one of the parties. On this point there are some decisions, both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords, which tend, at least, to a liberal construction of the specified grounds of reduction in the act of regulations. See the following cases: Sharpe v. Bickerdyke, 3 Dow, 102; Johnstone v. Cheape, 5 Dow, 247; Heggie and Co., 1st Feb. 1825, 3 S. 488; Earl of Dunmore, 28th Jan. 1835, 13 S. 356; Mitchell v. Cable, 17th June 1848, 10 D. 1297; Miller and Sons v. Millar, 10th March 1855, 17 D. 689; and see also Menzies' Conveyancing, p. 396 et seq.

The preceding observations apply to formal submissions followed by regular decrees-arbitral; but effect will also be given to less formal agreements to refer, more particularly where matters are not entire, ubi res non sunt integræ, as it is expressed; that is, where something has been done on the faith of the agreement. This is especially the case in re rustica and inter rusticos; or amongst merchants in the adjustment of mercantile disputes. But such references, and the awards following on them, found a right of action merely for implement against the party refusing implement, and cannot be, like a formal submission and decree-arbitral, the warrant of summary diligence. It would now seem, however (although there are dicta to the contrary), that such submissions and decrees-arbitral, unless in matters of the most trivial importance, must be proved scripto; Ferrie, 5th June 1824, 3 S. 113, and cases there cited; Tait on Evidence, 302; Dickson on Evidence, p. 309.

In articles of roup, missives or minutes of sale, contracts of copartnership, and other mutual deeds, it frequently happens, that in contemplation of future differences, provision is made for a submission or reference; and in all such cases, where the arbiter is not expressly named, but merely described as the person who may be the holder of a particular office for the time, the reference will not be effectual; Buchanan v. Muirhead, 25th June 1799, Fac. Coll.; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 648, 5th edit.; Bell's Prin. § 391, and authorities there cited; Menzies' Conveyancing, p. 387.

Although, however, the general rule is, that a reference is ineffectual where the arbiters are not named, there is an exception to the rule where the reference is connected with a contract, and where a reference may be necessary to liquidate the contract. Thus, in the case of a contract of sale, it may be stipulated that the price should be referred to a person not named, but to be mutually chosen by the parties; in such a case there is no dispute between the parties, but something to be decided which is necessary to liquidate the contract of sale. In a contract of lease, also, where a party agrees to take the stocking at a valuation, a reference to a party unnamed will be sustained. When, therefore, a reference is necessary to liquidate an obligation come under by a party, it is good, though the referee is not named, for were it otherwise, the obligation itself would be at an end. In the case of Smith v. Duff, 28th Feb. 1843, 5 D. 749, a tenant was under an obligation to cede possession of the land let to him at any time before the expiry of the period for which it was let, on being allowed such compensation for the remainder of the term "as should be fixed by men to be mutually chosen for that purpose," and it was held that this was a valid obligation to refer, and that the tenant was not entitled to have the compensation fixed in any other way. See also Munro v. Mackenzie, 18th Dec. 1823, 5 S. 593, and Dixon v. Campbell, 25th June 1830, 8 S. 970. Where, however, a lease contains a general clause of reference of any disputes and differences which may arise as to the true intent and meaning of the lease, or as to any other matter arising out of or in connection with the lease, the general rule applies that the referees must be named, otherwise the reference is not obligatory. In the case of Hendry's Trustees v. Newton, 28th May 1851, 13 D. 1001, the reference was of that description, and was not sustained. Lord FULLERTON observed:—"The point that a general submission to arbiters not named cannot be sustained, seems to be definitely fixed. No doubt, in another description of cases, decisions have been pronounced which at first sight seem to be inconsistent, but it will be found that those decisions rest upon a distinction which, whether in itself well founded or not, is now definitely recognised. It is confessedly an exception from the general rule, and applied only in cases where the ascertainment of a point essential to the extrication of a special stipulation in the contract is made part of the stipulation itself; as, for instance, where parties bind themselves to pay and receive a sum to be fixed by men mutually chosen, or to accept their opinion as the criterion of the existence or non-existence of some contingency on which the obligation of the parties is by the contract dependent. Such are the circumstances of the case relied on by the petitioners; and it is quite clear that the principle of this exception cannot apply to the present." Lord IVORY observed:—"The purpose of this submission is not to ascertain what the law stipulates, but arises out of matters which infer nonperformance or neglect of the lease. Questions as to the liquidation or extrication of the stipulations of the contract are the kind of matters which the authorities have dealt with as forming part of the contract; and if the question does not fall within that description, it cannot be brought under the exception to the rules which requires that the arbiters should be named. If this submission is not an essential part of the contract, it falls under the general rule, that there can be no good submission of this general nature to parties of whom there is not a direct delectus." According to the law of England, an arbiter has no power to award expenses, unless that power be expressly given him by the submission. In Scotland the contrary was determined in the case of Robertson v. Brown, 15 S. 199; on the authority of previous decisions in cases of judicial reference. The point was again determined in favour of the power, in the case of Ferrier v. Allison, 5 D. 456, and, on appeal, the judgment was affirmed; 5 Bell, 161. After a submission has expired, an arbiter cannot sign a decree-arbital, although he may have come to his decision before the expiry, and recorded it in an informal writing. Runciman v. Craigie, 24th May 1831, 9 S. 629; and Lang v. Brown, 23d Nov. 1852, 15 D. 38. Where two arbiters had agreed on certain points, and differed on others, and had devolved the submission upon the oversman quoad the points on which they differed, and the oversman had prorogated the submission, it was held by a majority of the whole Court, that the prorogation not merely prorogated the submission quoad the points referred to him, but also quoad the other points, so as to enable the arbiters to write out a decree-arbital upon these points after the period when, but for the oversman's prorogation, the submission would have expired; Lang v. Brown, 23d Nov. 1852, 15 D. 38. An arbiter who accepts the office, is not entitled capriciously to renounce it, but is bound to perform the duty he has undertaken faithfully and honestly, and he may be compelled to proceed and execute a decree-arbital; Edinburgh & Glasgow Railway Company v. Miller, 26th March 1853, 15 D. 603. Arbitrary Punishment; is a punishment awarded according to the discretion of a judge. In no case can it be extended to a capital punishment: it must be restricted to fine, corporal punishment, or imprisonment. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 15. In cases punishable capitally, the public prosecutor may, at any time before moving for sentence, restrict his libel to an arbitrary punishment; but, if there be no such restriction, the judge is bound to pronounce the capital sentence. Alison's Prac. 88, 90, 97, 108; Hume, ii. 134; Steele, 196.

Arbitrium Boni Viri. A dispute left ad arbitrium boni viri, means one to be decided as a person in whose probity confidence may be placed would decide. The price of a thing is often fixed in this way. When parties in their contract have agreed to refer to persons, who afterwards die or leave the country, the amount of any sum to be paid, the Court of Session sometimes modifies the amount as a thing in arbitrio boni viri. Brown's Synop. h. t.; Brown on Sale, p. 149, note; Ersk. Princ. of Equity (1825), 134, 154.

Archbishop; Primates of the church. During the establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland there were two Archbishops; the Archbishop of St. Andrews, who was called the Primate of all Scotland; and the Archbishop of Glasgow, who was called the Primate of Scotland.

Archies Court. The Court of Arches in London is the chief and most ancient consistory court belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the disposal of spiritual causes. It is so called from the church in London, St Mary-le-Bone (de Arcubus), where it was formerly held. The judge of this court is called the Dean of the Arches. He possesses extraordinary jurisdiction in all ecclesiastical causes, except those belonging to the Prerogative Court; and he has also ordinary jurisdiction in appeals from all inferior ecclesiastical courts within the province. An appeal lies from the Court of Arches to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. See Tomlins, h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.; Stephen's Blackstone.

Armorial Bearings, or Arms. Mackenzie defines arms to be "marks of hereditary honour, given or authorized by some supreme power, to gratify the bearer, or distinguish families,"—and historically, armorial bearings seem to have been originally the distinctive marks, badges, or devices, whereby warriors clad in armour were recognised in battle. The bearings so assumed or conferred as cognisances became permanent in families, and in process of time heraldic emblazonry was reduced to a system, by which the different branches of a family, and their relationships and intermarriages, were discoverable from their coats-armorial. This department has been long under the jurisdiction of the Lyon King of Arms, and besides having been the subject of several statutes, it has been illustrated by considerable antiquarian learning and research. Strictly speaking, the privilege of conferring armorial bearings belongs to the Crown; but practically, a coat-armorial may now be purchased at the Lyon Office; see M'Donnell, 20th Jan. 1826, 4 S. 371. In deeds of entail, stranger heirs called to the succession are frequently enjoined by the entailer to bear his name and arms; and in one case, where the maker of the entail had inserted such a clause without having had any coat-armorial matriculated, it was held incumbent on the heir of entail succeeding, and on the other heirs of entail, to follow out the entailer's appointment by obtaining from the Lyon Office arms of the proper description, descendible to the heirs of entail; Moir, 5th Feb. 1794, Mor. 15537. See the statutes 1587, c. 46, 1592, c. 127, 1672, c. 21. In the case of Macdonnell v. Macdonald, 2d Jan. 1826, 4 S. 371; it was held to be competent for the Court of Session to review the judgments of the Lord Lyon. Lord ROBERTSON observed:—"The power of granting ensigns-armorial is part of the royal prerogative, but everything belonging to that power has been given by sundry statutes to the Lord Lyon. His power to grant new armorial bearings is merely discretionary and ministerial, and with that this Court cannot interfere. But if the Lord Lyon should grant to one person arms which another is entitled to bear, and should refuse to give redress, there could be no doubt of the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain an action at the instance of the party, to have his right declared, as this would involve a question of property, which a right to bear particular ensigns-armorial undoubtedly is." Lord PITMILLY observed:—"As to the abstract principle, it is clear that wherever there is a competition as to the right to armorial bearings an appeal lies to this Court by advocacy, and also by reduction, which is the proper remedy, when the arms are already granted; or even if the Lyon refuse arms to a party entitled, the Court has jurisdiction to give redress. The Lyon Court is, in fact, on the same footing with other inferior courts." The action was, however, dismissed, on the ground that the pursuer did not allege that the arms borne by the defender belonged to him. In the case of Cunninghame v. Cunningham, 13th June 1849, 11 D. 1139; it was also held that the judgments of the Lord Lyon in matters of heraldry might be reviewed by the Court of Session, and the objection taken to the competency of an advocacy was repelled. In this case the question was raised, whether the heraldic honours of a family went to the heir-male or the heir of line, the heir-male bearing them with a mark of cadency; but it was not determined, as the rights of the competing heirs were held to be settled by a private act of Parliament. By various revenue statutes a tax is imposed on armorial bearings, whether borne on plate or on carriages. *Ersk. Arraign; (ad rationem ponere) is an English law term, signifying to indict a prisoner, and call upon him at the bar for his defence. The term is unknown in the law of Scotland, except in trials for high treason, in which the forms of procedure and the law in both countries are the same. See Tomlins' Law Dict.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Arrears; money unpaid at the due time, such as rent, interest, the balance of an account, and the like. The most important practical rule of the law of Scotland with respect to arrears is, that all arrears of annual returns, and of funds themselves horitable, such as arrears of rent, the arrears of interest due on an heritable bond and covered by the real security; arrears of feu-duties, the balance or reversion of the price of subjects sold judicially, and the like, are all held to be moveable, and, in questions of succession, belong to the executor, and not to the heir in heritage. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 7, and tit. 9, § 64; Bell's Princ. § 1479, and authorities there cited; Mr More's Notes to Stair, p.

Arrearagium; a word used in the Regiam Majestatem, to signify arrears of rents, profits, and duties. Skene, h. t.

Arrest. As applied to personal diligence, this is properly an English law term; and means the apprehending or restraining a person in execution of the command of a court or by officers of justice. In Scotland, the word apprehension or apprehending is usually applied to this species of arrest; and the civil and criminal warrants for such apprehension are various. The following articles may be consulted:—Caption. Act of Warding. Border Warrant. Meditatio Fugæ. Apprehending a Debtor. Criminal Prosecution. Bail. Commitment.

Arrest of Judgment; an English law term. To move an arrest of judgment is to show cause why judgment should be stayed, notwithstanding a verdict. Judgment may be arrested for good cause in criminal as well as in civil cases. Tomlins, h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t. In the practice of the Scottish Criminal Courts, it is competent, when the prosecutor moves for sentence, for the panel to propose reasons in arrest of judgment. But no objection to the libel or to the proof admitted can be received in arrest of judgment. Alison's Prac. 651; Hume, ii. 463.

Arrest, Parliamentary freedom from. See Privilege of Parliament.

Arrestee; the person in whose hands an arrestment is laid. If an arrestee disregards the arrestment and pays the money to the common debtor, he will be liable in damages and expenses. See Breach of Arrestment.

Arrestment; is the diligence, whereby the debtor in a moveable debt or obligation, is interpellated from making payment or delivery to his creditor, until the debt due to the arrester by the arrestee's creditor is paid or secured. The party in whose hands the arrestment is laid is called the arrestee; the user of the arrestment is called the arrester, and the arrester's debtor is called the common debtor, because, where (as usually happens) there are two or more competitors for the arrested fund or subject, he is debtor to all of them. The nexus thus imposed does not operate as a transfer of the debt or subject to the arrester (see infra). For that purpose an action of furthcoming is necessary, at the instance of the arrester, in which he calls the arrestee and the common debtor; and if there be no competition, and no objection on the part of the common debtor, decree of furthercoming in the arrestee's favour will be pronounced. (See Furthercoming.) If, on the other hand, several arrestments have been used by other creditors of the common debtor, then, instead of an action of furthercoming, the arrestee, or any of the creditors in his name, may bring all parties into the field by an action of multiplepoinding, in which the arrestee states the amount of the debt due by him to the common debtor, and his readiness to pay it but for the arrestments. He then concludes, that he shall be held liable in once and single payment only, and found entitled to the expenses of bringing the action into court; and decree to that effect having been pronounced, the arrestee, if he pleases, or if any party interested insist on it, consigns the money, or places the subject in manibus curiæ; or the arrestee is allowed to retain the sum or the subject until the issue of the competition amongst the arresting creditors. He is thus discharged, either by consignment, or, where that has not been insisted for, by making payment or delivery to the party preferred by the decree of the Court. (See Multiplepoinding.) Though the general effect of arrestment is merely to create an inchoate attachment, arrestment used upon an extract decree under the Court of Exchequer, act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, § 30, operates "to transfer to the Crown, preferably to all other creditors of the crown-debtor, all right to and interest in the arrested fund competent to the crown-debtor;" and the arrestee is entitled to pay without awaiting the institution of a furthercoming.

As to the mode in which arrestment is laid on:—This may be done in virtue of special letters of arrestment passing the signet, or of the warrant to arrest contained in letters of horning, or of the warrant inserted in a signetted summons, or in an extract-decree under the provisions of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, §§ 1, 2, 17, &c.; and it must in these cases be executed by a messenger-at-arms. Arrestment may also be laid on in virtue of an inferior judge's precept of arrestment, or of warrant to arrest contained in a libelled summons in the Sheriff Court, or in an extract decree or act of a Sheriff, or extract decree of registration in the Sheriff Court Books; and it may then be executed by the officers of the inferior court; but such precepts or warrants cannot be executed against the arrestee beyond the territory of the inferior judge, though the common debtor should be resident within the jurisdiction. When the arrestee lives beyond the jurisdiction, the sole warrant was letters of arrestment in supplement, (see Supplement,) until, by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 13, it was made competent when the arrestment is on a decree, if the debtor's moveables are within the territory of another sheriff than him from whose books the extract has been issued, to present the extract, with a minute indorsed thereon, in the Bill-Chamber, or in the court of the sheriff within whose jurisdiction the moveables are; and to obtain a fiat authorizing the arrestment in like manner as if the extract had been originally issued from the books of the Court of Session or concurring sheriff.

Arrestment may be used either after the arrestee has constituted his debt against the common debtor, or during the dependence of an action for that purpose.

When the arrestee's debt is already constituted, the warrant for arrestment will be either the letters of horning, or the inferior court precept; or special letters of arrestment, for which a warrant will be obtained at the Bill-Chamber on exhibiting a liquid ground of debt; or the warrant appended to the extract of a decree by the Court of Session, Teind Court, Court of Justiciary, Court of Exchequer, or Sheriff, upon which it is made lawful to arrest, in like manner, as if letters of arrestment on a liquid ground of debt, or letters of horning containing warrant to arrest, had been issued under the signet, or precept of arrestment granted by a sheriff; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56. By these statutes provision is also made for arrestment at the instance of parties acquiring right to extracts containing warrant.

When the arrestee's debt is not yet constituted, arrestment may be used on the dependence of an action for constituting the debt, as to which the rules are—1st, Where the action was raised in the Court of Session, the production of the libelled and signetted summons, although not executed, was formerly a sufficient warrant for special letters of arrestment on the dependence; and now, by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 17, there may be inserted in summonses concluding for the payment of money a warrant to arrest on the dependence, until caution be found to make the subjects arrested furthercoming. In virtue of this warrant, or of special letters of arrestment according to the former practice, it is competent to arrest before executing the warrant of citation. But the arrestment will be null unless the warrant of citation be executed within twenty days after the date of execution of the arrestment, and unless the summons be called within twenty days after the diet of comparance, or, where the expiry of the twenty days falls within the vacation, or previous to the first calling-day in the next session, upon the first calling-day next thereafter. 2d, Such arrestment may be used at any time during the dependence of the action, the action being held as in dependence pending an appeal to the House of Lords; and as a corollary to this rule, an arrestment on the dependence does not fall eo ipso by a judgment of the Court of Session, assailing the defender from the conclusions of the action on the dependence of which the arrestment has been used, but will remain effectual in case the defender should take an appeal, and obtain a reversal in the House of Lords. 3d, The will of an inferior court summons may also contain a warrant to arrest on the dependence; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 1; and when no such warrant is contained in the summons, a precept of arrestment may be obtained on the dependence. Here, also, it is necessary that the summons be executed within twenty days after the date of the arrestment, and be called within twenty days after the diet of comparance; A. S. 10th July 1839, § 154. Where the arrestee lives beyond the jurisdiction of the sheriff, arrestment on the dependence may be used within another sheriffdom upon the sheriff-clerk thereof indorsing the warrant or precept of arrestment; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 19; A. S. 10th July 1839, § 155,—a provision which supersedes letters of arrestment on the dependence in supplement. Arrestment on the dependence covers not only principal and interest, but the expenses of process till its final issue, into whatever court it may be carried; but not the expenses of the furthercoming. Arrestment is competent upon the dependence of an action brought, not for the real purpose of being insisted in before the Court of Session, but avowedly in order to secure the benefit of the diligence during the dependence of a similar suit in Chancery; 4 D. 924, 1334.

The subjects which may be arrested are moveable and personal debts, not made real by sasine, including the arrears of interest on heritable or real debts. The debt or subject arrested must not be in the possession of the common debtor himself. It must be in the hands of a third party. As the subject arrested must not be in possession of the common debtor, neither must it be in that of his servant, or of any one who is a mere custodier for him. On the contrary, the arrestee must be properly and directly the debtor of the common debtor: so arrestment is ineffectual in the hands of one who is factor for the party who is indebted to the common debtor, and consequently accountable not to the common debtor himself, but to his debtor; Campbell, 12th Dec. 1752, M. 742; Ersk. Inst. iii. 6, 4; 2 Bell's Com. 74. Now, by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (19 and 20 Vict., c.

60), while a seller of goods is deprived of his general right of retention against a purchaser from the original purchaser, it is (see § 3) made competent to him to arrest or poind the goods in his own hands at any time prior to intimation being made to him of a sale to a subsequent purchaser; and such arrestment or poinding is declared to have the same effect as an arrestment or poinding by a third party. Some moveable subjects are, by statute, charter, or special destination, not arrestable; e. g. the original stock of the Royal Bank of Scotland; annuities to widows of ministers of the Church of Scotland, of writers to the signet, &c.; servants' wages, as being alimentary; the wages of labourers and manufacturers, in so far as necessary for their subsistence; 1 Vict., c. 41, § 7; M'Glash. Sher. Court Prac. 377; Barclay's Dig. p. 33, et seq.; 8 and 9 Vict., c. 39; pensions from the Crown; salaries of judges of the Court of Session; sums expressly declared to be alimentary, except for alimentary debts; and the like; and it is a general rule, that funds appropriated for a special purpose, which arrestment would defeat, cannot be attached by this diligence; Mor. pp. 744, 745. With these, and some other exceptions of the same class, all personal claims, and all claims resolvable into personal claims, are arrestable, even although payable from the proceeds of heritable property. Such are claims against trustees who are empowered to sell heritage, and to apply the price,—obligations by trustees to account for the price of heritage,—and so forth. A creditor, by producing the grounds of a personal or moveable debt in a process of ranking and sale, does not thereby render the debt heritable, or bar arrestment. Neither will a personal creditor's accession to a trust-deed, conveying heritage in payment of debts, have that effect. But, on the other hand, the shares of the price of heritage, payable under a ranking and sale to heritable creditors, are not arrestable; neither is the reversion of an heritable estate which has been sold judicially by creditors. So also a debt, secured by an assignation to a lease of an heritable subject, is not arrestable, although a debt due by heritable bond before infestment is; 1661, c. 51. Debts by bill of exchange, and the ipsa corpora of bills, are not arrestable; and where a mercantile agent has sold goods, and taken bills for the price as agent, an arrestment in his hands, before he has received payment of the bills, will not attach either the bills or their proceeds, as a debt due by him to his constituent; Johnston, 12th May 1837, 15 S. 904, and authorities there cited. And, in general, nothing will be covered by arrestment, except an actual debt, or a sum or subject, for which, as debtor, the arrestee is accountable to the common debtor; see Hume, 29th May 1852, 14 D. 821; although, on this subject, the judgments of the court have varied, and the distinctions drawn have been occasionally so subtle, that it is difficult either to classify the cases, or to deduce any abstract rule from them. Future debts, i. e., debts not due until after the arrestment is used, are not attached; but this does not include debts, the obligation for which is already incurred, but the term of payment only not arrived. Arrears of rent and interest, and the current term's rent or interest, may be arrested; and it is now settled, that the whole term-day must elapse before the new term commences; and hence, that an arrestment used on the term-day to attach the ensuing term's rent is premature. But such arrestments of current rents are always to a certain extent contingent, since the efficacy of the arrestment depends on the common debtor being in titulo to exact them at the term of payment, his right being defeasible by adjudgers, or other singular successors acquiring right to the lands, and consequently to the rents, in the intermediate period. In like manner, where the subject, the rents of which have been arrested curr-nte termino, has been a donation inter virum et uxorem, the arrestment may be defeated by a revocation of the gift by the husband or wife. The effect of arrestments depends upon the legal and not the conventional term of payment, though the arrester cannot require payment before the conventional term has arrived. The contents of a policy of assurance may be effectually arrested, at least if the debtor die before a new premium falls due; Strachan, 19th June 1855, 13 S. 954. Arrestment in the hands of a mercantile company will attach the interest of a partner in the funds of the company, although such funds should be entirely abroad, or should consist chiefly of heritable property; and arrestment in the hands of a partner will secure funds, e. g., railway calls, owing by him to the company; Hill, 13th Nov. 1849, 12 D. 46. But arrestment used in the hands of the consignee of goods before they have come into his possession, will not attach the goods.

As to the parties in whose hands the arrestment must be used, the leading rule is, that it must be used in the hands of the debtor to the common debtor. Where the debtor is an incorporation or joint stock company, it will be validly used either in the hands of the treasurer or manager, or by being executed against the managers and directors by serving each with a copy, or by delivering a copy to them when met on the business of the incorporation. If the debtors are trustees, the arrestment must be used in the hands of the trustees who, under the trust-deed, are empowered to act. As the creditor can arrest in the hands of a party indebted to his debtor, so upon the death of the last he may use the same diligence to attach funds owing to those who represent him in his liabilities; Globe Insurance Co., 14th August 1850, 7 Bell's App. 296. By 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, § 36, it is made competent, notwithstanding the death of a party indebted to the Crown by bond or other obligation on which diligence may proceed, or under an extract decree for payment of any Crown debt, to proceed against his effects by arrestment, and also by poinding, in like manner as if he were alive, and without taking any proceedings whatsoever against his representatives. Where the debtor is abroad, and has no domicile at which the arrestment can be used, it may be executed against him edictally by delivery of the schedule at the office of the keeper of edictal citations; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 18; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838. But he will not be thereby interpellated from making payment to his original creditor, unless it be proved that he, or those acting for him, were previously aware of the arrestment, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 91, § 1; and, on the same principle, even where the arrestee is in this country, but makes payment to his creditor in circumstances in which he cannot be cognizant of the attachment of the funds in his hands, he will not be liable in second payment; Laidlaw, 26th October 1841, 2 Rob. App., 490. An edictal arrestment of a debt, due by a foreigner who has no forum whatever in Scotland, has been held to be inept. Arrestment in the hands of the tutor of a pupil is effectual to attach a debt due by the pupil; but arrestment in the hands of a minor pubes is good, although not executed against his curators. Every arrestment was formerly regularly executed before two witnesses, who required to subscribe the execution, and be designed therein, under the sanction of nullity; 1681, c. 5; now, by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 32, extracts, citations, deliverances, schedules, and executions may be either printed or in writing, or partly both, and, except in the case of poindings, more than one witness is not required for service or execution of them. See also 9 and 10 Vict., c. 67. Shand's Prac. 233 and 255. The execution must be either personal, or by leaving a service copy at the arrestee's dwelling-house. If left at his shop or counting-house, (unless the arrestee be a mercantile company), it will be inept.

If the arrestee pay or deliver in the face of the arrestment, he will be liable for the value to the arrester, at least to the extent of his debt; see Breach of Arrestment. But the arrestment creates no real right entitling the arrester to vindicate the subject from third parties acquiring in bona fide. Arrestment, where used nimiously or oppressively, may be recalled, or loosed, as it is expressed, or restricted, where a larger sum than is reasonable has been attached. The Lord Ordinary before whom the cause is enrolled may, on petition, recal or restrict the arrestment, on caution being found by the common debtor, or without it. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills has the same powers in vacation; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 20. It is also made competent for any Sheriff from whose books a warrant of arrestment has been issued, on petition, to recal or restrict the arrestment, on caution or without caution; § 21. See Loosing of Arrestments. The arrestment, where it has been used on the dependence of an action, falls by the death of the arrestee, whose heir may pay the common debtor, unless interpellated; but it subsists, to the effect of supporting an action of furthcoming, while the heir holds the subject; and may be renewed against the arrestee's heir, so as to give a preference to the arrester over an arrester in the hands of the heir. It also subsists after the death of the arrester, remains effectual to his heir. All arrestments formerly suffered a quinquennial prescription; i.e., if not pursued or insisted in within four years after being laid on, if used on liquid grounds of debt or decrees, and, where used on the dependence of an action, within five years after decree is obtained in the depending action; 1669, c. 9. By "pursued or insisted in," was meant, following up the arrestment by furthcoming, or by a process of multiplepoinding, or other judicial claim for making the arrested fund available to the arrester. Now, by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, § 22, the prescription of the act 1669, c. 9, is repealed in so far as regards the prescription of arrestments, which are thereafter to prescribe in three years instead of five. The three years run, in arrestments upon decrees and registered protests, from the date of the arrestments; in the arrestments upon the dependence, from the date of the final interlocutor in the action; and in arrestments upon a future or contingent debt, from the date when the debt becomes due, and the contingency is purified. Under the Sheriff Small Debt Act, arrestments fall in three months, unless renewed every three months. In competition, arrestments are preferable according to their dates: hence, in the execution, the hour at which the arrestment was used should be mentioned. If, however, there have been more, the first furthcoming, though following upon a posterior arrestment, is preferred, as being the first completed diligence. But all arrestments used within sixty days before, and four months after, the constitution of no-tour bankruptcy, for attaching the bankrupt's effects, are to be ranked pari passu; while arrestments used posterior to the four months cannot compete with prior arrestments, but may rank with each other on any reversion of the estate; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 12. No arrestment of a bankrupt's effects, used on or after the sixtieth day prior to sequestration, is effectual, and the effects arrested must be made forthcoming to the trustee, the arrester, however, having a preference out of them for the expense bona fide incurred by him in his diligence; ibid. § 108. In competition with assignments, the date of the intimation of the assignation is the criterion of preference, not the date of the deed of assignation.

In the attachment of a ship in security or execution, arrestment, and not poinding, is the proper diligence. For such arrestment the ordinary warrant to arrest is sufficient; Clark, 17th June 1853, 15 D. 750. This is made by affixing a copy of the arrestment on the main-mast, or on the stern, if the ship has not left the stocks, and by chalking above it the Royal initials. When a vessel has been arrested, it is rendered available as a source of payment not by action of furthcoming, but of arrestment and sale; Shand's Prac. 417. Arrestment in Security. In the preceding article it has been shown, that the creditor in an illiquid claim may obtain a security while that claim is under judicial discussion, by arrestment on the dependence. Another case of arrestment in security arises where a creditor has a liquid ground of debt, such as a bill or bond, but the term of payment is future. If his debtor be vergens ad inopiam, the creditor in such a document may obtain in the Bill-Chamber warrant for letters of arrestment, which secure the debt till caution be found that it be made forthcoming to him. See authorities cited voce Arrestment.

Arrestment Jurisdictionis fundandæ causa; arrestment for the purpose of founding a jurisdiction. This arrestment is used for the purpose of bringing a foreigner under the jurisdiction of the courts of Scotland. A person domiciled abroad, whether native or foreigner, is not amenable to the Scotch courts, or liable to legal diligence, real or personal, unless he either has property in Scotland, or comes personally into the country. Where his property is heritable, he is held to have a forum, and may be cited as furth of the kingdom. But where his property is merely moveable, an arrestment to found a jurisdiction is necessary. This arrestment is laid on, either in virtue of the warrant of an inferior court, or of letters of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, passing the signet, on a warrant obtained at the Bill-Chamber; and even when laid on by the warrant of an inferior court, such an arrestment will found a jurisdiction in the Supreme Court. This arrestment, however, is merely to the effect of founding a jurisdiction in ordinary patrimonial claims of debt, or the like, not in questions of status; and it will have no effect as a securus, in competition with ordinary arrestments. For that purpose, after the jurisdiction has been thus founded, the creditor must raise an action against his debtor, on the dependence of which he may then use an arrestment in common form; see Menzies' Conveyancing, p. 304. An arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem is also required to warrant the raising of a horning against a party domiciled abroad, who has moveable property in Scotland. But this kind of arrestment is not necessary, where the sum or goods belonging to the absent party are already the subject of an action of multiplepoinding, or after they have been already arrested, or where jurisdiction is founded on the principle of reconvention. *Ersk. Arriage and Carriage; were indefinite services formerly demandable from tenants; but by act 20 Geo. II., c. 50, § 21 and 22, all indefinite services are prohibited; and none can now be demanded, but such as are enumerated in the lease, or in writing apart. Mill-services continue on the former footing. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 42; Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 7; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 365.

Arrogation; in the Roman law, was the adoption of one who was sui juris, as contradistinguished from proper adoption, which took place where the adopted person was formally manumitted by his natural father, and taken under the patria potestas of his adopter. Arrogation was originally effected by a species of legislative act, assented to in the Comitia Curriata, and, during the empire, by an imperial rescript. See Adoption.

Arson; an English law term, synonymous with wilful fire-raising. Arson is defined to be voluntarily and maliciously burning the house of another. This offence, by the common law of England, was a capital felony, and punishable with death, and extended, by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 30, to the burning not only of dwelling-houses, churches, and erections for the purposes of trade, but also of coal mines, stacks of corn, &c. But, by 1 Vict., c. 89, the capital punishment is confined to the offence of voluntarily and maliciously setting fire to a dwelling-house, any person being therein; or to the setting fire to vessels with intent to commit murder. This statute does not extend to Scotland. Where the offence is not accompanied by these aggravations, it is punishable with transportation, penal servitude, or imprisonment; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 99; 9 and 10 Vict., c. 24, and c. 25. See Wharton's Lex. h. t.; Boothby's Synop. of the Law relating to Indictable Offences, p. 22. See also Wilful Fire-raising.

Art and Part; signifies the aiding or abetting in the perpetration of a crime. One may become art and part guilty of a crime:—

1. By giving a warrant or mandate to commit the crime; 2. By giving counsel or advice to the criminal how to conduct himself in it; or, 3. By assisting in the execution of it. By statute 1592, c. 153, all criminal libels must contain a charge of art and part, even although the crime consisted in a simple and indivisible act, committed, and charged to have been committed, by one person; so that the panel may be convicted, although it should turn out that the act was not committed by him, but by another at his command. In this way also, provided the fundamental fact charged remains unaltered, the prosecutor is secure, although his proof should vary from the libel with respect to the manner in which the deed was done. In the charge of art and part, the prosecutor is not under the necessity of setting forth the mode of the panel's accession. It follows from the nature of this charge, that a verdict of guilty art and part is substantially the same as a simple verdict of guilty, and does not infer an inferior degree of guilt. See 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 9; Hume, ii. 225-9, 236-9, 441, 456; Bell's Notes; Steele, 193, 201, 211; Alison's Prac. 250; Brown's Synop. h. t. The charge of art and part is properly omitted in indictments for concealment of pregnancy, under the statute 49 Geo. III. c. 14; Punton, 2 Swinton, 573.

Articles, Lords of; were a committee of the Scotch Parliament, thus described by

Robertson: "As far back as our records enable us to trace the constitution of our Parliaments, we find a committee distinguished by the name of Lords of Articles. It was their business to prepare and to digest all matters which were to be laid before the Parliament. There was rarely any business introduced into Parliament but what had passed through the channel of this committee: every motion for a new law was first made there, and approved of or rejected by the members of it. What they approved was formed into a bill, and presented to Parliament; and it seems probable, that what they rejected could not be introduced into the House. This committee owed the extraordinary powers vested in it to the military genius of the ancient nobles: too impatient to submit to the drudgery of civil business, too impetuous to observe the forms, or to enter into the details necessary in conducting it, they were glad to lay that burden upon a small number, while they themselves had no other labour than simply to give or to refuse their assent to the bills which were presented to them. The Lords of Articles, then, not only directed all the proceedings of Parliament, but possessed a negative before debate. That committee was chosen and constituted in such a manner as to put this valuable privilege entirely in the King's hands. It is extremely probable that our kings once had the sole right of nominating the Lords of Articles. They came afterwards to be elected by the Parliament, and consisted of an equal number out of each estate, and most commonly of eight temporal and eight spiritual Lords, of eight representatives of boroughs, and of the eight great officers of the Crown." Hist. of Scotland, B. i. See also 1594, c. 218, and 1663, c. 1. At the Revolution of 1688, this system was thought inconsistent with the freedom of Parliament, and was declared a grievance by the Convention of Estates; 1689, c. 18. The Lords of the Articles were accordingly suppressed by the act 1690, c. 3. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 5.

Articles of Roup, are the conditions under which property is exposed to sale by auction. They refer generally to the nature of the right to be conferred; specify the titles by which the property is to be conveyed; regulate the manner of bidding; prescribe the rules by which offerors are to be preferred; and name a person to be judge of the roup, before whom the procedure takes place, and who is empowered to declare the purchaser. These articles are executed by the exposor on stamped paper; and when the day of sale arrives, they are read over in presence of the meeting, at the place and time appointed for the sale. The subject being exposed to sale by an auctioneer, a minute of the offers is made, generally on the back of the articles, and signed by each offeror, and the highest offeror at the out-running of a sand-glass is declared to be the purchaser by the judge of the roup. Minutes of the procedure are made, and regularly signed and attested at the time of sale. These articles contain a clause of registration, by which the parties consent to a decree going out in terms of the conditions, under which they may be enforced by the diligence of the law. Besides the rules and conditions expressed in the written articles of roup, there are implied rules binding on both parties. Thus, the exposor must bring the subject fairly to sale, and not attempt to raise the price by the assistance of a white-bonnet or fictitious offeror; and on the other hand, there must be no combination amongst the offerors to suppress the natural ardour of competition amongst intending purchasers. *Ersk. Articles Improbatory and Approbatory. By the old form of process, where a deed or writing was objected to as false or forged, after the party founding on the document had abidden by it sub periculo falsi, pleadings, called Articles Improbatory and Approbatory, were ordered to be put in. According to the present practice, when the writing has been abidden by, the record is made up, "by ordering a condescendence of articles improbable, and answers containing articles approbatory, which shall be revised and accompanied with notes of pleas in law. The revised condescendence and answers to be signed by the parties respectively, as well as by their counsel, except where, on cause shown, and in respect of the particular circumstances of the case, it may be deemed necessary, for the ends of justice, to dispense with the signature of the party, and without prejudice to the form of procedure heretofore observed in such cases; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 53. These articles improbable and approbatory consist of articulate averments and answers, in the usual form in which condescendences and answers are prepared, setting forth the facts and circumstances relied on by the one party, as instructing the alleged forgery or falsehood, and by the other, as showing the writing to be genuine and fairly come by. See Shand's Practice, 645. See Abiding by. Condescendence.

Articulate Adjudication. The proper occasion for an articulate adjudication is where several separate grounds of debt are vested in a trustee, to pursue one adjudication for the whole. In that case the practice is to accumulate each debt separately, so that, if a pluris petitio in any one of the debts should occur, it may not prejudice the adjudication as to the remainder. This is called an articulate adjudication; and correctly there ought to be conclusions in the libel for accumulating the debts separately, or the interlocutor must be so expressed as to have that effect. But there may be an articulate adjudication where there is only one ground of debt; e. g. a bond, with principal, interest, and penalties separately stated, instead of being accumulated into one sum. Shand's Practice, ii. 673; Jurid. Styles, iii. 401; Bell's Com. i. 737. See Adjudication. Pluris Petitio.

Artists and Artificers; are held to profess expertness in the art which they practise, spondere peritiam artis, and are therefore liable for any damage which may occur through their want of skill, on the maxim, imperitia culpæ annumeratur. Under this rule all professional men are comprehended. See Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 459, for the rules with regard to this responsibility, the principle of which is, that the performer of the work is responsible for any deficiency in that degree of skill which the hirer or employer is naturally entitled to expect. The property of artists in their work is protected by various statutes. *Ersk. Ascendants; persons in the degrees of kindred reckoned upwards. Ascendants, according to the former law of Scotland, succeeded after collateral descendants. Thus, failing descendants, that is, children and their children in succession, and failing brothers and sisters and their descendants, the succession went to ascendants, that is, to the father in the first place, the mother, according to the former law, though an ascendant in the same degree, never succeeding to her child. By the act 18 and 19 Vict., cap. 23, a change was introduced into the law of Scotland; and it was enacted, that, where a son dies intestate without leaving issue, and is survived by his father, his father shall have right to one-half of his moveable estate in preference to the son's brothers and sisters, or their descendants whomay have survived him. Where, again, the father predeceases a son who dies intestate without leaving issue, but who is survived by his mother, his mother is entitled to one-third of his moveable estate, in preference to his brothers and sisters, or his other next of kin. Failing the father, the succession goes to collaterals, that is, to the brothers or sisters of the father, and their descendants. Failing the collaterals of the father, the succession goes to the grandfather and his collaterals; and so upwards as far as connexion can be traced; and when all trace of connexion is lost, the succession goes to the Crown as ultimus hæres. Ersk. B. i. t. 4, § 8; B. iii. t. 8, § 7, et seq.; Ersk. Princ. 11th edit. 485.

Assay of Weights and Measures; is the examination of weights and measures by the proper officers.

Assassination; is the murdering of a person either for hire, or by deliberate lying in wait. It might be inferred from some Scots statutes that even the attempt to commit this crime is capital; but this is not the case. See Hume, vol. i. p. 180, 288; Ersk. B. iv. t. 4, § 45; Swint. Abridg. voce Treason, § 75.

Assault; is an attempt or offer with force and violence to do a corporal hurt to another. It does not necessarily imply an injury actually done; it is sufficient if such was intended, and a menacing gesture may amount to an assault; but no words, if unaccompanied with violence, will amount to assault. And no words, however insolent and contumelious, will justify an assault, though such provocation will in general tend to mitigate the punishment. Any one, however, who is assailed with blows, is quite justified in defending himself in the same manner, and is not to blame if the assailant be injured in the struggle. But after the aggressor has been disabled, or has submitted, the party who has been originally assaulted may in his turn become the assailant by continuing his blows; in which case the first offender is entitled to demand punishment for the counter-assault committed on him. No provocation which did not take place recently before the assault will justify it; for when a considerable time has elapsed, the deed will be held to have resulted from a spirit of revenge, and not from momentary passion. The aggressor is liable both to a civil action for damages, and to a criminal prosecution. In cases of assault, even of the most atrocious kind, the practice is to make a charge simply of assault, and to state the serious parts of the offence as aggravations of the simple crime; by which means the risk is avoided of the whole charge falling by a failure to prove the aggravations. The highest aggravation of assault is intent to murder. (See Attempt at Murder). But assault is a very aggravated crime, though there may have been no intention to kill, if it has been to the effusion of blood, or the danger of life, or with loaded fire-arms or other lethal weapons. The intent to ravish is also a serious aggravation of assault, which will not be made out, however, by the mere using of indecent liberties, unless there has been an evident preparation for carnal connection. Intent to rob, which is also an aggravation of a serious nature, is proved by acts of violence, indicating a design to take the property; but such proof is admitted with caution, as, in the confusion of an assault, acts of this kind may take place with no intention to carry off the property. Assault is aggravated when committed in pursuance of an intent to compel a rise of wages, &c., or when committed on a magistrate, or any other officer of the law, in the discharge of his duty, or in revenge for the exercise of it,—on a parent,—on a wife,—or on any one in his own house. (See Hamesucken). Mutilation of the limbs may be charged either as the worst aggravation of assault, or as a separate offence. The punishment of assault is arbitrary, varying from imprisonment for a month, or even less, to transportation for life. In cases of great cruelty, scourging has frequently been added. See 6 Geo. IV., c. 159; Hume, i. 327-336, 26; Bell's Notes, 89, 90; Alison's Princ. 175-179, 188; Steele, 104; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 37; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 2032; *Jurid. Assedation; is an old law term, used indiscriminately to signify a lease or feu-right.

Assembly, General. See General Assembly.

Assent, Royal. When a bill has passed through all its stages in both Houses of Parliament it receives the royal assent, which is always given in the House of Lords; the Commons being summoned by the Black Rod. The Sovereign may either be present in person, or the assent may be signified by letters-patent under the great seal, signed by the Sovereign, and communicated by commissioners; who are usually three or four of the great Officers of State. The Sovereign's assent is announced by the clerk of Parliament in French. In recent times there is no instance of the royal assent being refused; although that occurred once or twice in the reign of William III. and once in the reign of Queen Anne, the bill not assented to by her having been the Scotch militia bill. In former times the refusal of the royal assent was not an unusual occurrence. By a legal fiction, all the laws passed in a session of Parliament are considered as properly only one statute, the separate acts being so many different chapters; and this fiction having led to doubts as to the proper commencement of the act, it was ordered, by 33 Geo. III., c. 13, that the clerk of Parliament should indorse on every bill the day on which it received the royal assent, and that from that day, if not otherwise provided in the act, its operation should commence. Hatsell's Precedents, p. 338, et seq.; May's Treatise on Parliamentary Law, p. 387, et seq.

Assessors to a Judge; are persons possessed of knowledge in the law, who are appointed to advise and direct the decisions of the judges in certain inferior courts. Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 25; Bank. ii. 507; Hume, ii. 15, 29, 31.

Assets; is an English law term, (now much used in Scotland), signifying, strictly speaking, goods or effects enough to discharge the burdens cast upon the heir or executor in satisfying the debts and legacies of the testator or ancestor; but applied more generally to the estate and effects of every description available for the payment of the debts of a bankrupt or insolvent. See Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Assignment. In legal phraseology, the term assignment is applied to a written deed of conveyance in favour of another, made by the creditor in any obligation, or the proprietor of any subject not properly feudal. The maker of the assignment is called the cedent; the receiver is called the assignee, or cessionary, or cessionary; and where the right or subject assigned is a debt or obligation, the obligant or debtor therein is called the common debtor. According to the usual style of the deed, assignee and his heirs and donators are made the lawful cessioners of the cedent "in and to" the sum or subject assigned, and in and to the deed by which the right is constituted, or the written evidences of the claim, if there be any. This form of expression arises from the circumstance of the deed having been anciently of the nature of a mandate or procuratory in rem suam. In modern practice, however, it has become common to use the words "assign, convey, and make over," which correspond more with the actual character and effect of the deed. The other clauses are, 1. A declaration of the nature of the assignee's powers. In the ordinary case, these powers, whether expressed or not, include, of course, all those possessed by the cedent. 2. A clause of warrandice. Generally speaking, where the right assigned is a debt, it is not to be presumed that the cedent is to warrant the solvency of the common debtor. The cedent has, in the usual case, no security that the claim will be made good, except the solvency or credit of the common debtor. Hence the implied warrandice of assignments is warrandice from fact and deed. Warrandice of a higher kind, however, may be specially given. 3. A clause, mentioning what deeds are delivered to the assignee;—and, lastly, the usual registration and testing clauses. When the assignee conveys to a third party, the deed is called a translation; and when he reconveys to the cedent, it is called a retrocession.

In order to complete the transference to the assignee, the assignation must be intimated to the common debtor; and so essential is this, that in competition, an assignation first intimated will be preferred to one prior in date, but posterior in intimation. Regularly the intimation ought to be notarial, yet the law admits equipollents when the notice to the common debtor is equally strong; e. g. a charge on letters of horning at the assignee's instance against the common debtor, or a judicial demand by action or otherwise. The assignee's possession of the right, as, for example, by receiving payment of rents or interest from the common debtor, is another equivalent to intimation; or his being a party to the assignation; or his acknowledgment in writing on the back of the assignation, or by letter. So also a written promise by the common debtor to pay to the assignee as in right of the debt, or a draft accepted or presented and protested, in the case of a money debt, will be sufficient. But the common debtor's mere private knowledge of the assignation, unaccompanied by possession on the part of the assignee, in competition with more formal rights or intimations, is not held tantamount to intimation, although such knowledge may be a sufficient bar to the common debtor's paying to the cedent. When the common debtor is out of Scotland the intimation must be made edictally; the warrant for which is obtained at the Bill-Chamber, on production of the ground of debt and assignation. Formerly edictal intimation was made at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith; but now the intimation is made at the Register House; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, §§ 51, 52; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838. See Edictal Citation.

Where a debt is due by several co-obligants, the transference of the debt will be completed, by intimation being made to any one of them. Mr Erskine observes:—"Where there are many obligants, whether joint debtors, or principals and cautioners, intimation made to any one is sufficient for completing the conveyance; but such intimation is not effectual for interpellating those to whom no intimation was made from making payment to the cedent; and therefore assignees ought in prudence to make intimation to all of them." A different rule, however, has been held to apply to the case of a partner of a firm assigning his interest in the firm to another.

In the case of Russell v. Breadalbane, 5 W. & S. 256, there were only two partners, and the one assigned to the other. Intimation in such a case was held to be unnecessary. Where, however, there are more persons than the cedent and the assignee, it has been held that the transference of the rights available against the other partners requires intimation to each of the copartners, or, what is held to be equivalent to it, intimation to the company in its social character, at its usual place of business, to one representing it. This rule was applied in the case of Hill v. Lindsay, 7th Feb. 1846, 8 D. 472, which was the case of a competition between the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the cedent partner, and an assignee partner, de facto the managing partner of the company. This circumstance, however, was held not to be equivalent to an intimation to the company. In the case of Hill v. Lindsay, Lord FULLERTON observed:—"There is no room for the application of the principle laid down by Mr Erskine, that in a joint obligation, the intimation to one of the correi debendi is a good intimation. The question here does not regard a joint obligation. The rights and correspondent obligations among the partners themselves are in their nature several. Each is bound to every one of the others by the force of the contract of copartnership; indeed it is that combination of all these several obligations which constitutes the copartnership. But it seems to follow from this, that, to complete the transference of the rights of one partner in the concern as against his copartners, there must be intimation to each of these copartners, as each of the several debtors in that combination of several obligations which is sought to be transferred. Holding this to be the sound view, the case of Russell v. Breadalbane is of no weight in the present case. There there were but two partners, and the one assigned to the other. Intimation was unnecessary and incongruous. An intimation by the assignee to himself would have been absurd. Indeed it is obvious, that in such a case an assignation, i. e., an active transference of right was unnecessary. A single renunciation by the one partner would have answered every purpose, as it would have left the remaining partner in the full possession of the whole rights of the company. But where there are more partners than the cedent and assignee, and where an active transference is necessary, the transference of the rights available against the other partners seems to require, as in other cases, intimation to all of those parties against whom the obligation was sought to be inferred. Then there was here no intimation to the company in its social character at its usual place of business, or to any one representing it, which might perhaps be held to imply an intimation to each of the partners. There was nothing but the private knowledge of the two partners, who happened to stand in the situation of cedent and assignee." Lord JEFFREY dissented, and held "that there was a very strong analogy between the claim by a partner for a dividend out of the free stock of the company, and a debt due by the company, which is the case mentioned by Mr Erskine, and to which the decisions cited by him refer." The passage in Mr Erskine is as follows:—"In debts due by a corporation, or a trading company, it would be often extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to discover all its members, and the places of their residence, so that if there were a necessity to intimate to all of them, there could be no security in the purchasing of shares in any joint stock. Wherefore, in practice, the intimation of an assignation of a debt due by an hospital, made to no other but the treasurer, was admitted as a proper intimation, Jan. 1739, Cred. of Letham (Dict. p. 738); and an intimation to two clerks, who were also the managers of a trading company, a minute of which was regularly entered into their books, was adjudged to have the effect of fully divesting the cedent; Tinw. 19th Nov. 1755; Watson of Muirhouse contra Murdoch, &c. (Dict. p. 850)."

Certain assignations require no intimation, such are indorsements to bills of exchange—adjudication, which is a judicial assignation—and marriage (quoad the husband's rights), which is a legal assignation,—the assignation to all rights vested in the bankrupt in favour of the trustee under mercantile sequestration,—and in England, the assignation under a commission of bankruptcy. The class of subjects which are not assignable is very limited. Text writers enumerate merely different rights (i. e., the rights themselves, not the profits of them), alimentary provisions and paraphernal goods; which last are said to be so peculiarly the wife's property, that if not specially assigned, they are not carried by a general assignation of the wife's moveable estate.

An assignation vests the assignee with the whole right which was in the cedent; and hence, where diligence has been raised by the cedent against the common debtor, the assignee, according to Erskine, may use the cedent's name in following it out. But without judicial authority the assignee is not entitled to execute in his own name diligence which has been raised in the name of the cedent. The requisite warrant for the change will be obtained at the Bill-Chamber, on production of the assignation; and in every case this would seem preferable to following out the diligence in the name of the cedent after he is denuded. A special assignee will not be affected by latent claims of trust pleadable against the cedent, unless they have been duly notified to the party holding the right assigned. In the case of Redfearn v. Somervail, 22d Nov. 1805, a party held some stock, apparently in his own right, but truly in trust for another company, of which he was a partner. This party having borrowed money for his own use, assigned in security to the lender the stock in the company which he held in trust, and the assignation was intimated. On his bankruptcy, a competition arose between the company, for whom the bankrupt had held the share in trust, and the assignee. Lord CRAIG, Ordinary, found that the bankrupt was not only allowed to remain in the quiet and undisturbed possession of said stock, as absolute proprietor, for a considerable time after he made the purchase, but for several years after the company for whom he held the stock in trust was dissolved. His Lordship, therefore, and in respect that it was not alleged that Francis Redfearn, the special assignee, was in mala fide to accept the assignation under challenge, sustained his claim. Somervail, the party representing the company for whom the bankrupt held the stock in trust, reclaimed against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and the Court found that the allegation of the stock in question having stood in the person of David Stewart the bankrupt, in trust for David Stewart and Company, relevant to exclude the assignation granted by the bankrupt to Francis Redfearn. Against this judgment the assignee pleaded, that it was undoubted law that a posterior assignation first intimated was preferable to a prior one which had not been intimated, and that there was no difference between such a case, in which a party conveyed a right which he once had, but which he had previously given away, and the present case, where a party conveyed a right which apparently stood in his person, but which, by a latent trust-deed, was held by him for behoof of others; that in both cases the simple form of intimation would have prevented the wrong, and that in both the safety of commerce demanded that the same rule should be adopted. The Court, however, adhered to their judgment. The assignee, however, having appealed to the House of Lords, the judgment was reversed. Lord REDSDALE observed:—"Somervail, carrying his right to the utmost possible extent, could not be in a better position than an assignee without intimation; and Redfearn, whose assignation was intimated, had clearly the preferable right. It was absurd, therefore, to say, that a person having the qualified right of a latent trust should be preferred to Redfearn, who had an intimated assignment." Lord ELDON observed:—"If latent equities were suffered to prevail against assignments, the effect would be that nothing could ever be assigned; for, as long as our Scotch neighbours retained any part of their characteristic shrewdness, they would never take an assignment, if they were aware that, by means of latent equities, such assignments might give them nothing. No case or authority of any kind has been found to support the position, that an intimated assignment might be defeated by a latent equity, which, as being latent, ex necessitate, could not be intimated."

A different rule, however, has been applied by the Court to the case of creditors who did not advance their money on the faith of a special assignment of a right held by a party, ex facie absolutely, but truly in trust for another. In the case of Dingwall v. MacCombie, June 6, 1822, 1 S. 463, a party who held certain shares in a company in trust for another transferred them in favour of the true owner within sixty days of his own bankruptcy. In a competition between the trustor and the creditors of the trustee, the former was preferred. Lord ALLOWAY, Ordinary, held that the creditors of the trustee could not stand in a better situation than he did; and the Court adhered. Lord GILLIES observed:—"It is true that, if the share belonged to Thomson (the trustee), he could not convey to Dingwall (the trustor) so near to his bankruptcy; but if he merely held it in trust, I think he could give an acknowledgment thereof at any time. There is a great difference where the question is with the creditors of the trustee and a bona fide purchaser. The creditors stand in the situation of the bankrupt, whereas a purchaser is entitled to rely on the holder being the true owner. The case of Redfearn being that of a purchaser is not applicable." In the case of Gordon v. Cheyne, Feb. 5, 1824, 2 S. 675, it was held, in conformity with the case of Dingwall v. MacCombie, that shares in a company held by a party ex facie absolutely, but truly in trust, were not attachable by the trustee for his creditors, but belonged to the trustor. Lord BALGAY observed:—"If this were a question with an intimated assignment, there could be no difficulty; but the question is, whether the share did not remain in bonis of the trustor, and whether he is not entitled to vindicate it in a question with the trustee's creditors. Trusts in moveables have been always acknowledged by us as lawful, and indeed it is impossible to carry on commerce without them. A party may be unable to act for himself, or his property may be situated in a foreign country, where he is not naturalized, and where he must avail himself of a trust. It is well known that millions of the public funds belong to foreigners, and are held for their behoof by trustees. It is therefore a very alarming doctrine to maintain, that by the bankruptcy of the trustee all the funds belonging to third parties, and confided to his care, pass immediately to his creditors. The general rule of law is, nemo plus potest transferre quam ipse habet, and assignatus utitur jure auctoris; but there are exceptions, such as heritable rights, which are governed by what appears on the record; and moveable subjects, the title to dispose of which is affected by the state of possession. But in regard to jura incorporalia the general rule has always been considered as applicable. DIRLETON and our older writers even hold it to apply to the case of a purchaser; and Lord ELCHIES was the first to point out the inconvenience of the rule being so applied. I think that the House of Lords were mistaken as to the nature of the old decisions. We were so much influenced by them, that we decided Redfearn's case in conformity to them. But the House of Lords introduced, what I think is a reasonable distinction, and one for the benefit of society. There is, however, no such benefit in applying the exception to such a case as the present, but the reverse. Then look to the equity as affecting both parties. If a creditor wish for security, he should not rely on the mere reputation of his debtor,—he should inquire and obtain a security. If he does not so, he has himself to blame. But if I place my property under the care of a trustworthy person, and he become bankrupt next day, is there any equity in transferring my property to his creditors? No doubt the prima facie appearance of the property being in the bankrupt lays on me the burden of showing that he is merely a trustee; if I do so, I am entitled to have my property restored. But would it not be most inequitable to deprive me of that right, because, without any fault on the part of myself or my trustee, he has become bankrupt. If the creditors can show any culpa on my part, whereby a false credit is raised in favour of their debtor, as if I put property into his possession so as to increase his credit, my right to restitution may be barred; but it is incumbent on them to show this; and here they have not done so. I therefore can see no reason for applying the rule of Redfearn's case to the present one. I have also been influenced in my opinion by the views and decisions in England; and in regard to matters of this nature it is expedient to approximate the two systems as nearly as possible. The English law appears indeed to be conclusive as to the distinction between purchasers and creditors, and the case of Chion is directly applicable." Lord PRESIDENT observed:—"The case is certainly not unattended with difficulty, and puzzles may be raised; but I concur in the opinion of the majority. We must look, in the first place, to Scotch principles and decisions. I think Redfearn's case an exception; and I am not inclined to extend it to the case of parties not dealing on the faith of the special subject. The general rule nemo potest, &c., and assignatus utitur, is clear, and I bow to Redfearn's case, &c., as an equitable decision, although I think it contrary to our law. Down to the publication of Elchies' Notes, no such distinction was ever drawn. He saw the blemish, but states the law to be different; and the case of Redfearn introduced the exception. But there is no similarity between it and the present one. Redfearn did not trust to general credit, he stipulated for and obtained a special subject. In that case, either he or the truster was to be elected; and the latter, who put it in the power of the trustee to defraud, must suffer. In the present case, the shares were acquired by Sanders with Gordon's money for Gordon's behoof. They are taken in name of Sanders, and so entered in the books. But the trust is proved by the letter written unico contextu with the transaction. Gordon trusts to his general honesty; so do the creditors. They take the chance of what Sanders may have; they do not lend either money or sell their goods on the security of a special subject. What equity is there in their favour in a question with the verus dominus? I can see none. But I rest my opinion on the general rule of law; and I admit that I am happy that our law has, by Redfearn's case, been assimilated to that of England. But we see that in England the same decision has been pronounced as we propose to pronounce in this case. I do not think that the bankrupt act either applies, or was intended to apply, to a case of this kind."

Assignations of moveables retenta possessione, i.e., while the cedent himself retains possession, cannot prejudice his onerous creditors. Neither will an assignation of moveables, followed by symbolical delivery and an instrument of possession, be effectual to exclude creditors. See the cases Borthwick v. Urquhart, 7 S. 420; Fraser v. Fresby, 8 S. 982; Robert v. Wallace, 5 D. 4.

In the cases of leases, where assignation is otherwise lawful, difficulties connected with the nature of the subject have arisen. The question then is, whether the right of the assignee to a lease can be completed by intimation without possession, as to which the following points appear to be settled:—1. Actual possession of the subject of the lease by the assignee certainly completes the assignation. 2. Where the principal tenant has sublet, and has then assigned, intimation to the subtenant will complete the assignation, to the effect of entitling the assignee to draw the subrent, to which the cedent would have been entitled. 3. When the object of the principal tenant is to convert his lease into a security for debt, the expedient resorted to has been to grant an assignation of the lease to the creditor, and to intimate that assignation to the landlord; and then for the assignee, as principal tenant, to grant a sublease to the cedent. In this way no change in the actual possession takes place, and there being no record of leases, the assignation remains, to a certain extent, latent, or at least a deed known, it may be, only to the landlord, the tenant and the assignee. The question as to the validity of such a security has been much agitated both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords; and although it is said to be still an open question, yet, so far as it has been decided, the general rule is, that possession, natural or civil, is indispensable to the validity of the assignation; and consequently, in a question with the creditors of the cedent, the security is not to be relied on.

In the case of Brock v. Cabbell, 8 S. 647, the question was raised, whether an assignation of a lease by a tenant to a creditor, in security of a debt, and followed by intimation to the landlord, but without any actual change of possession, was sufficient to exclude the general body of creditors of the tenant. There was considerable difference of opinion on the Bench, the majority holding that possession was necessary to complete the transference. In the House of Lords the general point was not determined, and the judgment of affirmance proceeded on the special circumstances of the case. These, however, do not appear to have been such as to have warranted a waiving of the decision of the general point raised. Money had been advanced to the tenant by a bank, and the lease had been assigned to them in security of the advance, and intimation had been made to the landlord, and a sublease was taken by the tenant from the bank, his assignee to the principal lease. This last circumstance seemed to have been considered in the House of Lords as one which, instead of mending the matter, threw suspicion on the transaction. It is difficult to see how this should be the case, the bank having done all that it could think of to complete the security which it had received. The general point, therefore, whether a lease can be effectually transferred without an actual change of possession, still remains undetermined. Consult on the subject, Bell's Com. i. 66, et seq.; Ivory's Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 26, note 102; Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, i. 487, 495.

In connection with the subject of assignations, it may be stated as a general rule, that in every case, where a creditor receives payment from a cautioner, or from one who is not the proper debtor, he is bound ex equitate, and for the relief of the cautioner, to grant an assignation to any separate security which the creditor may have held for his debt. To this rule, however, there is an exception, where such equitable assignation cannot be granted without prejudice to some separate right in the creditor; e.g., a security over the same subject for a different debt. In that case, the cautioner paying the one debt, could not demand an assignation to the security, without also making payment of the other. A postponed heritable creditor is not entitled to demand from a prior creditor an assignation to his debt on his making payment of the debt, unless he can show that such assignation is necessary to enable him to recover payment of his own postponed debt. To enable him to make such a demand, some legitimate reason must be stated. The right to demand an assignation is an equitable one, and a case must be established to justify the interposition of the equitable power of the court in favour of the party making the demand. Although it would be a good reason that the assignation was necessary to enable the postponed heritable creditor to recover his debt, it would not be a legitimate reason that he wished to acquire or keep up a good investment; Cunningham's Trustees v. Hutton, Dec. 18, 1847, 10 D. 307. In this case the Court refused to interdict a primary heritable creditor from selling, although the postponed heritable creditor offered to pay the prior debt on obtaining an assignation to the prior security. The estate, however, was sufficient to pay the whole heritable debts, and a sale was thought expedient by the tutors of the heir of the debtor. See, on the subject of this article, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 5; Stair, B. iii. tit. 1; Mr More's Notes, cclxxxi.; Bank. vol. ii. 198; Bell's Com. ii. 16, et seq.; Princ. § 1459, et seq.; 1 Dow, 50; ii. 248; Kames' Equity, 38, 74, 156, 262, 504; Menzies' Conveyancing.

Assignatus Utitur Jure Auctoris; a law maxim, importing that the assignee comes into the right and place of the cedent. See Mr More's Notes on Stair, p. lxxi. See also Assignation.

Assignee; the person in whose favour an assignation is granted.

Assignees. The assignees under an English commission of bankruptcy are persons chosen by the creditors at a meeting called by previous advertisement. The bankrupt estate is vested in the assignees, who are intrusted with the care of recovering and distributing the proceeds amongst the creditors, according to the order fixed by the commissioners. See 6 Geo. IV., c. 16; Bell's Com. ii. 303, et seq.

Assignment; an English law term, similar in import to the term assignation in the law of Scotland. An assignment is defined to be a deed or instrument of transfer, the operative words of which are, "assign, transfer, and set over;" and which passes both real and personal property. Tomlins, h. t.

It is generally supposed in Scotland that an assignation or assignment of a debt in England does not require intimation to complete the transfer. PROFESSOR BELL states, "an assignation made in England requires not the ceremony of intimation to complete the transfer of a debt due there." 2 Bell's Com. 18; Bell's Principles, 1466. Notice, however, is necessary. It was otherwise ruled by SIR THOMAS PLUMER, in the case of Cooper v. Fynmore, 1814, 3 Russell, 60, who held, that priority of time must prevail, and that mere neglect of notice was not sufficient to postpone a prior assignee, and that in order to deprive him of his priority, it was necessary that there should be such laches, as in a court of equity amounted to fraud. In the subsequent cases, however, of Deazle v. Hall, and Loveridge v. Cooper, 3, Russell, 1, the same Judge pronounced a different judgment, and observed:—"To give notice is a matter of no difficulty, and whenever persons treating for a chose in action do not give notice to the trustee or executor who is the legal holder of the fund, they do not perfect their title; they do not all that is necessary, in order to make the thing belong to them in preference to all other persons, and they become responsible in some respects for the easily foreseen consequences of their negligence. In Ryall v. Rowley, 1 Vesey senr., 371, the Judges held "that, in the case of a chose in action, you must do everything towards having possession which the subject admits of; you must do that which is tantamount to obtaining possession, by placing every person who has an equitable or legal interest in the matter under an obligation to treat it as your property. For this purpose you must give notice to the legal holder of the fund; in the case of a debt, for instance, notice to the debtor is for many purposes tantamount to possession. If you omit to give that notice, you are guilty of the same degree and species of neglect as he who leaves a personal chattel to which he has acquired a title in the actual possession and under the actual control of another person." A similar judgment was pronounced in Loveridge v. Cooper, decided of the same date with Deazle v. Hall, and both judgments were affirmed by Lord LYNCHURST, who observed:—"Where personal property is assigned, delivery is necessary to complete the transaction, not as between the vendor and vendee, but as to third parties, in order that they may not be deceived, by apparent possession and ownership remaining in a person who in fact is not the owner. This doctrine is not confined to chattels in possession, but extends to choses in action, bonds, &c. In Ryall v. Rowley, it is expressly applied to bonds, simple contract debts, and other choses in action, and Lord Chief Baron PARKER says, that on the assignment of a bond-debt the bond should be delivered, and notice given to the debtor; and he adds, that with respect to simple contract debts, for which no securities are holden, such as book-debts, for instance, notice of the assignment should be given to the debtor, in order to take away from the debtor the right of making payment to the assignor, and to take away from the assignor the power and disposition over the thing assigned. In cases like the present, the act of giving the trustee notice is, in a certain degree, taking possession of the fund. It is going as far towards equitable possession as it is possible to go; for, after notice given, the trustee of the fund becomes a trustee for the assignee who has given him notice." In Meux v. Bell, 1841, 1 Hare, 73, the Vice-Chancellor WIGRAM observed:—"I believe that, prior to the decision in Mr Sturt's case in 1809, Wright v. Lord Dorchester, 3 Russell, 49, it had never been held that the mere omission of a person having an equitable interest in a fund, the legal property of which was in another, to give notice of that interest, would of itself give a puisne incumbrancer the priority; and I think it is apparent, upon the judgment in Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 190, that Lord ELDON at that time did not consider the mere omission to give notice, when the transaction was quite destitute of fraud, would have that effect. Sir THOMAS PLUMER, also, in 1814, in the case of Cooper v. Fynmore, 3 Russell, 60, expressed clearly the law of the Court to be, that the mere omission to give notice would not postpone a prior to a puisne incumbrance. I conceive it to be now clearly decided by the cases of Deazle v. Hall, Loveridge v. Cooper, and Foster v. Cockerell, Myl. & K. 297, and 9 Bligh, N.S. 332, that, if a bona fide incumbrancer upon a fund, the legal interest in which is in a trustee, gives notice of his incumbrance to the trustee, and neither the incumbrancer giving the notice, nor the trustee at the time of such notice being given, has notice of any prior incumbrance affecting the fund, the incumbrancer giving such notice, as long as the circumstances of the case remain unaltered, will be entitled to priority over a prior incumbrancer upon the fund, who has omitted or neglected to give notice of his incumbrance, although the puisne incumbrancer may have advanced his money without making any previous inquiries of the trustee. In the absence of notice, the party claiming the prior incumbrance, has not perfected his title. In a case where there cannot be an actual transfer of the subject, he must do all that is in his power; and if he fails to do this, and another person takes an incumbrance and gives notice, the second person has acquired a perfect assignment, whilst the first equitable assignment is imperfect."

Notice given to one of several trustees will be sufficient to perfect the right of the party giving the notice; and it is immaterial that the notice was not given for the purpose of completing and giving validity to the assignment. In Smith v. Smith, 1833, 2 C. R. and Cr. and M. 231, Lord LYNCHURST, in delivering the judgment of the Court, observed: "We think that the purpose for which the notice was given, if a notice were in fact given, is altogether immaterial. If the trustee were made acquainted by the plaintiff with the fact of the assignment, there should be no necessity for giving him a second notice. It would have been a mere form, and altogether superfluous." In Meux v. Bell, the Vice-Chancellor WIGRAM observed: "The next question is, whether the first incumbrancer, in order to perfect his security, must, where there are several trustees, give notice to all of them. If notice to all is not necessary, I am unable to discover upon what principle notice to one can be deemed insufficient. If the case of Smith v. Smith has determined that notice to one trustee is sufficient, I should not exercise a sound discretion if I were to create any doubt upon that point. Another question is on the nature of the notice. It was said in argument, that it did not appear that the notice was given for the purpose of affecting the trustee with notice of the settlement. If the trustee had said that the fact had come to his knowledge in one transaction, and he had forgotten it at the time of the other, there might be reason for the distinction which has been attempted to be made with regard to the manner in which the trustee gained his information. In such a case there might be a distinction between knowledge which is the result of express and pointed instruction, and notice which is derived from casual information. If the trustee has actual knowledge, at the time the transaction takes place, I have always understood the principle of law to be, that what a man knows for one purpose, he knows for all; and you do not inquire whether he learnt it in one character or in another." 1 Hare, 73. The ground for this appears to be, that the second assignee would have been safe if he had made inquiry, for he would then have been informed of the prior assignment. Although notice to one of several holders of a fund is sufficient, this would not apply to the case of a company, consisting of numerous partners. In such a case, notice should be given to the company at its office. In the case of Thompson v. Spiers, 1845, 13 Sim. 469, the question was, whether actual notice of the assignment of a policy, effected with the Equitable Assurance Society, was necessary to take the policy out of the order and disposition of the assured. In Duncan v. Chamberlayne, 11 Sim. 123, it had been held that such notice was not necessary, on the ground that all the assured of the Equitable Society were partners. The Vice-Chancellor observed:—"The rule is, that notice to one partner is notice to the partnership; and as all the insurers in the Equitable Assurance Office are partners in the Society, the fact of the assignment of a policy by one of the assured must be taken to be a fact of which the Society had notice." In Thompson v. Spiers, 1845, 13 Sim. 469, the case of Duncan v. Chamberlayne was overruled, on the ground that, in order to take a policy of insurance out of the order and disposition of the assignor, it is essential to the interests of mankind that something should be done of a decisive nature, which might effectually prevent the payment of the proceeds to any other person than the assignee. The Vice-Chancellor observed:—"The Equitable Assurance Company is a very numerous and wealthy body, and therefore it would be idle to say, that, because the assured happens to be a member of the company in a legal sense, any act which he does, with reference to his own particular policy, is to be taken to be a partnership act, so as to affect the whole body with notice of it. In consequence of the decision in ex parte Hennessey by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, I had a conversation a few days ago with his Lordship upon the subject, and we agreed that courts of equity ought to lay down some rule which should not be founded on so unsubstantial a basis as the technical doctrine of implied or constructive notice, but which should make it morally impossible for the assignor to have dominion over the policy, without the assent of the assignee."

It has already been seen, that an assignment is complete, if the party holding the right assigned is in the knowledge of the assignment, although such knowledge may not have been obtained by an express notification by the assignee. This constitutes a material point of difference between the laws of England and Scotland, in the matter of assignments; for, in Scotland, private knowledge of an assignment by the party holding the right assigned is not sufficient to perfect the assignment, and intimation on the part of the cedent is necessary for that purpose. The English rule appears to be founded on this, that all that is required, is knowledge of the assignment by the party holding the right assigned; and that, if a proposed second assignee, before taking the assignment, does not apply to the party holding the right assigned, to ascertain whether a prior assignment exists or not, he has no just ground of complaint if it should afterwards appear that such party was in the knowledge of a prior assignment. In such a case, it would appear that the general rule, "assignatus utitur jure auctoris," is allowed to take effect. Another point of difference between the laws of the two countries appears to be, that by the law of England the puisne incumbrancer must be in bona fide, and not in the knowledge of the prior incumbrancer. By the law of Scotland again, the assignation first intimated prevails, in the case of an incumbrance or security.

Assisa; has various significations in the older law of Scotland: thus, it signifies properly a sitting in session—and is taken also in the Regiam Majestatem for a constitution, ordinance, or law. It is likewise used to signify a measure of quantity,—a rent due to the king,—and finally, it signifies a jury, in which last acceptation it is still in use. Skene, h. t.

Assize; sometimes signifies the sittings of a court, sometimes its ordinances, and sometimes it signifies a jury; see Skene, De Significatione Verborum, under the word Assisa. A jury, or assize, in the Court of Justiciary, consists of fifteen men, formerly chosen by the Court, now balloted, from a greater number (not exceeding forty-five,) summoned by the Sheriff, and of whom a list must be served on the defender along with the copy of his indictment. This number used to be restricted to forty-five, but power was given, by 6 Geo. IV., c. 22, to the Lord-Justice Clerk, or any one of the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary, to direct a larger number to be summoned where required. This power has been exercised where there were several panels to be tried on one indictment; and to the High Court and Glasgow Circuits respectively sixty-five and one hundred are cited. *Ersk. Associate in Crime. See Accomplice.

Assolzie; is to free a party from the conclusions of an action, or to find a criminal not guilty.

Assumpsit; is the commonest form of action in the English courts for the recovery of damages occasioned by the breach of a simple contract. The name is derived from the plaintiff asserting that the defender undertook to perform or pay something to him; and hence, the action can only be sustained when there has been an express promise, or when equivalent circumstances have taken place. Tomlins, h. t.; Wharton, h. t.

Assumption of Thirds. This was a provision for the clergy by the act 1567, c. 10, which directed the whole tithes of all the Popish benefices, without exception, to be paid to the collectors for the ministers' stipend; and particular localities were assigned in every benefice to the extent of a third. This was called the Assumption of Thirds. This plan of providing for the clergy was rendered unproductive by the act 1606, c. 2, restoring bishops, who, though laid under an obligation to provide for their clergy out of the thirds, succeeded in evading the law. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 17.

Assumption, Deed of; is a deed executed by trustees under a trust-deed or deed of settlement, assuming a new trustee or trustees. An express power from the truster is necessary in order to entitle trustees to execute such a deed; the terms of which must, of course, depend upon the nature of the powers conferred by the trust-deed. See Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 498, 3d edit.; Duff on Deeds; Menzies on Conveyancing.

Assurance. See Insurance.

Assurance, Oath of. See Oaths.

Assythment; is an indemnification due to the heirs of a person murdered from the person guilty of the crime. The assythment may be made the ground of an action, where ever a person pleads on a remission, since the doing so is an acknowledgment of the crime. It may also be the ground of an action, wherever the crime has been found by the decision of a court; M'Hary v. Campbell, Feb. 24, 1767, M. p. 12541. But, where the criminal has suffered the pains of law, no claim for assythment lies. If the criminal has fled, and been fugitated, the assythment may be obtained from the donatory of the escheat of the criminal. Astriction; is the obligation imposed by the servitude of thirlage, by which certain lands are astricted to a particular mill, and the possessors bound to grind their grain there. Stair, B. iv. tit. 15; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, §§ 18, 32; Bell's Princ. § 1017, 3d edit.; Brown's Synop. p. 3. See Thirlage.

Atheism; disbelief in the existence of God. Under the act 1661, c. 21, and 1695, c. 11, persons guilty of certain degrees of this offence were liable to capital punishment; but these statutes were repealed by the 53 Geo. III., c. 160, § 3, and the punishment is now arbitrary at common law. See Hume, vol. i. p. 568; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 23, and note; tit. 4, § 16; Bank. vol. ii. p. 645; *Kames' Stat. Attachiamentum; from the French word attacher, used in the Regiam Majestatem to signify a charge or binding of a person, to the effect he may be compelled to appear to answer in judgment. It also signifies an attachment of goods and effects by arrestment or otherwise. Skene, h. t.

Attachment; in English law, is a judicial proceeding, answering to what in Scotland is termed arrestment, by means of which a creditor may obtain the security of the goods or other personal property of his debtor, in the hands of a third person, for the purpose, in the first instance, of enforcing the appearance of the debtor to answer to an action; and afterwards, upon his continued default, of obtaining the goods or property absolutely in satisfaction of the demand. Attachment is also used to signify a kind of criminal process, which courts of record are authorized summarily to issue upon a mere suggestion, or upon the personal knowledge of the judges, without indictment or information. It is properly granted in cases of contempt. Tomlins, h. t.

Attainder; is the corruption of blood consequent on a conviction for high treason. Its effect is to make the convicted person forfeit his honours and dignities, and become incapable of succeeding to any ancestor. The estate, which he is thus prevented from taking, falls to the immediate superior as escheat. It follows as a necessary consequence of the corruption of blood, that the heirs of the attainted person cannot inherit upon his death, nor can an heir succeed to an ancestor where the propinquity between the two is through the attainted person. *Ersk. Attaynt; convicted. Skene, h. t.

Attempt at Murder. At common law, an attempt at murder is held to have been committed when the panel has inflicted an injury of such a nature as shows him to have been quite reckless of the life of the sufferer; or when he has done all that he could to accomplish his purpose, although no injury may have ensued; as, e.g., where the pistol misses fire, or the ball does not hit its object. An act of a more remote nature, by which the panel intended to destroy life, and which would have had that effect had it not been defeated, amounts to this crime. But mere preparations for murder, while the deed is still in the panel's option, are not legally cognisable. Any circumstances, which would have made the killing amount only to justifiable or culpable homicide, if the wounded man had died, will of course go to extenuate the attempt. Attempt at murder is punishable at common law with any pain short of death. By 10 Geo. IV., c. 38, attempt to murder, or to do severe bodily injury, is capital in the following cases:—1. Where loaded fire-arms are discharged, or attempted to be discharged, at any one. In this case, the intention to kill or injure does not need proof. 2. Stabbing or cutting with intent to murder or inflict injury. In this case the intent must be proved, and also that it has taken effect on the person aimed at. 3. Where poison is administered with intent to murder or inflict injury. Here, also, the intent must be proved, and the poison must have been actually swallowed, and not merely put in the way of the intended victim. 4. An attempt to suffocate, strangle, or drown, with intent to kill or inflict injury. Here the intent must be proved. 5. Where sulphuric acid or other corrosive substance is thrown at a person with intent to murder, disfigure, or injure, and where the person aimed at has been disfigured or seriously injured in consequence. The mere throwing of the acid, or its burning or destroying the dress, will not be sufficient. Here also the intent must be proved. Circumstances which would have lowered the crime from murder, had death followed, do not render the statute inapplicable, but merely modify the punishment. The prosecutor has the power of restricting the pains of law without departing from the statute. See Hume, i. 26-30; Bell's Com. p. 66; Alison, 163; Steele's Powers and Duties of Juries, 98. See Murder.

Attessor, in the Bill-Chamber; is one who attests the sufficiency of a cautioner offered in the Bill-Chamber. Where a cautioner is offered and objected to, and where the objection cannot be otherwise obviated to the satisfaction of the clerk of the bills, the additional caution of an attessor is interposed. The attessor not only certifies the sufficiency of the cautioner offered, but binds himself subsidiarie along with the cautioner; whereas, when a justice of the peace or other respectable person certifies that the proposed cautioner is habite and repute in good circumstances, such a certificate imports no more than that at the time the fact so certified is true, without inferring any personal responsibility beyond the knowledge and belief of the magistrate, or other person certifying. *A. Attorney; one appointed by another to act for him in his absence. There is not in Scotland, as in England, a class of practitioners of the law who take the name of attorneys. The office of attorney in Scotland is private, and conferred by letters of attorney, which regulate the extent of power conferred on the attorney. In the ceremony of giving sasine, the person who acted for, or represented the party who was to be infeft, and who, as his procurator, received symbolical delivery, was denominated the attorney, and was formerly appointed by special letters of attorney; but now possession of the warrant for infeftment is held to be sufficient evidence of his commission, though a fraudulent use of the warrant may annul the sasine. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, §§ 16 and 17; More's Notes, p. xi.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 478; vol. ii. p. 349, 5th edit.; Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 303, et seq. 3d edit. See Infeftment.

Attorney's Certificate. Under certain revenue statutes, every writer to the Signet, solicitor, agent, attorney, or procurator in the law courts in Scotland, is subject to a high license-duty on his admission; and, in order to authorize him to make, or at least to recover, his professional fees or charges for judicial business, he is also bound annually to take out, and to record, in a special record kept for the purpose, a stamped certificate or license. The license-duty at present payable by an agent, solicitor, or writer to the Signet, on his admission as a practitioner, is L.25. An agent in the Supreme Court, if admitted without indenture, pays (in addition to the above L.25) the sum of L.60. In the inferior courts, if admitted without an indenture, (in addition to the above L.25,) L.30. For a license to act as a notary-public, the stamp is L.20; and the annual license of attorneys or agents resident in the city or shire of Edinburgh, who have been admitted for three years or upwards, is L.9. Where under three years, L.4, 10s. If resident elsewhere in Scotland, under three years, L.3: if of three or more years' standing, L.6 per annum. In Edinburgh (city and county) these annual certificates are entered in a record kept by an officer appointed by the Judges of the Court of Session, who marks on the back of the certificate the date of its being exhibited to him, and then redelivers it to the party; and this entry must be made by 31st December yearly, or before the agent begins to practise. These certificates, in Scotland, are issued from the Stamp Office annually between 31st October and 1st December: they bear date 1st November, and they expire annually on 31st October. The penalty of a failure to take out and record such annual certificate is, that the defaulter shall forfeit L.50, and "be incapable of maintaining or prosecuting any action, suit, or proceeding in any court of law or equity, for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement, upon, account of, or with relation to, any business, matter, or thing performed, executed, directed, or conducted by him in any character or capacity requiring a certificate." The statutes regulating this matter are, 25 Geo. III., c. 80; 37 Geo. III., c. 90 (which, however, seems to be limited to England); 7 Geo. IV., c. 44; 9 Geo. IV., c. 49; and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 63. The result of several decisions in the Court of Session rather appears to be, that the penal clause in the statutes is personal to the agent, operating as a bar against his suing his client for the recovery of judicial expenses incurred, as well as disbursements made, while he had not a license; or, where expenses have been found due to his client, barring the agent-disburser from taking decree in his own name against the opposite party; but that it presents no bar to a decree for expenses in name of the client who has employed the unlicensed agent; at least where the client, in ignorance of his agent's omission, has actually paid him, and has been found entitled to costs against the opposite party in the suit. The decisions on this point, however, have not been uniform; and at all events it seems to be clear, that the Court will not sanction any collusive arrangement between agent and client, whereby the object of the above statutes may be evaded, and the agent enabled to recover, in name of his client, what he would not have been entitled to sue for in his own name. See on this subject, Barry v. Singer, July 8, 1826, 4 S. 813; Smyth v. Nisbet, Feb. 20, 1827, 5 S. 388; M'Gown v. Begg, Jan. 24, 1828, 6 S. 420; Darling v. Adamson, Nov.

Attorney-General. In England and Ireland the Attorney-General is the first ministerial law-officer of the Crown, appointed by letters-patent. He is, in principle, attorney for the Sovereign, to whom he stands in the same relationship that any other attorney does to his employer. His official duty is to exhibit informations, and conduct prosecutions for such crimes and offences as tend to endanger the state; to advise the heads of the various departments of Government on legal questions; to conduct all suits and prosecutions connected with the recovery of the revenue of the Crown, for the protection of charitable endowments; and, in general, to appear in all courts in England or Ireland, when the interests of the Crown are in question. Many questions of precedence have arisen between the Attorney-General and other functionaries; but it was settled by royal warrant in 1811, that the Attorney and Solicitor-General take rank at the head of the English bar; and by the Lord Chancellor in 1834, that at the bar of the House of Lords, the Attorney-General has precedence of the Lord Advocate of Scotland. In some respects, the office of Attorney-General is analogous to that of Lord Advocate; but the powers of the Lord Advocate are greatly more extensive and uncontrolled. Black. iii. 27; Tomlins, h. t. See Advocate, Lord.

Attorney-at-Law. In the English Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, the profession of attorney-at-law is analogous to that of law-agent or solicitor in Scotland; and to that of Solicitor in the Courts of Chancery, and of Proctor in the Ecclesiastical Courts. In England, anciently, suitors could not appear in court by attorney, without the king's special warrant; but by stat. 13 Edward I., c. 10, parties were empowered to prosecute and defend by attorney; after which the attorneys were formed into a regular body of law-practitioners. They are now admitted to practise in the English courts, and enrolled according to certain statutory regulations. They must also take out a certificate at the Stamp Office annually; and in other respects their duties, responsibilities, and privileges, resemble those of law-agents in Scotland. See Bacon's Abridg. voce Attorney; Tidd's Prac. c. 3 and 14; Memfield's Law of Attornies; 1 Chitt. Arch. v. Attornies; and especially the Attornies' and Solicitors' Act, 6 and 7 Vict. c. 73. See Attorney's Certificate.

Auction or Roup; a mode of selling various descriptions of property, by a competition of bidders or offerors, under certain conditions previously stipulated. These conditions set forth the terms of the contract between the exposor and the offeror or purchaser. See More's Notes to Stair, pp. lx. lxiv. et seq., xci; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3. § 2, and note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 130, et seq., 2425, 2430, 3d edit.; Bell's Illust. § 130; *Swint. Auctioneer; is the person who officiates at an auction. He puts up the articles to sale at a certain price; he calls the offers; and declares the purchaser by knocking down the article to him. An auctioneer must take out a license annually, for which a duty is paid to Government. 42 Geo. III., c. 93, and other Stamp Acts.

Auditor; an officer or agent of the Crown, or of a private party, or of a corporation, who examines periodically the accounts of under officers, tenants, stewards, or bailiffs, and reports the state of their accounts to his principal. Tomlins, h. t.

Auditor of the Court of Session; an officer appointed by the Crown, to whom either of the Divisions, or any Lord Ordinary, remit to tax the costs of a suit in which expenses are found due. A special remit of the particular account to be taxed is necessary; and the auditor returns a report to the Judge or Court making the remit, who thereupon pronounces decree for the amount of the taxed account. If either party considers himself aggrieved by the report of the auditor, it is competent for him to state his objections to the Court or Judge, by whom they will be summarily and finally disposed of. This officer was appointed for the first time by the Court itself, by Act of Sederunt, 6th February 1806, and his fees were settled by Act of Parliament 50 Geo. III., c. 112, § 48. And by 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 32, the office is made permanent, and the nomination is vested in the Crown; the office to be held ad vitam aut culpam. Two auditors may be appointed, if necessary; one for each Division. The auditor cannot practise before the Court, either directly or indirectly, under pain of deprivation of office. If unable to discharge his duties from temporary indisposition or absence, the Court may appoint a fit person, though practising before the Court, to officiate in the interim. Prior to the passing of the stat. 59 Geo. III., c. 35 (1819), costs in jury causes were taxed by the second and third jury clerks; but by that statute, § 33, the auditor of the Court of Session is also appointed auditor of accounts in jury causes. The persons eligible to the office are writers to the Signet, who have practised as such for not less than three years, and members of the incorporation of solicitors before the Supreme Courts in Scotland; 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 32. The auditor's salary is now fixed by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 24. In the inferior courts, an officer, with the like powers, is usually appointed by the particular court. See on the subject of this article, Shand's Prac. i. 118; Macfarlane's Jury Practice, 8, 291; Shaw's Digest; 11 S. 62; 13 S. 964. See also Expenses.

Augmentation, Process of; is a process in the Teind Court, raised by the minister of a parish against the titular and heritors, for the purpose of obtaining an increase of his stipend. By stat. 48 Geo. III., c. 138 (1808), it is enacted, that no stipend which has been modified before the passing of that act shall be augmented until fifteen years after the date of the last final decree of modification; and that all stipends augmented after the passing of that act shall not be again augmented for twenty years; nor at any future period is a stipend ever to be augmented until twenty years after the date of the last decree of modification. The same statute provides, that all augmentations shall in future be modified in grain or victual, unless when peculiar circumstances render it necessary to modify them in money; but although modified in grain, the stipend is to be paid in money, according to the fair prices of that year for which it is payable. It is also enacted (§ 17 of this statute), that in addition to the heritors, the minister pursuing a process of augmentation shall cite the moderator and clerk of the presbytery of the bounds. The summons of augmentation has two objects: first, The ascertainment or modification, as it is expressed, of a suitable stipend for the minister, regard being had to the state of the teinds of the parish, its extent, and other circumstances; and, secondly, The allocation or localling of the stipend, so modified, on the heritors. There is also a conclusion for a suitable sum for communion elements; and in his summons the minister must state, as accurately as he can, the number of the inhabitants, the extent of the parish, and the other circumstances on which he founds. The summons is signed by the teind clerk, and passes the Signet. The titular, or the tacksmen of the teinds, heritors, or liferenters, or other intromitters with the teinds, and others having interest, are not cited personally, but by the precentor giving public notice from his desk, immediately before the congregation is dismissed from the forenoon service, This notice specifies the day in which the summons will be called in court, being not less than six weeks after the date of the first notice, and the notice must be repeated three several Sundays; a certificate to that effect being transmitted to the pursuer's agent. Notice in writing must also be put up on the principal door of the church by a messenger-at-arms or by a constable, who also transmits to the pursuer's agent a certificate to that effect; and, finally, the pursuer must insert similar notices, three several days, in the Edinburgh Evening Courant, Caledonian Mercury, and Edinburgh Advertiser Newspapers. When it is necessary to call the Officers of State for the interest of the Crown, they are called on induciae of six weeks; and the moderator and clerk of presbytery are sufficiently cited by a letter from the pursuer himself, engrossed in the presbytery record, one month before the summons is called in court; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825.

As soon as the summons is signeted, the pursuer must lodge with the clerk of court a note of the amount of the present stipend, specifying how it is paid, and the amount of the communion elements. He must also give in a rental of the parish (usually called the minister's rental), distinguishing the rent of each heritor as exactly as he can; and when the summons is called, which is by calling list, as in the Court of Session, the case is enrolled in the ordinary action roll of the Teind Court (Inner-House), when all concerned will be allowed to see the summons and writings produced in the clerk's hands, for fourteen days. On the lapse of that period the case may be again enrolled, when a proof will be allowed of the rental of minors' lands, and the heritors who are major will be held as confessed on the minister's rental, unless one or more of them take a day to depone. One act and commission, at the expense of the heritors deponing, is in that case extracted for the whole, on which they or their factors may depone; and as to the rental of minors' lands, it may be proved by a certificate under the hand of any of the tutors or curators, without extracting an act and commission. When the day assigned for deponing and proving has elapsed, the cause may be again enrolled, to have the term for proving circumduced, and a remit made to the junior Lord Ordinary to prepare a scheme of the rental, either according to the minister's rental, if there has been no proof, or according to the proof led, and the certificates of rental and decrees of valuation produced. And when the scheme of the proven rental (as it is technically called) is prepared, the cause may be again enrolled before the Teind Court, when the parties will be heard, viva voce, on the merits, and the augmentation granted or refused. When a decree modifying a stipend has been pronounced, it is declared by the Act of Sederunt, 12th Nov. 1825, to be final, and not subject to review in the Teind Court by petition or otherwise, unless it has been pronounced in absence; in which case a note may be given in by the defenders, praying to be heard; and on payment of previous expenses the case may be reheard. But doubts have been lately raised whether an interlocutor of the Teind Court refusing an augmentation may not be submitted to review, by a reclaiming petition to the Teind Court. The doubt is founded on the enactment in the Judicature Act (1825), that the ministerial and discretionary jurisdiction of the Teind Court, expressly including the modification of stipends, "shall nowise be altered or affected by this act;" and although the Teind Court Act of Sederunt, 12th Nov. 1825, plainly contemplates an assimilation of the practice of that Court to the altered practice of the Court of Session, as to the finality of Inner-House interlocutors, the question mooted, and likely soon to be tried, is as to the power of the Court, under the words of the statute, to alter the older practice of the Teind Court by an Act of Sederunt; see 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 54. When the decree of modification is pronounced, the Teind Court at the same time remits to the second junior Lord Ordinary to prepare a scheme of locality; i.e., an allocation of the modified stipend on the several heritors or others liable therefor; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. (See Locality). Whether the heritors oppose the augmentation or not, unless in very special circumstances, the minister's own expenses, at least, must be borne by himself; but the heritors are at the sole expense of the locality, the common agent being authorized to furnish the minister with an extract of the decree of locality, interim or final, at the common expense; A. S. 5th July 1809. As to the mode of applying for the benefit of the statutes 50 Geo. III., c. 84, and 5 Geo. IV., c. 52, for improving small stipends, and making allowances in lieu of manse and glebes, see Small Stipend; and see on the subject of the present article, More's Notes on Stair, pp. xciii. cccxxvii.; *Ersk. Author; in Scots law, signifies the person from whom a proprietor has purchased or acquired property by singular titles, as contradistinguished from an ancestor, from whom the property has come by descent. Ersk. B. ii. t. 7, § 1. See Ancestor.

Authorship. See Literary Property.

Auto de Fe; or Auto da Fe (Act of Faith); was the public and solemn reading of extracts from the trials promoted by the Inquisition, and of the sentences, condemnatory or of acquittal, pronounced by the judge of that tribunal. The offenders, or their bones or effigies, were present at this ceremony. The civil and criminal authorities of the place were also present, into whose hands the offenders were delivered for punishment. See Encyc. Brit., voce Act of Faith.

Avail of Marriage; was the sum formerly payable to the superior by the heir of a deceased ward vassal, on his becoming marriageable. Marriage was a casualty in wardholding, which entitled the ward superior to receive from the heir of his former vassal a certain sum as the value (avail) or tax due on his marriage. Anciently, this casualty affected minor heirs only, who, after puberty, refused to marry upon the superior's requisition; but afterwards the single avail became due, though the heir had been major at the death of his ancestor, and had died, neither married, nor required to marry, by the superior. The avail was not due where the heir was married before the ancestor's death, or where he died before puberty. The single avail was fixed by the Court of Session, in 1674, at three years' rent of the vassal's estate; but it was afterwards reduced to two years' rent. The double avail was due where the superior offered a wife to the heir, in every respect his equal, who publicly declared her readiness to marry him, but whom he refused to marry, and married another. At first, the double avail was estimated at two single avails; but it is probable that, had it been questioned, it would have been reduced to three years' free rent of the vassal's estate. In estimating the amount of the avail, not only the ward estate, but the whole other free estate of the vassal, was brought in computo, as it stood at the period when he became marriageable. The act 20 Geo. II., c. 50, abolishing wardholding, put an end to this exaction. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 47, and Moré's Notes, p. ccviii.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 18, et seq.; Bank. i. 637, et seq.

Average; a term used in commerce and navigation to signify a contribution made by the owners of the ship, freight and goods on board, or the insurers of these, in proportion to their respective interests, towards any particular loss or expense sustained for the general safety of the ship and cargo. This is the original and proper meaning of average; and in this sense it is commonly called general, or gross average, as falling generally, or on the gross amount of ship, cargo, and freight; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 583, 5th edit. This contribution was established by the Rhodian law, and prevails in every commercial nation. Passengers on board, with the apparel, jewels, &c., of their persons, seamen's wages and provisions, suffer no part of the general average. Goods thrown overboard are estimated (in later times) at the price they would have brought at the port of delivery, freight, duties, &c. deducted. See Contribution.

Particular Average, is used to denote a loss for which no relief can be had by general contribution; e.g., the loss of an anchor, the accidental loss of any part of the ship or cargo washed from the deck, &c. Bell's Com. ib.

Petty Averages, are the accustomed duties of anchorage, pilotage, &c., which, when they occur in the usual course of the voyage, are not considered as a loss, but as part of the necessary expense; Bell's Com. ib. p. 567; but if incurred for any extraordinary purpose, or to avoid impending danger, they are regarded as a loss includible within gross average. Ersk. B. iii. t. 3, § 17; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 437, et seq.; Illust. ib. See Collision of Ships. And on the subject of this article generally, consult Park on Insurance, c. vii.; Marshall, B. i. c. 12, § 7; Stevens on Average; Benecke on Indemnity; Abbot on Shipping, part 3, c. 8.

Average Bond; is a deed which it is usual for the parties liable to a general average to execute, empowering an arbiter to ascertain the value of the property lost, and to fix the proportion of the loss which each proprietor shall bear. See Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 554, 2d edit.; Smith's Maritime Practice, p. 144.

Averia. In the Regiam Majestatem, this word signifies the best animal, which, in law, was given by a husbandman to his master as an hereselde.

Averment; in Scotch judicial proceedings, is a statement in point of fact, which the party making it is understood to be prepared to prove. The word seems to have a different meaning in English law. See Tomlins' Law Dict.

Aversio. Sale per aversionem, means sale by the bulk; as, all the wine in one's cellar. Stair, B. i. tit. 15, § 17; Bank. vol. i. p. 419.

Avizandum. To make avizandum with a process, or part of it, is to take it from the public court to the private consideration of the judge. When a Lord Ordinary in the Court of Session, either after hearing parties, or, of consent, without a debate, is called upon to pronounce his decision, and, in place of doing so de plano in open court, takes time to consider, he makes avizandum with the process and debate, if there has been one, and a formal interlocutor to that effect is in such cases written out. The process is then transmitted to him by the clerk; and, after considering it, the Lord Ordinary issues his decision in the usual form. Prior to the changes introduced by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, when the parties had finally adjusted their averments and answers, and were prepared to close the record, the cause was enrolled before the Lord Ordinary, who made avizandum with it, with the view of seeing how far the averments of the parties met each other, and that the record was in a fit shape for being closed, a formal interlocutor making avizandum being also written by the clerk; and the Lord Ordinary having satisfied himself that the record was correctly framed, returned the case from avizandum, and ordered it to be enrolled, for the purpose of closing the record, as more particularly explained voce Record. This form of procedure is now entirely abolished, except in actions of multipointing and other processes of competition, which are still regulated by the former rule; and the revised papers are now simply transmitted to the Lord Ordinary by the clerk, without any enrolment or formal interlocutor for the purpose. With incidental proceedings, such as reports ordered by himself for his own information, the Lord Ordinary usually makes avizandum. In consistorial actions also he makes avizandum with the summons, in order to consider and dispose of the relevancy of the averments before allowing proof. See Record; Great Avizandum; Stair, B. iv. t. 2, § 9; t. 20, § 20; t. 43, §

Avulsio; takes place where lands are, by an inundation or current, separated from the property to which they originally belonged, and added to the lands of another person; or where a river changes its course, and, in place of continuing to run between two properties, cuts off part of one, and joins it to the other. The property of the part thus separated continues in the original proprietor; in which respect the term avulsio may be contrasted with the term alluvio, by which an addition is insensibly made to a property by the gradual washing down of a river, and which addition becomes the property of the owner of the lands to which the addition is made. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 14; Bank. i. 506; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 936. See Alluvio.

Award; is properly an English law term, signifying the judgment or determination of an arbiter. It is sometimes used in Scotland, but improperly, to signify a decree-arbital; for the award of an English arbiter, and the decree-arbital of a Scotch arbiter, are not in all respects analogous. Ersk. B. iv. t. 3, § 21; Bell's Com. ii. 304, 326, 5th edit. See Arbitration.

Back-Bond; is a deed attaching a qualification or condition to the terms of a conveyance or other instrument. This deed is used when particular circumstances render it necessary to express in a separate form the limitations or qualifications of a right. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 16; B. ii. tit. 10, § 6; B. iii. tit. 1, § 21; Bank. vol. ii. pp. 95, 196; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 34, 672; vol. ii. pp. 211, 240, 5th edit.; Brown's Synop. p. 1527; Jurid. Styles, 3d edit. vol. ii. p. 101, et seq.; vol. iii. p. 682. See Absolute Disposition.

Back-Tack; was a tack connected with wadsets, whereby the actual possession of the wadset lands was continued, or returned, to the proprietor or reverser, on payment of a rent corresponding to the interest of the loan. Where the wadset was accompanied by such a back-tack, it was termed an improper wadset. Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 11; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 28; Bank. vol. ii. p. 128, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 641. See Wadset.

Backing a Warrant. Where a warrant for apprehending a person is granted in one jurisdiction, and comes to be executed in another, the judge ordinary of the bounds, or a justice of the peace, if otherwise competent, must concur in authorizing his officers to aid the person possessed of the original warrant in carrying it into execution. This authority is given by indorsing or backing the warrant, as it is termed, which is then executed by an officer of the jurisdiction where the indorsement was made. See Hume, ii. 78; Alison's Prac. 125. The remedy of indorsement of a warrant applies, where the offender has made his escape out of one part of the United Kingdom into another, or out of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions into the United Kingdom, and vice versa; 13 Geo. III., c. 31; 45 Geo. III., c. 92; 54 Geo. III., c. 186; 6 and 7 Vict., c. 34; but, in such cases, oath to the authenticity of the warrant must be made by the bearer before the magistrate to whom he applies. The raling statute on this point, 13 Geo. III., c. 31, applies only where the object of the apprehension is to bring the offender to trial. Any officer may convey a prisoner to gaol, or before a magistrate, through any county adjoining to that over which such magistrate possesses jurisdiction, or to that where the gaol is situated, in the same way as if he were an officer of the county through which he may so pass, and as if the warrant had been granted or indorsed by a magistrate of such county; 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., c. 37, § 6. Farther, it is provided by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 119, § 25, that a criminal warrant, granted by a Sheriff against one charged with committing a crime within his jurisdiction, is sufficient for his apprehension within another county, and without indorsation, if executed by a messenger-at-arms or an officer of the court where it was issued. The apprehension of French criminals found within the British dominions is regulated by 6 and 7 Vict., c. 75. The act 6 and 7 Vict., c. 76, provides for the mutual delivering up of parties found in this country or in the United States of America, and charged with having committed certain specified offences within the jurisdiction of the other power. See on the subject of this article, M'Kay v. M'Adam, June 16, 1854; 1 Irvine, 497, and cases there cited. See also Bail.

Bagimont's Roll; was the rent roll of benefices in Scotland made up by Benemundus de Vicci, vulgarly called Bagimont, who was employed, in the reign of Alexander III. (A.D. 1275), to collect the tenth of benefices. Skene's account of this roll is erroneous. See Hailes' Annals, vol. iii. p. 200; Bank. ii. 53; Skene, h. t.

Bail; is the security given for the appearance of a person accused of a crime. Persons committed, or about to be committed, for trial, are entitled, under the act 1701, c. 6, to be liberated on bail, provided the crime charged against them is not capital. And in extraordinary circumstances the Court of Justiciary may take bail even in capital cases; Hume, ii. 90, et seq. It is competent, too, for the Lord Advocate, in cases clearly capital, to consent to bail; but such bail may be fixed at any amount he pleases; Alison's Prac. 167. The stat. 9 Geo. II. c. 35, § 35, also authorizes bail to be taken for officers of the customs or excise, and those assisting them, when, in the execution of their duty, they have killed or wounded any one, and thereby exposed themselves to a capital charge. The same is the case where persons have been killed or wounded on board a vessel, which has refused to submit to seizure or examination by a vessel of the royal navy or revenue; 24 Geo. III., sess. 2, c. 47, § 23; 47 Geo. III.,

s. 2, c. 66, § 36. By 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 73, no person committed for trial for an offence, the punishment of which is, by 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 123, commuted from death into transportation for life, is entitled to bail, the Court of Justiciary, however, having power to admit to bail. And by 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 36, persons accused of high crimes and offences against the Post-Office laws cannot insist on bail; but bail, even in these cases, may be accepted, with consent of the public prosecutor, or at the discretion of the Lords of Justiciary or of the Sheriff; See Bell's Notes on Hume, 158. The application for liberation on bail ought to be made in writing, and may be addressed to the judge committer, or to the Commissioners of Justiciary, or other judge competent to try for the crime. The magistrate must, within twenty-four hours after the petition comes into his hands, determine whether the crime be bailable, and fix the amount of the bail, unless when it is necessary, on a charge for sedition, to correspond with the Lord Advocate, in order to ascertain whether he means to apply for extension of the amount of the bail; in which case, it is thought that time for correspondence will be allowed; Andrew v. Murdoch, June 20, 1806, Hume, ii. p. 93; but see Alison's Prac. 172. On the requisite bail being found, the magistrate is bound immediately to liberate the prisoner. A failure in any part of the magistrate's duty subjects him to an action for wrongful imprisonment; 1701, c. 6. It is the duty of the clerk, and not of the magistrate, to determine the sufficiency of the cautioner.

By 39 Geo. III., c. 49, the maximum for bail is fixed for L.1200 sterling for a nobleman, L.600 for a landed gentleman, L.300 for any other gentleman, burgess, or householder, and L.60 for any inferior person; and, on a charge of sedition, any of the Lords of Justiciary, on an application from the Lord Advocate, may extend the bail to such sum as may be thought proper in the circumstances of the case. Some of the revenue statutes fix particular bail for offences against the revenue laws. See 24 Geo. III., c. 47; 42 Geo. III., c. 82; 15 Geo. III., c. 121. The bail found is, that the person admitted to bail shall appear and answer to any libel for the offence charged, which shall be raised within six months after the date of the bail-bond; and if the trial is to proceed in an inferior court, and the party fail to appear, the bail-bond is declared forfeited, and warrant granted for apprehending him, inferior judges having no power to outlaw for non-appearance; Hume, ii. p. 69. As soon as the prisoner is remitted to an assize, the privilege of bail ceases; but he may still receive that indulgence thereafter, if the prosecutor, in special circumstances, consent, and under such penalty as the Court may fix beyond the statutory sum; Hume, ii. 94. Where persons are apprehended in Scotland on a warrant, indorsed in terms of the 13 Geo. III., c. 31, or 44 Geo. III., c. 92 (see Backing a Warrant), for crimes committed in other parts of the United Kingdom, and brought before the judge who indorses the warrant, he may, if the offence be bailable, take bail for the person accused, in the same manner as the judge who issued the warrant might have done. If the offence charged be not bailable, the judge who grants the original warrant must write on the face of it, "not bailable;" and, where these words are not written, the judge before whom the offender is brought, under the indorsed warrant, may admit him to bail; 45 Geo. III., c. 29, § 51 and 2. See also *Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 85, and note, § 31, and note; Bank. vol. i. p. 458; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 380; vol. ii. 566; Bell's Princ. § 2035; Swint. Bail in Civil Actions. See Caution.

Bailiary, Letter of; is a commission, by which an heritable proprietor, entitled to grant such a commission, appoints a baron-bailie, with the usual powers to hold courts, appoint officers under him, &c. See Jurid. Styles, ii. p. 269, 3d edit.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 33, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 764, 770; Brown's Synop. p. 1104.

Bailie; a magistrate; also an officer appointed by a precept of sasine to give infestment in land.

1. A Magistrate.—The bailie of a burgh, whether a royal burgh or a burgh of barony, is a magistrate possessed of certain jurisdiction by common law as well as by statute. Thus, at common law, he is held to possess the same power within his territory as the sheriff in his county; and by special statute, 1644, c. 33, 1668, c. 6, the provost and bailies of royal burghs have power to value and sell ruinous houses to the highest offerer. Their criminal jurisdiction extends to petty riots; but none except the magistrates of the burghs of Edinburgh, Stirling, and Perth, have jurisdiction in bloodwits. The chief magistrate of the burgh is named in all commissions of the peace. By 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, when any of the bailies go out at the annual retirement of a third of the councillors, their places are directed to be supplied from the councillors, on the third day after the election of the council, by a plurality of voices in the council, the first attending magistrate having a casting vote in cases of equality. The newly-elected bailie is generally made lowest in rank. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 21. See Burgh, Royal.

The Bailie of the Abbey, is appointed by the Duke of Hamilton as heritable keeper of the palace of Holyroodhouse, and has jurisdiction in all civil debts contracted within the precincts of the Sanctuary. Bell's Com. ii. 573.

2. An officer appointed by precept of sasine to give infestment.—Anciently any person might have been named as bailie to give infestment; but by 1606, c. 15, all sasines on precepts from Chancery in favour of heirs, upon retours, are ordered to be given by the sheriff as bailie; because, when an heir is to enter by retour to lands held of the Crown, he becomes debtor to the Crown; and it is the duty of the sheriff, as the King's bailie, to receive payment, or to take security for the casualties due on the heir's entry. In every other case, any person may be bailie; and the precept, although blank in the bailie's name, is a sufficient warrant for any person to perform the office. At the same time, were there reason to suspect fraud, the court would allow an investigation to ascertain the authority under which infestment had been given. The blank in the precept of sasine is not filled up after the office is exercised. Ersk. ii. t. 3, § 33. See Precept of Sasine.

Bailiff; in English law, is a keeper or superintendent. Bailiffs of sheriffs are officers appointed by the sheriff to execute all processes directed to him. Bailiffs of manors are stewards appointed by the lord to superintend the manor. Tomlins' Dict., h. t.

Bailment; an English law term, defined to be, "a delivery of goods for a particular purpose, upon a contract, express or implied, that the purpose shall be carried into effect, and that, when that is done, the goods shall be restored by the bailee, or person to whom they are delivered, to the owner or bailor, or according to its directions." Tomlins' Dict., h. t. Wharton's Lex.; Story on Bailments.

Bairman; a dyvour or bankrupt. Skene, h. t. See Dyvour.

Bairns; according to Erskine, "is a known term used to denote one's whole issue." In destinations of heritage to the heirs and bairns of a marriage, the estate is carried to the eldest son. On the other hand, when the word heirs is left out, and the destination is to "the bairns," or to "the bairns and children," all the children succeed equally. The term "heirs and bairns," or "bairns," in destinations of moveables, leaves the ordinary rule of law to take effect, whereby, in moveable succession, all the children succeed equally. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 48; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 1961; Sandford on Heritable Succession, i. 173, et seq. Menzies on Conveyancing. See Destination. Heirs and Bairs.

Bairns' Part of Gear; or legitim; is the share of the father's free moveable property, to which, on the father's death, the children are entitled by law. See Legitim.

Ballivus; a bailiff, bailie, or judge. Skene, h. t.

Baneret; is a knight made in the field of battle. Banerets created by the King under the royal standard in battle take precedence of baronets. Tomlins, h. t., and Skene, voce Banerentes.

Banishment; the punishment of exile from Scotland, inflicted on persons convicted of certain crimes (comparatively few in number, and in a great degree obsolete), for which that punishment is provided by special statute; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 37; Alison's Prac. 63, 669. See Transportation.

Bank; in English common law, is usually taken for a seat or bench of judgment.

Bank; the place or office where a corporation or company of money-dealers carry on their business. The term also applies to the corporation itself; and in this sense banks are said to be either public or private. Public banks may be constituted by act of Parliament, or by charter from the King. The constitution of the company, its office-bearers, extent of capital, and the rights of the partners, must depend upon the powers conferred by the Crown or by Parliament, and on the bye-laws which the corporation may frame, or on the conditions of the original contract. In banks instituted by act of Parliament the partners are sometimes relieved from liability beyond the value of their respective shares; whereas the partners in other banks, like the partners in a private trading company, incur an unlimited responsibility for the debts of the bank. See Joint Stock-Companies. The older chartered banks in Scotland are,

1. The Bank of Scotland, erected by a private act of the Scotch Parliament (July 17, 1695), with a capital of £1,200,000 Scots (£100,000 sterling), increased by several British statutes (the last of which is 44 Geo. III., c. 23) to £1,500,000 sterling. The shares are declared assignable, the transfers being entered in a book subscribed by the assignor and assignee. They are also disposable by will entered in the book of transfers without confirmation; and they may be transmitted "by adjudication, or other legal conveyance, in favour of one person alienably, who, in like manner, shall succeed to be a partner in his predecessor's place; so that the foresaid sums of subscription may neither be taken out of the stock, nor parcelled among more persons by legal diligence, in any sort to the diminishing or disturbing of the stock of the said company and good order thereof." On the bankruptcy or forfeiture of a shareholder, the governor and directors may order his share to be sold by public roup, after such intimations as are prescribed for the sale of bankrupt lands. The act does not say whether the stock is to be heritable or moveable.

2. The Royal Bank of Scotland, erected by charter, in pursuance of 5 Geo. I., c. 20. The stock of this bank is declared moveable, descendible to executors, but not liable to arrestment or attachment. By a bye-law, no proprietor can transfer, but in presence of the Court of Directors, who may stop the transfer until he finds security for what he owes the bank.

3. The British Linen Company was erected into a body corporate, by charter, in 1746. The shares are declared of the nature of personal estate, and to be transferred by certain forms. The charter was confirmed and enlarged in 1806, by a charter from Geo. III. Nothing is said in the charter as to the mode of attaching the stock.

In addition to these there are now other banks in Scotland, on which certain privileges have been conferred by charter; such are, The Commercial Bank of Scotland, The National Bank, and some others; but those charters do not affect the responsibility of the partners of these establishments for the debts and obligations of the company. By 7 Geo. IV., c. 67, it is enacted, that joint stock banking companies may sue and be sued in name of their manager or other principal officer, on condition of their giving in to the Stamp-Office annual returns, upon oath, of the name of the firm, of the names of the individual members, and of their manager; and of giving, in the course of the year, an account of any persons ceasing to be members or officers, and of those entering in their stead. As to other regulations affecting banks, see the statutes 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 83 (1833); 4 and 5 Vict., c. 50 (1841), and 8 and 9 Vict., c. 38, (1845); See Joint-Stock Companies.

Bank Stock; is the capital of a bank divided into shares, according to the original constitution of the company. These shares are held by the partners of the bank, and may be disposed of, and are transferred by an entry in the books of the bank, under such forms as may have been prescribed by the contract or charter of the particular bank, for the security of the bank and partners. *Ersk. Bank of England. This bank, which has been the subject of various statutes, is under the management of a governor and directors, possessed of certain qualifications prescribed in the charter. Its stock is lent to Government at 8 per cent. interest, and is redeemable on payment of the money borrowed. Tomlins' Dict., h. t. The most recent statute affecting the Bank of England is 7 and 8 Vict., c. 32 (1844).

Bank Notes; are notes issued by a bank for value received, and made payable to the bearer on demand, but bearing no interest. They supply the place of coin, either by authority of public law, in the case of the Bank of England, or by public consent, in the case of private or joint-stock banks. They are, properly speaking, nomina debitorum, or obligations which may be the ground of an action, rather than corpora of moveables, and will be so interpreted in a conveyance of moveables. More's Notes on Stair, p. xlix.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 5, § 6; tit. 6, § 20, note; tit. 7, § 29, note by Mr Ivory; Bell's Princ. § 1377, 3d edit.; Brown's Synop. pp. 166, 101, 1236; Thomson on Bills, p. 218, 47, 621; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. pp. 596, 744; Hume, i. 136, 151-2; ii. 376. The issue of bank notes in England is now regulated by the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 32 (1844); and the issue in Scotland by the act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 38 (1845).

Bank Credits; are credits peculiar to Scotch banking, by which, on proper security given to the bank, a person is permitted to draw to a certain amount agreed upon, and for which, with the interest that may fall due upon the sum drawn out, security is given. The account opened with the bank on this credit is carried on by occasional money transactions; the person receiving the credit drawing out or lodging money as his occasions require. The balance is thus continually fluctuating; the sum which the person is due to the bank one day being perhaps repaid the next day, and drawn out again on the day following. The fluctuating nature of this balance, as well as the provision of the act 1696, c. 5, that no heritable security shall be given for a future debt, formed an obstacle to heritable security being given to banks for cash credits. The only way formerly of managing such a transaction was for the person desirous of obtaining such a credit on heritable security, to procure friends whose personal security was sufficient, who might join with him in an obligation to the bank; and to those friends he gave an heritable bond of relief. But even this was not held to remove the difficulty; for although the bond was given to relieve the cautioners of their obligation, yet it was thought that the fluctuating nature of the original debt affected even the cautionary engagement, and rendered it ineffectual; see Creditors of Burgh, March 2, 1791, M. 1159. But this has been since provided for by a clause in the act 54 Geo. III. c. 137, § 14, which declares, "That it shall be lawful for any person or persons possessed of lands, or other heritable subjects, and desiring to pledge the same in security of any sums paid or balances arising, or which may arise upon cash-accounts or credits, or by way of relief to any person or persons who may become bound with him or them for the payment of such sums or balances, although posterior to the date of the infeftment, to grant heritable securities accordingly upon their said lands, or other heritable estate, containing procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, for infefting any bank or bankers, or other persons who shall agree to give them such cash-accounts or credits, or for infefting such persons as shall become cautioners for them, or jointly bound with them, in such cash-accounts or credits: Provided always, that the principal and interest which may become due upon the said cash-accounts or credits shall be limited to a certain definite sum, to be specified in the security, the said definite sum not exceeding the amount of the principal sum, and three years' interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per centum; And it is hereby declared, that it shall and may be lawful to the person to whom any such cash-account or credit is granted to operate upon the same, by drawing out and paying in such sums, from time to time, as the parties shall settle between themselves; and that the sasines or infeftments taken upon the said heritable securities shall be equally valid and effectual, as if the whole sums advanced upon the said cash-account or credit had been paid prior to the date of the sasine or infeftment taken thereon; and that any such heritable security shall remain and subsist to the extent of the sum limited, or any lesser sum, until the cash-account or credit is finally closed, and the balance paid up and discharged, and the sasine or infeftment renounced." On compliance with this regulation, an heritable security may be given for a cash-credit. Bell's Princ. § 299, et seq.; Illust. ib. By the act 9 and 10 Vict., c. 79, § 2 (1856), the act Geo. III., c. 137 is repealed, but by another act of the same session, c. 91, it is declared in the preamble, that it is expedient that certain provisions contained in that act relating to securities for debts in Scotland should be amended and re-enacted, and by § 7, the above provisions of the act 54 Geo. III. are re-enacted. In describing the forms of the securities to be granted, the new statute makes use of the same words as are employed in the old one, regard not being had to the changes in the form of securities introduced by the act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 31 (1845). In consequence of this oversight a doubt has been raised as to whether a security for cash-credits in the new form would be valid. It is thought, however, that securities in the new form would be sustained.

Bank Agent. The national banks, as well as private bankers, generally employ persons to act as their agents for conducting their banking operations in provincial towns. The powers of these agents depend upon the rules and regulations of the particular bank for which they act; but, in the ordinary case, they are authorized to discount bills, &c., for behoof of the bank, either on their own responsibility, or at least under a responsibility for a certain proportion of the discounts. The power of granting cash-credits is generally reserved to the principal bank. Caution to a large amount is required for bank-agents; and on the failure of the agent, it seems to be held that the money found in the desks, drawers, or boxes, used for carrying on the business of the bank, is the specific property of the bank, and may be reclaimed by it; and this although the identical notes issued by the bank may have been replaced by others. A clause empowering the bank summarily to terminate the agency, and to seize and carry off the whole notes, cash, obligations and effects belonging to the bank, is usually inserted in the bond of caution taken by the bank from the agent. See Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 264, 362, 480, 5th edit.; Princ. §§ 231, 290, et seq.; Illust. ib.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. iii. 615.

Bank Interest; is the interest allowed by public and private banks on money deposited with them. It has varied of late years from 2 to 3 and 3½, and at present is 4 per cent. For money advanced, either by discounting bills or on cash-credits, banks usually charge 2 per cent. higher than the interest allowed by them.

Banker; is the partner or manager of a bank, who deals in discounting bills. Some of the rules of bankers concerning bill transactions may be here stated. A bill, regularly discounted, is held to be a bill purchased by a banker, and, on his failure, is the property of his creditors. Bills sent merely for negotiation are the property of the sender, if distinguishable; the banker, as to them, being merely an agent. Where bills are blank indorsed to a banker, on the understanding that the indorser is to be allowed to draw for a certain proportion of their amount, the bills belong to the indorser, under a lien for the advances. Long-dated bills, deposited in security of bills at a shorter date, discounted by a banker, are held to be impledged to the banker; and, on retiring the short-dated bills, the customer is entitled to receive the long-dated bills, notwithstanding the intervening bankruptcy of the banker. Bills blank indorsed to a banker, and deposited for a special purpose, may be discounted or paid away by the banker to whom they are so indorsed; and, on his failure, the indorser cannot reclaim the bills, but must rank as a mere personal creditor. A banker has a lien for the general balance of his account over all bills deposited with him, "unless they have been discounted, in which case they are taken out of the account between the parties." Bankrupt. A bankrupt is an insolvent person who has subjected himself to the operation of the bankrupt laws. Every person subject to the laws of Scotland may be rendered legally bankrupt. By the statute 1696, c. 5, a "notour bankrupt" is a "debtor who being under diligence by horning and caption at the instance of his creditor, shall be either imprisoned or retire to the Abbey, or any other privileged place; or flee or abscond for his personal safety; or defend his person by force; and who shall afterwards be found, by sentence of the Lords of Session, to be insolvent." The statute 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 1, extended the description of bankruptcy to persons subject to the laws of Scotland who were absent from Scotland, or not liable to imprisonment, by reason of privilege or personal protection; and declared that a charge of horning executed against such a person, or an execution of arrestment of any of his effects, not loosed or discharged within fifteen days, or a pointing of any of his moveables, or a decree of adjudication of any part of his heritable estate, should, when joined with insolvency, be held a sufficient proof of legal bankruptcy, and equivalent to notour bankruptcy under the act 1696.

Under the act 1696, all voluntary dispositions, assignments or other deeds, granted directly or indirectly by the bankrupt, at or after the time of his bankruptcy, or within sixty days before it, in favour of a creditor, either in satisfaction or further security, to the prejudice of other creditors, are void and null. This act also declared, that in the application of the act, all dispositions, heritable bonds, or other heritable rights granted by the bankrupt, on which infetment may follow, shall be reckoned to be of the date of the sasine lawfully taken thereon. It further declared, that all dispositions or other rights granted for relief, or in security of future debts, shall be of no force as to any debt contracted after the date of the sasine. The act concludes, by ordaining fraudulent bankrupts to be punished, by being held infamous, infamia juris, and by banishment, or such other punishment short of death, as the Court of Session shall see cause to inflict. (See Fraudulent Bankrupt.) The statute 54 Geo. III., c. 137, declared, that when a debtor had been rendered legally bankrupt in terms of the act 1696, all arrestments used for attaching the effects of the bankrupt within sixty days before, and four calendar months after the bankruptcy, should be ranked pari passu; and that all poindings used within the same period should give a preference to the poinder; but every other creditor having liquid grounds of debt, or decree for payment, and summoning the poinder, or judicially producing the same in any process or competition relative to the price of the poinded goods, before the lapse of the four months, should be entitled to a proportional share of the price of the goods so poinded, corresponding to his debt, deducting the expense of the poinding, which the poinding creditor shall retain. The same statute also enacted, that in all questions on the act 1696, and under this statute, the dispositions, heritable bonds, or other rights on which infetment may follow, instead of being reckoned of the date of the sasines, as provided by the act 1696, should be held of the date of the registration of the sasine; and that all dispositions, assignations, and venditions which do not require sasine, should be reckoned (in so far as these statutes were concerned) of the date of the intimation, delivery, or other act requisite for completing the right, without prejudice to the validity of these rights in all other respects. From the provision of the act 1696, regarding securities for future debts, heritable securities for cash accounts were excepted; 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 14. With regard to judicial sales of the lands of a bankrupt, and alienations, on the approach of bankruptcy, to conjunct and confident persons, see the articles Judicial Sale and Ranking, and Conjunct and Confident.

The act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, 1856, is "An act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to Bankruptcy in Scotland," and repeals the acts 54 Geo. III., c. 137, 2 and 3 Vict., c. 41, and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 53, except as regards any act or deed done or granted prior to the new act coming into operation, which is declared to be 1st November 1856. The general provisions of the statute will now be given, as it would occupy too much space to give the whole provisions in detail.

The date of a deed under the new act, or under the act 1696, c. 5, is the date of recording the sasine where sasine is requisite, and in other cases, the date of registration of the deed, or of delivery, or of intimation, or of such other proceeding as shall in the particular case be requisite for rendering the deed effectual.

Notour bankruptcy of an individual is constituted, first, by sequestration, or by the issuing of an adjudication of bankruptcy in England or in Ireland; or, second, By insolvency concurring either—(1.) With a duly executed charge for payment, followed, where imprisonment is competent, by imprisonment, or formal and regular apprehension of the debtor, or by his flight or absconding from diligence, or retreat to the sanctuary, or forcible defending of his person against diligence, or where imprisonment is incompetent or impossible by execution of arrestment of any of the debtor's effects not loosed or discharged for fifteen days, or by execution of poinding of any of his moveables, or by decree of adjudication of any part of his heritable estate for payment, or in security; or, (2.) Concurring with sale of any effects belonging to the debtor under a poinding, or under sequestration for rent, or with his retiring to the sanctuary for twenty-four hours, or with his making application for the benefit of cessio bonorum. In the case of a company it is constituted either in any of the foregoing ways, or by any of the partners being rendered notour bankrupt for a company debt. Notour bankruptcy is held to commence from the time when its several requisites concur; and when it has once been constituted, continues, in case of a sequestration, till the debtor obtain his discharge, and in other cases until insolvency cease, without prejudice to notour bankruptcy being constituted anew within such period.

Deeds made void by the act, and all alienations of property voidable by statute, or at common law, may be set aside either by way of action or exception, and may be so set aside by the trustee on a sequestrated estate.

Arrestments and poindings used within sixty days prior to the constitution of notour bankruptcy, or within four months thereafter, are ranked pari passu, provided the arrestments, if used on the dependence of an action, or on an illiquid debt, are followed up without undue delay. A creditor judicially producing in a process relative to a subject arrested or poinded liquid grounds of debt, or decree of payment within the above period, is entitled to be ranked as if he had executed an arrestment or a poiding. The first arresting or poiding creditor who recovers payment is accountable for the sum recovered to the subsequent creditors, who are entitled to be ranked pari passu with them. Arrestments used after the four months are ranked with each other on any reversion of the fund attached, according to law and practice, and do not compete with those used within the said periods.

In the case of a living debtor subject to the jurisdictions of the Supreme Courts of Scotland, sequestration may be awarded on such debtor's own petition, with the concurrence of a creditor whose debt amounts to not less than L.50, or of two creditors whose debts together amount to not less than L.70, or of three or more creditors whose debts together amount to not less than L.100, whether the debts are liquid or illiquid, provided they are not contingent. Sequestration may also be awarded in the case of a living debtor, on the petition of a creditor or creditors under the above qualifications, provided the debtor be a notour bankrupt, and have within a year before the presenting of the petition resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in Scotland; or in the case of a company being notour bankrupt, if it have within such period carried on business within Scotland, and any partner have so resided or had a dwelling-house, or if the company have had a place of business in Scotland.

In the case of a deceased debtor, who at the date of his death was subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland, sequestration may be awarded either on the petition of a mandatory to whom he had granted a mandate to apply for sequestration, or on the petition of a creditor or creditors qualified as above mentioned.

In the case of a living debtor, petitions for sequestration presented without his concurrence are competent only within four months of his notour bankruptcy. In the case of a deceased debtor, the petition at the instance of a creditor may be presented at any time after the debtor's death, but no sequestration will be awarded until the expiration of six months from the debtor's death, unless he was at the time of his death notour bankrupt, or unless his successors shall concur in the petition, or renounce the succession.

Where a petition for sequestration is presented, the Court, on special application by a creditor, or without such application if the Court think proper, may take immediate measures for the preservation of the estate, either by the appointment of a judicial factor or otherwise.

Sequestration may be awarded either by the Court of Session or by the Sheriff of any county in which the debtor for the year preceding the date of the petition has resided or carried on business, provided that no sequestration has been awarded in another court, and remains undischarged. When sequestration has been awarded by two or more Sheriffs, the later sequestration must be remitted to the first in date.

A majority, being four-fifths in value of the creditors, may resolve that the estate of their debtor ought to be wound up under a deed of arrangement; and on such a resolution being come to, an application may be made to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, within four days of the resolution, for a sist of the sequestration; and in the event of the application being granted, the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff may make such an arrangement as they may think reasonable for the interim management of the estate.

Warrant of protection against arrest or imprisonment, until the meeting of the creditors for the election of a trustee, may be granted by the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, when awarding sequestration. Warrant also for liberating the debtor from prison may also be granted by the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff by whom the sequestration is awarded, and such warrant of protection or liberation protects or liberates the debtor from arrest or imprisonment for debts contracted previous to the date of sequestration, but are of no effect against apprehension or imprisonment in meditatione fugæ, or ad factum præstandum, or for any criminal act.

The creditors of the sequestrated debtor can only vote and rank for the accumulated sum and interest, up to the date of sequestration, and when the claim of a debtor depends upon a contingency, he may apply to have a value put upon such debt. A claim upon an annuity must also be valued by the sheriff or trustee, and in making the valuation, regard is had to the original price given for the annuity, deducting therefrom such diminution of the value as shall be caused by the lapse of time, since the date of it being granted, up to the date of sequestration. After the date of sequestration, the creditor in an annuity is not entitled to sue any cautioner for it, except for the value fixed, and the arrears and interest thereon; and the cautioner, on making payment of such value, and arrears and interest, is discharged of all liability for the annuity, and he may claim in the sequestration for the sums repaid. If, however, he does not pay the sum so fixed, and arrears and interest, he continues bound for the annuity until such payment is made, under deduction of such dividend as the creditor may have received.

A co-obligant with the bankrupt in a debt is not freed from his liability, in respect of any vote given, or dividend drawn by the creditor in the sequestration, or in respect of his assenting to the discharge of the bankrupt, or to any compensation. Such co-obligant, however, may at his own expense obtain from the creditor an assignation of the debt, on paying its amount, and may thereafter himself claim in the sequestration.

Where a creditor holds a security for his debt over any part of the bankrupt's estate, he must, before voting, make an oath, in which he shall put a specified value on the security, and deduct its value from the debt, and specify the balance, and he is entitled to vote in respect of the balance only, except in questions relating to the disposal and management of the estate over which his security extends, in which case he is entitled to vote in respect of the full amount of his debt. Where a creditor has an obligant bound to him along with the bankrupt, but who is liable in relief to the bankrupt, or holds any security from such an obligant, or any security from which the bankrupt has a right of relief, the creditor shall, before voting, make an oath in which he shall put a specified value on the obligation of such obligant, or on such security, to the extent to which the bankrupt is entitled to relief, and he shall deduct such value from his debt, and specify the balance, and he shall be entitled to vote in respect of such balance only.

A creditor on the estate of a company is not bound, for the purpose of voting on the company's estate, to deduct from his claim the value which he may be entitled to draw from the estates of the partners of the company. If, however, he claim on the estate of a partner, he must, before voting, put a specified value on his claim in the estate of the company, and also of his claim against the other partners thereof, in so far as they are liable to relieve such partner, and must deduct such value from his debt and specify the balance, and he is entitled to vote in respect of such balance only.

The trustee in the sequestration, with consent of the commissioners, may require a conveyance of a creditor's security on payment of the specified value, with an addition of 20 per cent. Mandatories for creditors may vote in absence of the creditors, but persons acquiring debts after sequestration are not entitled to vote in the election of the trustee or commissioners, but in all other respects may be ranked as creditors.

To entitle a creditor, who holds a security over any part of the bankrupt's estate, to be ranked in order to draw a dividend, he must on oath, put a specified value on the security, and deduct its value from the debt, and specify the balance; and on payment of the balance so specified, the trustee, with the consent of the commissioners, is entitled to a conveyance of the security, or full benefit of the security may be reserved to the creditor, and in either case he is ranked only for the balance of the debt, after deducting the value of the security. Where a creditor claims upon the estate of the partner of a company, in respect of a company debt, the trustee on such partner's estate must, before ranking the creditor, put a valuation of the estate of the company, and deduct from the claim of the creditor such estimated value, and rank him for the balance only.

The election, removal, and resignation of the trustee are regulated by §§ 67 to 74 inclusive, and the election and removal of the commissioners are regulated by §§ 75 and 76. The duties of the trustee and the commissioners are prescribed by §§ 79 to 86 inclusive. The protection and allowance to the bankrupt are regulated by §§ 77 and 78, and his examination by §§ 87 to 95 inclusive.

The act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee, ipso jure, transfers to, and vests in him, or any succeeding trustee, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, the whole moveable estate of the debtor, wherever situated, to the same effect, as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained, or intimation made at that date, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and were not null or reducible. It also vests in the trustee the whole heritable estate of the bankrupt, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment and in security of debt, subject to no legal revision, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee and recorded at the date of the sequestration, and as if poiding of the ground had been executed, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and were not null or reducible. The sequestration also vests in the trustee all real estate belonging to the bankrupt situated in England or Ireland, or any of the British dominions, provided, as regards all freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estate, the act and warrant of confirmation be registered in the chief court of bankruptcy, for the country in which the property is situated; and no purchaser of such estate for a valuable consideration is affected by the bankruptcy until the act and warrant shall have been so registered. Where also a conveyance of such estate would have required registration or enrolment, the act and warrant must also be so registered or enrolled; and, if not so registered or enrolled, a purchaser for valuable consideration and without notice of the sequestration, is not affected by it.

Subsequent acquisitions by the bankrupt become the property of the creditors; and where any property has been improperly included in the sequestration, application may be made to have it struck out.

A sequestration is equivalent to a decree of adjudication for payment of the whole debts of the bankrupt, principal and interest, accumulated at the date of the sequestration; and when the date is within year and day of any effectual adjudication, the estate of the bankrupt will be disposed of under the sequestration, but the rights of any heritable creditor having a power of sale preferable to the power of the trustee, are not affected by this provision. A sequestration is also equivalent to an arrestment in execution and decree of forthcoming, and to an executed or completed poinding; and no arrestment or poinding executed on or after the sixtieth day prior to the sequestration is effectual; but an arrester or poinder within that period is entitled to the expense bona fide incurred by him in the execution of his diligence.

Prescription, under the law of Scotland, is interrupted, and the statute of limitation in England is barred, by a creditor presenting or concurring in a petition for sequestration, or lodging a claim under it, and that although the sequestration should be afterwards recalled.

In the case of a deceased debtor, where the sequestration is dated within seven months after his death, any preference or security for any prior debt acquired by legal diligence on or after the sixtieth day before his death, or subsequent to his death, and any preference or security acquired for a prior debt by any act or deed of the debtor which had not been lawfully completed for a period of more than sixty days before his death, and any confirmation as executor-creditor after the debtor's death, shall have no effect in competition with the trustee.

All payments made, and acts done, or deeds granted by the bankrupt, after the date of the sequestration, are null, except in the case of a bona fide purchaser of moveable effects who was ignorant of the sequestration, and in the case, also, of a debtor to the bankrupt making payment of his debts in bona fide, and in ignorance of the sequestration. The possessor also of a bill or promissory-note payable by the bankrupt, but who has recourse against other parties, or the possessor of a security for a debt due by the bankrupt, who shall receive payment of his debt in ignorance of the sequestration, and given up the bill or promissory-note, or security to the bankrupt, is not liable to repay to the trustee the amount received, unless the trustee shall replace him in the situation in which he stood, or reimburse him for any loss or damage.

A creditor holding a security over the heritable estates of the bankrupt preferable to the right of the trustee, and having a power to sell, may sell in terms of his security, notwithstanding the sequestration, and the trustee may concur in the sale in order to fortify the title. Such creditor and the purchaser must account for any reversion of the price. If such creditor concur with the trustee in bringing the estate to sale, the trustee sells in his own name, and the conveyance is executed by him with consent of the creditor and the commissioners. The price is paid by the purchaser to the parties legally entitled to it; and in so far as not paid at the time of the delivery of the conveyance, it is consigned in the bank in which the money of the sequestrated estate is deposited, and such payment or consignment of the price frees and discharges the estate sold and the purchaser from the security of the consenting creditor, whether the debt in the security be satisfied or not, and from all securities postponed to the security of such creditor.

The payment of dividends is regulated by sections 121 to 136 inclusive, and the discharge of the bankrupt, with or without a composition, by the sections 137 to 149 inclusive.

All preferences, payments, and collusive agreements for discharge are void, and the bankrupt, if cognizant of the giving such preference, or making such payments, or entering into such agreements, forfeits all right to a discharge, and all benefits under the act, and a discharge, if granted, is annulled.

The discharge of the trustee is regulated by section 152 to 155 inclusive. A new officer, called "The Accountant in Bankruptcy," is appointed by section 156, and his duties are regulated by sections 157 to 163 inclusive.

In the case of a party dying without a settlement appointing trustees to manage his estate, any creditor to the amount of £100, or any person having an interest in his succession may apply by summary petition for the appointment of a judicial factor, and such factor may be appointed by the Court, subject to such conditions as to caution, and such other conditions as the Court may provide by act of sederunt. The proceedings of such factor are under the superintendence of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, who reports to the Court from time to time as he may deem expedient, and discharges the same duties with regard to him as he discharges with regard to a trustee under a sequestration. Where the deceased party has left a settlement in favour of trustees to manage his estate, the trustees may, with or without the concurrence of the creditors of the deceased, or of persons interested in his succession, obtain an order on the Accountant to superintend the administration of the estate, in which case he will discharge the same duties as those above mentioned.

Any trustee to whom the pursuer of a cessio shall grant a conveyance of his estate and effects for behoof of his creditors, must act under the supervision and control of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, in the same manner as the trustee under a sequestration.

Where the estate of a bankrupt is not likely to yield free funds for division among the ordinary creditors, after payment of the preferable debts or expenses, beyond one hundred pounds, a majority in number and value of the creditors may resolve that the bankrupt shall only be entitled to apply for and obtain a decree of cessio, and shall have no right to a discharge in the sequestration, and the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall thereafter determine whether such a resolution shall be confirmed or recalled; and if it be confirmed, the bankrupt is entitled to apply for a decree of cessio in the sequestration, without bringing a separate process.

The trustee in a sequestration may, with the consent of the commissioners, compound and transact, or refer to arbitration, any question which may arise in the course of sequestration regarding the estate, or any demand or claim made thereon; and the compromise, transaction, or decree-arbitral, is binding on the creditors and the bankrupt.

The Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, on cause shown, may order that, for a period not exceeding three months from the date of the order, all letters addressed to the bankrupt shall be delivered by the Postmaster-general or the officer acting under him, to the Sheriff-clerk or trustee, to be opened in presence of the sheriff after written notice to the bankrupt to attend, if within Scotland, and such order may be renewed, on cause shown for a like period, as often as shall be necessary.

A member of Parliament, against whom a commission of bankruptcy has issued, and who is found bankrupt, during twelve calendar months from its issuing, is incapable of sitting or voting, unless the commission be superseded, and the full amount of debts paid. On certificate by the commissioners, at the expiration of the said twelve months, to the Speaker, the election is void; and after fourteen days' notice by the Speaker in the London Gazette, he issues his warrant for a new writ. This is confined to persons already elected. Chambers on Elections, h. t.

Bankruptcy, Acts of. See Acts of Bankruptcy.

Bannock; is a thick cake of oatmeal, and is a term for one of the duties in thirlage. It is a perquisite of the servant or assistant in the mill.

Bannitus; from bannum, a trumpet; banished for a crime or other cause; or being put, as it were, to the horn or trumpet, by three blasts, according to the old Scotch consuetude. Skene, h. t.

Banrentes; banerets; in old law language, a kind of estate, greater and more honourable than barrones. Barons were permitted to choose commissioners to the Scotch Parliament; but banrentes were summoned personally to Parliament. The term would seem also to signify the rent or yearly duty (quasi banner-rent) of one of the King's banner or standard-bearers. Skene, h. t.

Banns. Ban is a Saxon word, signifying proclamation or public notice; Burns' Law Dict. But banns, in Scotch law, is used to signify the proclamation in church, which, by the law of Scotland, is necessary to constitute a regular marriage. This proclamation is made in church, immediately before the commencement of divine service. It is done with an audible voice; and consists in calling the names and designations or additions of the parties who intend to intermarry; and inviting those who know of any sufficient objection, to state it before it be too late; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 10. By the 10 Queen Anne, c. 7, it is enacted, "That no Episcopal minister residing in Scotland shall marry any person but those whose banns have been duly published three several Lord's days in the Episcopal congregation which the two parties frequent, and in the churches to which they belong as parishioners, by virtue of their residence." Marriages contracted without proclamation of banns are valid; but the parties, celebrator and witnesses of such marriages, are liable in certain penalties. The parties may be punished by fine and imprisonment, and the celebrator by perpetual banishment. Ersk. ib. § 11, see Ivory's edit. note 143; Bell's Princ. § 1510, 4th edit.; Brown Syn. p. 876; Hutcheson's Justice of Peace, vol. i. p. 8; vol. ii. p. 221, 2d edit.; Tail's Justice of Peace, voce Marriage; Hume, i. 463; Alison's Prin. 543. In practice, the strictness of the law, requiring proclamation of banns on three successive Sundays, has been departed from, and proclamation is permitted to be made on two, or even on one Sunday, upon payment of a higher fee. The certificate of due proclamation cannot be disproved.

Baratry; is the crime committed by a judge who is induced by a bribe to pronounce a judgment. Baratriam committit qui propter pecuniam justitiam baratlat, he commits baratry who barter justice for money. This praction seems in former times to have been very general in Scotland. See the act 1540, c. 104; Ersk. B. iv. t. 4, § 30.

Baratry; amongst ecclesiastical persons, was the offence of exporting money out of Scotland to purchase benefices at Rome, and was prohibited by several old acts of Parliament. See 1426, c. 84; 1567, c. 3; Acta Parl. vol. iii. p. 14; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 30; Kames' Stat. Law abridg. h. t.; Hume, i. 587.

Baratry of mariners; is gross fraud on the part of the master or mariners, tending to their own benefit, and to the prejudice of the owners of the ship. Bell's Princ. § 479; Illust. ib.; Shaw's Digest.

Bargain; is a consensual contract or agreement, and is generally used to signify such contracts as may be completed without the intervention of writing, e.g. sales of moveables, locations, &c. By the stat. 1669, c. 9, such bargains, which are proveable by witnesses, prescribe in five years after the bargain. In re mercatoria, bargains of great importance may be proved by letters of correspondence, or even by less formal writings. Bell's Com. i. 325; Tait on Evidence, 120; Dickson, 307.

Bargain and Sale; in English law, is an instrument whereby the property of lands and tenements is, for valuable consideration, granted and transferred from one person to another. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Baro; a baron. Skene, h. t.

Baron; in its more ordinary acceptation, is the degree of nobility next to a viscount; but anciently, in Scotland, all those vassals who held their lands immediately of the Crown were termed barons. When titles of nobility were conferred on barons, they were called the greater barons; but both the greater and the lesser sat indiscriminately in the Scotch Parliament until 1427, when, by the act 102 of that year, the attendance of the lesser barons was dispensed with, on condition of their sending representatives from each county, to be called "commissioners of the shire."

But although every person holding of the Crown came under one or other of the above denominations of greater or lesser barons, yet, to constitute a baron in the strict legal sense of the word, his lands must have been erected, or at least confirmed, by the King in liberam baroniam. And such a baron had a jurisdiction both civil and criminal, which he might have exercised either in his own person, or by his bailie. This jurisdiction was, however, reduced by 20 Geo. II., c. 43, to the right of recovering from his vassals and tenants the feu-duties and rents of their land, and compelling them to perform the services to which they may be bound, and to the right of deciding in civil questions where the debt or damage did not exceed 40s. Beyond this the baron or his bailie's civil jurisdiction cannot be prorogated. The criminal jurisdiction of the baron is, by the same statute, limited to assaults, batteries, and smaller offences, which may be punished by a fine not exceeding 20s., &c. Where a fine is inflicted, it is to be recovered by pointing, or, in default of goods, by one month's imprisonment at farthest. But this jurisdiction is put under so many regulations and restrictions that it is now seldom if ever exercised. The act 20 Geo. II. farther provides, that no future charter of erection of a barony shall convey any higher jurisdiction than for recovering the rents of lands, multures, and mill services. An exception has, however, been made to this by the statute 35 Geo. III., c. 122, by which the Crown is authorized to erect free and independent burghs of barony in those parts of the sea-coast in which the fisheries are carried on. The magistrates in such burghs are to exercise the power of justices cumulatively with the justices of the county. *Ersk. Baron of Exchequer; the Judges of the Scotch Court of Exchequer were termed Barons of Exchequer. See Exchequer.

Baronet; a dignity or degree of honour next after barons, having precedence of all knights excepting knights-banerets, created by the King under the royal standard. Tomlins, h. t.

Barony; is the territory over which the rights of barony extend: it also signifies the right itself. The right of barony can be conferred only by the Crown, and cannot be transmitted by the baron to be held base of himself. Where it is transmitted, it must be by a public holding, which enables the donee to renew the title from the Crown by resignation or confirmation, and so to come into the place of the disposer. The right of barony also incorporates the whole parts of which the barony consists, so that a conveyance of the barony, in general terms, carries every part and parcel of the barony, though not named, and every right connected with a barony, though these rights be not expressed. One effect of the right of barony was to unite the whole separate subjects of which the barony consists, so that one sasine, taken on any one part of the barony, carried the whole. And while a clause of union united only lands which are locally discontiguous, the union effected by a charter of barony united lands though flowing from different superiors, or held by different tenures, as well as where the subjects are discontinuous in place. This privilege, however, is now rendered useless since the act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 35 (1845), which allows sasine to be given by merely recording the instrument, and does away with the necessity of giving infeftment on the lands themselves. By the act 1595, c. 93, it is provided, that the inhabitants of all barony lands shall be amenable to the courts within whose jurisdiction the lands are situated. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 60; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 46; tit. 6, § 8, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 564, et seq.; Bell's Princ. §§ 749, 849, 2191, 4th edit.; Shaw's Digest, h. t.; *Jurid. Barrenness. See Sterility.

Barrister, or Barraster; in English law, a counsel learned in the law, admitted to plead at the bar, and there to take upon him the protection and defence of clients. The period of his probationary attendance at the inns of court ought to be five years. A counsel can maintain no action for his fees. Where Scotch and English counsel appear in the same cause, precedence is generally determined by their standing at their respective bars. Chambers on Elections, h. t.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Advocate.

Barratry, or Barrataria; in the old Scotch law language, a kind of simony in acquiring right to benefices. Skene, h. t. See Baratry.

Barter; called, in the Roman law, permutatio, is a contract by which one thing is given in exchange for another. The distinction between barter and sale is, that, in the former, money, which is an essential of sale, is never one of the things exchanged. By the Roman law, if one of the things exchanged were evicted, the party so losing it had a right of recourse to the thing which he gave. But with us this right of recourse is confined to the contract of excambion, i.e., the exchange of heitable subjects, and has no place in the exchange of moveables. Stair, B. i. tit. 14, § 1; Bank. vol. i. p. 407. See Excambion.

Base Rights. Where a person disposes feudal property to be held under himself, instead of under his superior, the right which the donee thus acquires is called a base right. In the original charter, the lands are disposed to the receiver, to be held by him of the grantor either in feu or in blench, there being no other species of holding in modern conveyancing. In the feu-holding, a feu-duty or annual payment in money or victual is given. In the blench-holding, an elusory duty, as a penny Scots money, or the like, is stipulated as an acknowledgment of superiority. Where lands are given out on either of these holdings, the charter describes the subject, the donee or vassal, the holding, and the nature of the warrandice undertaken by the grantor: it assigns the rents to the donee, and contains a mandate to the grantor's bailie to give infeftment to the vassal. This is the base right, by which, in modern conveyancing, subinfeudation is effected. The grantor remains vassal to his own superior, and the subinfeudation makes no change on the titles he holds from his superior. Thus, suppose A. to hold of the Crown blench, and that he subfeus his lands to B., to be held in feu. A. is the vassal of the Crown, and B. is the sub-vassal in the lands. B., the subvassal, has thus two superiors; A., from whom he derives his right, who is his immediate superior, and the Crown, which is his mediate superior. The right in A. is termed the dominium directum, in reference to B.'s right over the property, and B.'s the dominium utile, or property. A.'s right is termed a public one; B.'s a base or subaltern right. These two rights stand on different sets of titles, entirely unconnected with each other. A.'s title stands on his own Crown charter and sasine; B.'s on his base right. The base right in favour of B. can never be confirmed by the Crown, to the effect of making B. hold of the Crown. This would be to deprive A. of his subvassalage, which no act of the Crown or of B. can accomplish. Formerly, when the casualty of recognition existed, by which the whole land, in consequence of the acts of the immediate superior (that is of A. in the case supposed), might have been recognised, it was common for a subvassal to take a confirmation from his mediate superior; because such a confirmation, though it did not make the subvassal hold of his mediate superior, freed him from the consequences of this casualty. But now that wardholding is abolished, the necessity of this measure is at an end, and a confirmation of this kind is not sought for. The only confirmation in modern practice is the confirmation of a right given to a purchaser to be held of the seller's superior, as is elsewhere explained. The modern disposition to a purchaser, from considerations of expediency, gives the donee the alternative either of a public or a base holding; and infeftment taken on the precept of sasine in such a disposition constitutes a complete base right, which may be afterwards rendered public by a charter of confirmation from the disposer's superior. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 27, et seq., App. § 2; Mor's Notes, p. clxxi; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 7, § 8, et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 68, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 816; *Kames' Stat. Bastard; a child born of a woman who was not married to the father at the time of conception, and who was never thereafter married to him. Bastards are termed illegitimate children, in contradistinction to legitimate or lawful children born in wedlock. But although the act 1600, c. 20, declares, that a marriage contracted after a divorce for adultery between the divorced person and the paramour is unlawful, and that the issue are incapable of succeeding to their parents, such children are not to be regarded as illegitimate or bastards. Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 42; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 51. A bastard can have no heirs except of his own body, because succession is through the father only, and bastards have no lawful father. Stair, ib. § 44. On the failure of heirs of a bastard's body, the King succeeds as ultimus hæres. But although a bastard cannot succeed as heir or executor either to his father or mother, he may succeed by destination. He may also dispose of his own estate, heritable or moveable, by a deed inter vivos; and he may even settle his heritable estate on any person he pleases, by a destination which is not to take effect until after his death. But prior to the passing of the stat. 6 Will. IV., c. 22, if a bastard had no lawful children of his own body, he could neither dispose of his heritable or moveable estate on deathbed, nor make a testament to the prejudice of the Crown's right. Where he had lawful issue, however, he might make a testament either in their favour or in favour of a stranger; for the King, being excluded by the mere existence of such issue, has no interest to challenge any destination of the bastard's property which he may think proper to make. And now, by the statute referred to, bastards have the power of disposing of their moveables by testament, in like manner as other persons; 6 Will. IV., c. 22. The widow of a bastard, whether there be issue or not, enjoys her legal rights of terce and jus relictæ; and creditors are entitled to use the ordinary diligence for attaching the heritable or moveable estate of a bastard, both before and after his death. See Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, §§ 42, 44; More's Notes, pp. xv. xxxii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 10, § 5, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. pp. 46, 119, 276; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 2059, et seq.; *Kames' Stat. Bastard, Aliment of. The aliment of illegitimate children is a joint burden upon both parents. The mother is entitled to the custody of the child, and the father is bound to contribute his proportion of the expense; and if neither the mother nor father can support the child, it must be supported by the parish in which the mother has a settlement. The period for which the mother is entitled to the custody of the child does not appear to be precisely fixed; and, by decisions of the Court, it has varied from seven to fourteen years; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 56; Mor. Dict. 442, et seq. and p. 11080. Neither does it appear to be settled, whether or not, after the period of the mother's custody of the child ceases, the father is entitled to insist on taking the child from the mother. In the case of Goadby against M'Candy, 7th July 1815, Fac. Coll., the mother was preferred to the custody of a child of thirteen years of age, in competition with the relations of the deceased father. As to the quantum of aliment awarded against the father, it has varied of late from L.4 to L.10 a-year, according to the rank of the parties. In general, the award against artisans is from L.4 to L.6 a-year, and where the father is of a higher rank of life, L.10 a-year is generally given. It is payable quarterly by advance, and is continued until the child can earn its bread. On the insolvency of the father of an illegitimate child, the mother's claim for aliment to the child gives her a jus crediti, which entitles her to rank for the aliment on the father's bankrupt estate; in which respect she has an advantage over the mother of a lawful child, who, having united her fortunes and those of her children with the father, must follow his fate, and, independently of special contract, has no jus crediti entitling her or her children to rank for their legal provisions in case of insolvency; Bell's Com. vol. i. pp. 635, 643, 6th edit. A debtor who has been imprisoned for the aliment of a bastard child has been held not entitled to the benefit of the cessio. Ib. vol. ii. p. 591. See Bell's Princ. § 2062, et seq.; Dunlop's Parish Law, 205; Brown's Synop. p. 73, et seq.; Shaw's Digest; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. i. p. 114.

Bastardus; (old French) bastard; a child unlawfully begotten "outwith the band of marriage," according to the old definition. The word is said by Skene to be barbarous. Skene, h. t.

Bastardy, Gift of; is a gift of the Crown of the heritable or moveable effects of a bastard who has died without having lawful issue, and without having disposed of his property in liege poustie. By this deed the Crown gives, grants, and disposes to the donatory, the bastard's estate and effects, with power to institute an action of declarator of the bastardy, which is necessary to entitle the donatory to take the benefit of the gift. See Jurid. Styles, vol. i. p. 461 and 504, 2d edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 178. See Gift.

Bastardy, Declarator of; is an action instituted in the Court of Session by the donatory in a gift of bastardy, for having it declared that the lands or effects which belonged to the deceased bastard belong to the donatory in virtue of the gift from the Crown. The defender called in this action is the person who, had the bastard been a lawful child, would have succeeded to him. If the bastard's heritable estate has been held immediately of the Crown, the property and superiority are consolidated, and it is unnecessary to bring an action of declarator of bastardy unless a donatory has been named. But where the bastard's lands are held of a subject, the Sovereign, who cannot be vassal to a subject, always names a donatory, who, in order to complete his title, must obtain a decree of declarator of bastardy. See Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 43, B. iv. t. 12, § 2; Brown's Syn. p. 357; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. iii. 200; Shand's Practice, 421; Dickson on Evidence, 8, 190, 703. A declarator of bastardy seems also to be competent, during the life of a bastard, at the instance of any party who has a good title and interest to prove the bastardy.

Baston, or Baton; a staff or baton. This is the proper symbol of resignation, though a pen has, by immemorial custom, been made use of as the symbol in the act of resignation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 36; Rose, ii. 216; A. S. 11th Feb. 1708.

Battery Pendente Lite; was a statutory offence consisting in assaulting an adversary in a law-suit, during the dependence of the suit. The two statutes (1584, c. 138, and 1594, c. 219.) upon which it was founded, and which declared the punishment of the crime to consist in the loss of the cause, are repealed by 7 Geo. IV., c. 19. For the history and application of these statutes, see Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 37; Bank. vol. i. p. 288; Kame's Stat. Law abridg. h. t.; Brown's Synop. h. t. and p. 454; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t.; Gordon, 27th Feb. 1781, Mor. 1378, and other cases there cited.

Beasts, Wild. The right to wild beasts, or to fowls or fishes, is acquired by occupancy, unless they have been previously deprived of their natural liberty, as by inclosing deer in a park, fishes in a pond, or birds in an aviary; but when, by any accident, they have regained their natural liberty, and the former proprietor has given over his pursuit of them, the right to them may, as before, be acquired by occupancy. Domestic animals, although they should stray, still remain the property of their original owner. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 10; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 5, and 33; Bank. i. 505.

Beating of Judges. To beat, strike, or insult any judge sitting in judgment, or on account of his judicial conduct, was at one time a capital offence; 1593, c. 177; 1600, c. 4; and threats of violence used to a judge on account of his conduct in that capacity will subject the offender to an arbitrary judgment; Hume, vol. i. p. 406. Erskine includes under this crime all offences against the law or its execution, e. g. deforcement of messengers, breach of arrestment, battery pendente lite. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 42. Alison's Princ. p. 573. See Deforcement, Breach of Arrestment, and Battery Pendente Lite.

Bees; are not private property unless they are in a skep, or are working in the hollow of a tree, wall, or house. When they hive, they remain the property of their former owner, so long as he continues in pursuit of them; but thereafter they belong to the first occupant. Ersk. B. ii. t. 1, § 10; Stair, B. ii. t. 1, § 33; Blair's Manual, h. t.; Hume, i. 80.

Before Answer. In judicial proceedings this expression signifies, before deciding the main question raised. It frequently happens that the full bearing of written or of parole evidence is not apparent when permission to adduce the evidence is asked; or the relevancy of the proof offered may be questionable; or in accountings, the precise state of the balance may affect the legal questions raised; or in questions about farms, buildings, machinery or the like, it may aid the judge in deciding, if he has correct information as to the state of the subject-matter of the suit. In these, and similar cases, our courts, both supreme and inferior, are in use to pronounce interlocutors allowing proofs, or granting diligence for the recovery of writings, or ordering judicial reports from accountants or from persons of skill, "before answer," that is, reserving for after consideration the relevancy as well as the legal effect of the proof, productions, or reports, on the merits of the legal questions at issue. The words "before answer," are perhaps not absolutely indispensable in such cases; but they have the advantage of barring all dispute as to the purpose of the inquiry so authorized, and preventing the plea that the relevancy of the proof was determined before it was ordered by the court. See Proof. Evidence. Commission. M'Farlane's Pr. p. 52. Dickson on Evid., pp. 966, 783.

Beggars. There are many severe statutes against beggars and vagabonds: thus, 1424, c. 42; 1525, c. 22; 1579, c. 74; 1592, c.

147; 1597, c. 268; and the whole acts and Privy Council proclamations against beggars and vagrants are renewed and ratified by the act 1698, c. 21. Hume, vol. i. p. 475, 477; *Ersk. Behaviour as Heir; or gestio pro hærede; is a passive title, by which an apparent heir, by intromission with his ancestor's heritage, incurs a universal liability for his debts and obligations. This passive title was introduced into the law of Scotland as early as the institution of the College of Justice; for the purpose, it would appear, of checking the frauds to which creditors were exposed under the more ancient law, according to which the heir was liable to the extent of his actual intromissions only. The passive title of gestio pro hærede is incurred, 1. By the heir's imixing with the heritable subjects of the ancestor, letting tacks, &c. 2. By intromitting with heirship moveables, which, in questions of succession, are reckoned heritage. 3. By intermeddling with the title-deeds of the ancestor's heritable estate, in such a manner as to give rise to a reasonable presumption that he intends to represent him. 4. By the heir's making over to a third party any part of the ancestor's heritable estate, or by granting discharges to any of the ancestor's debtors. But the simple renunciation by the heir of all claim to the succession in favour of the heir-male or of provision, even for a valuable consideration, infers no passive title, because creditors are not hurt by such a renunciation. 5. The passive title of gestio pro hærede is incurred under the act 1695, c. 24, if the heir, without service or entry as heir, shall "either enter to possess his predecessor's estate or any part thereof, or shall purchase," either by himself or by means of another person for his behoof, any right to his predecessor's estate, or any legal diligence or other right affecting the estate, redeemable or irredeemable, except as highest bidder at a judicial sale. But in construing this clause of the statute, it has been held, in opposition to the opinion of Erskine, that the mere purchase by the heir of a debt affecting the ancestor's estate will not subject the heir unless he possess in virtue of the right so purchased; Clelland v. Campbell, 10th June 1796, Mor. p. 9759. In this case, however, although the point was fully discussed, it was not at the instance of creditors. It may be remarked in general, with regard to this passive title, that the question, whether or not it has been incurred, will depend a good deal upon circumstances; and as its consequences may be highly penal, it would seem that, where the intromission has been inconsiderable, and where there has been evidently no intention of defrauding creditors, the heir will be relieved from the effects of his intromission. The court has even authorized an actual service as heir, to be set aside, in order to free the heir from his passive title. Ayton, 7th July 1784, Mor. p. 9732. See also *Ersk. Bench; in English law, has different significations; thus, Free bench signifies that estate in copyholds, which the wife, being espoused a virgin, has, after the decease of her husband, for her dower, according to the custom of the manor; Tomlins' Dict. King's (Queen's) Bench; a court in which the King was formerly accustomed to sit in person; and which, on that account, was moved with his household. This court consists of a lord chief-justice, and three other justices or judges, who are invested with a sovereign jurisdiction over all matters, whether of a criminal or public nature. The court is now divided into a crown side and plea side; the one determining criminal, and the other civil causes. Tomlins' Dict.

Benchers; in the inns of court, are the senior members of the society, who are invested with the government of the body to which they belong. Enc. Brit.

Benefice; a church living. Prior to the Reformation, benefices were of two kinds. They consisted either of lands or teinds: the former were called the temporality, the latter the spirituality of benefices. In consequence of the Reformation, James VI. considered himself proprietor of all the church lands, and erected several abbacies and priories into temporal lordships. Those to whom he gave these grants were termed lords of erection, or titulars, as having a title to the erected benefices. Abbacies and priories, and even bishoprics, were erected into temporal lordships, the proprietors of which received the titles of lords of erection, titulars, or commendators; and the property which formerly belonged to the bishops and their chapters was, to a considerable extent, brought back into the hands of the Crown by the restoration of Episcopacy, and its subsequent abolition. The lords of erection, and other lay proprietors of church lands, exercised the same rights in drawing the teind which had formerly been exercised by the clergy; when fortunately this state of matters was put an end to by the decrees-arbitral pronounced by Charles I. on the surrender of tithes.

Beneficium Cedendarum Actionum. This was a right conferred by the Roman law, whereby a co-cautioner, who had paid the debt for the principal debtor, was entitled to compel the creditor to assign his right of action against the other co-cautioners, so as to enable the cautioner who had paid to operate his relief from those who were bound along with him. By the law of Scotland a co-cautioner, who has paid, has an action of relief, without the necessity of any such conveyance from the creditor. In the practice of Scotland, a catholic creditor, who has a security extending over several subjects, must, if he draws his payment from one subject only, convey his security to the other creditors on that subject, to the effect of enabling them to draw from the other subjects over which the security extends, so as in the end to make the catholic debt rank proportionally on all the subjects over which the security extends. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 66; B. iii. tit. 3, § 68; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Menzies' Conveyancing. See Catholic Creditor.

Beneficium Inventarii; was a privilege enjoyed by an apparent heir in heritage, who was doubtful whether the value of the inheritance was adequate to the payment of his predecessor's debts. This privilege was conferred by the act 1695, c. 24, whereby an apparent heir within year and day after his predecessor's death, that is within the annus deliberandi, was permitted to enter to his predecessor cum beneficio inventarii, or upon inventory, according to the practice in moveable succession. The effect of entering in this way was, that the heir became liable for his predecessor's debts and deeds, to the value of the heritage given up in the inventory only, and no farther. The statute required the heir, within the annus deliberandi, to make up and exhibit upon oath a full and particular inventory of "all lands, houses, annual rents, or other heritable subjects," to which he "may or pretends to succeed:"—which inventory was regularly subscribed before witnesses, and given in to the Sheriff-clerk of the county where the heritage was situated; or, if the defunct had no lands or heritage requiring sasine, to the Sheriff-clerk of the county where the defunct died. The inventory thus given in was directed to be subscribed by the Sheriff and the clerk of the court, and recorded in the Sheriff-court books, from which extracts of the inventory were to be given. The inventory required to be given in, recorded and extracted, within the year and day; and thereafter, within forty days after the expiration of the year and day, the extract of the inventory was again presented and recorded in the books of Council and Session, in a particular register kept for the purpose. Where any part of the defunct's heritable estate had been accidentally, and without fraud, omitted in the inventory, the omission might be supplied by what was called an eik, or addition to the inventory, which was made and subscribed, given in and recorded, in the same manner with the principal inventory; provided such eik was made within forty days after the heir came to the knowledge of the omission. By intronitting with the heritage without attending to the provisions of this statute, the heir incurred a universal responsibility for the debts of the defunct. (See Behaviour as Heir.) The statute did not require the heir to serve within the year. If the inventory was given in and recorded within the statutory period, the heir might serve at any time he pleased; and the only change produced in the form of the service was, that the heir was declared to be served cum beneficio inventarii. The inventory and service might be expedited by a factor appointed by the Court of Session to manage the heritable estate of the defunct, in the apparent heir's absence. Paton, petitioner, 24th July 1785, Fac. Coll. Mor. p. 4071; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 68; Bank. vol. ii. p. 311; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 662, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1926; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 32; More's Notes, p. cccxxi. See as to the form of entry cum beneficio inventarii, Jurid. Styles, vol. i. p. 401, 3d edit. By the act 10 & 11 Vict., c. 47 (1847), decrees of special and general service infer only a limited passive representation of the deceased, and the heir sued is liable only to the extent or value of the land and heritages taken up.

Beneficium Competentie. By the Roman law, the grantor of a gratuitous obligation, who was reduced to indigence, before fulfilling his obligation, had beneficium competentie, or the privilege of retaining a sufficiency for his own subsistence. The law of Scotland confers this privilege on fathers and grandfathers against their children and grandchildren, even although the effect of it should be to reduce the children to indigence; but it does not extend it to the case of strangers, or to collateral relations, or even to the case of a brother against a sister; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 89. See also Hogg against Hogg, 30th Nov. 1749; Kilk. Mor. p. 1390; and Hardies against Hardie, 1st July 1813, Fac. Coll. According to Erskine (B. iv. tit. 3, § 27), a bankrupt who has obtained the benefit of a cessio bonorum, and who afterwards acquires property, has beneficium competentie; but this doctrine is not sanctioned by any reported case; on the contrary, it has been held that a bankrupt, in such circumstances, has not beneficium competentie, and that all which he is entitled to reserve are his working tools and his wearing apparel. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 89; Hardies, in 1st July 1813, Fac. Coll.; More's Notes to Stair, p. cccxxxvii.; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shand's Practice, p. 793; *Hutch. Beneficium Divisionis; in the Roman law, was an equitable privilege, by which a co-cautioner, who was required to pay the debt, might insist that the creditor should make the demand on him only pro rata, or for his proportion along with the other solvent cautioners. By the law of Scotland, a co-cautioner enjoys this privilege when he is bound simply as cautioner, along with another, for the principal debtor. But where cautioners bind themselves "conjunctly and severally" with and for the principal debtor, the benefit of division is lost, and the creditor may select any of them he pleases, and recover the whole debt from him. Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 12; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 63. See Cautionary.

Beneficium Ordinis; or the benefit of discussion. Both by the Roman law and formerly by the law of Scotland, a cautioner who was bound simply as such, might insist, before paying the debt, that the principal debtor should be discussed; that is, that the debt should not only be demanded from him, but that letters of horning for the debt should be executed against him, and the denunciation recorded; that his moveables should be attached by poinding, or arrestment and furthcoming; and his heritage by adjudication. Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 6; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 61; Bell's Com. i. 347. By the act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60 (1856), the benefit of discussion is abolished, and the creditor is now entitled to proceed directly against the cautioner, unless the cautioner has stipulated in the instrument of caution that the creditor shall be bound to discuss and do diligence against the principal debtor before proceeding against him. See Cautionary.

Benefit of Clergy; in the criminal law of England, was a privilege which a person convicted of a capital felony (not excluded from the benefit of clergy), might plead in arrest of judgment for the first offence. This privilege operated as a species of statutory pardon, and was originally confined to the clergy, or to persons in holy orders. It was afterwards extended to all persons who could read; and at that time it was the practice, on the conviction of a felon whose crime was not denied the benefit of clergy, to present him with a book in which he was required to read, and on the proper officer pronouncing the words, "legit ut clericus," the convicted person was burnt on the hand and discharged. If he could not read, he suffered the statutory punishment for his crime. By 5 Anne, c. 6, the benefit of clergy was extended to all persons convicted of clergyable offences, whether they could read or not; and by the same statute, and several subsequent ones, instead of burning on the hand, a discretionary power was given to the judge to inflict a pecuniary fine or imprisonment. The benefit of clergy is now abolished by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 28, § 6, and by the 4 and 5 Vict., c. 22, as to peers. In the more atrocious capital offences, it had previously been taken away by various statutes; and in the criminal code of England, there are many enactments creating felonies "without benefit of clergy." A very interesting historical account of the origin of this privilege will be found in Blackstone, B. iv. c. 28. See also Tomlins' Dict.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, ii. 180; Burn's Justice of Peace, 29th edit. i. 681; Stephen's Com. 3d edit., iv. 485.

Benevolence; in English law, was a species of forced loan or gratuity from the subjects to the King; one of the arbitrary modes of obtaining money, which, in violation of Magna Charta, were formerly resorted to by the kings of England. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Berwick-upon-Tweed. This town, which was originally part of the kingdom of Scotland, was ceded to England by Edward Baliol; and its liberties and customs, as an English town, were afterwards confirmed by Edward IV. and James VI. Although, therefore, it has some local peculiarities derived from the ancient laws of Scotland, it is clearly a part of England, being represented by burgesses in the House of Commons, and bound by all acts of the British Parliament, whether expressly mentioned or not; see 20 Geo. II., c. 42. Indictments and other local matters in the town of Berwick may be tried by a jury from the county of Northumberland. Blackstone, i. 98.

Bigamy; is the contracting of a second marriage during the subsistence of a former one. By 1551, c. 19, this crime, whether committed by the man or the woman, is punishable with the pains of perjury : these are, confiscation of goods, imprisonment, and infamy. Bigamy is not committed, if the first marriage was unlawful through near relationship, or if it was dissolved by divorce (unless the divorce was obtained by the fraud of the accused, and is afterwards set aside), or if the accused believed, on reasonable grounds, that the first marriage was dissolved by death. The crime is committed, however exceptionable and vitious the second marriage may be, provided it has been regularly celebrated. The clergyman and second spouse are art and part if they were aware that the former marriage subsisted. The witnesses also are art and part, if they concealed the former marriage from the second spouse, or from the clergyman, who were ignorant of it. In proof of bigamy, the extract of proclamation of banns, and the marriage certificate of the clergyman, in regard to both marriages, ought to be produced. The clergyman, if alive, must swear to his certificate ; and if he be dead, some one acquainted with his handwriting must prove it. If the extract of proclamation or certificate has been destroyed or lost, or if it never existed, the testimony of those present at the marriage will be held sufficient ; and in case of their death, of those who heard by report that the parties were married, and lived openly as man and wife. The first wife's evidence is inadmissible against her husband ; but the establishment of the first marriage, by annulling the second, removes the objection to the second wife's testimony ; when both marriages and the existence of the first spouse are proved, the burden of proving his belief, on reasonable grounds, that the first marriage was dissolved, lies upon the panel. 9 *Geo. Bill ; in Scotch judicial proceedings, is the name given to the application or petition to the Court of Session, praying the court to authorize those signet letters, which require such a warrant to pass the King's signet. See Bills of Signet Letters, Bill-Chamber. Petitions to the Court of Session, or reclaiming petitions (when in use) against judgments of the court, or of the Lords Ordinary, and in general all applications or pleadings not ordered by the court, were formerly denominated bills ; and the roll in which petitions and reclaiming notes are first set down to be moved in court is still called the roll of single bills. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 2, § 12, and B. iv. tit. 40, passim. See Reclaiming Note.

Bill of Exchange. Bills of exchange form a class of documents of most extensive use in the mercantile dealings, not of this country only, but of all civilized nations. Mr Thomson, in his valuable Treatise on the Law of Bills, with equal correctness and perspicuity, thus describes the instrument : " A bill of exchange is a written request, addressed by a person who is called the drawer, to another person called the drawee, desiring him to pay a certain sum of money, either to the drawer himself, or to a third party called the payee, within a certain time after its date, or after it is presented for payment, or on demand. If the drawee signs the bill in token of his agreeing to this request, he is called the acceptor."

The following will serve as an example of the ordinary inland bill ; but no prescribed form of words is necessary to constitute a bill.

L.100 sterling. Edinburgh,

Three months after date, pay to me (or to some third party, E. F.), or order, at your shop in Glasgow, the sum of One hundred pounds sterling, for value received.

(Signed) A. B. (the drawer.)

(Signed) C. D. (the acceptor.)

To C. D. Grocer, Glasgow.

This document admits of being passed, to the effect of assigning the debt from the drawer to a third party, and from him to others by indorsation, either before or after acceptance ; and in practice, most bills of exchange are so transferred to bankers, who, by means of their correspondents and otherwise, possess facilities for negotiating them ; and generally the banker advances the amount at the time the document is indorsed to him, discounting the interest up to the day of payment.

A foreign bill of exchange differs little, either in its form or qualities, from an inland bill. To provide against the risk of loss or detention in the course of transmission, it is usual to draw foreign bills in sets, and to transmit each bill by a different conveyance ; by which means the due negotiation of the document is with greater certainty insured. In accordance with this practice, foreign bills, whether drawn in this country or by merchants abroad, are generally in such terms as these :—

At sixty days after sight of this our first of exchange (second and third of same tenor and date being unpaid) pay to our order (or to C. D. or order), the sum of One hundred pounds sterling, for value as advised.

(Signed) P. L. & Son.

To Messrs P. L. & Son,
Merchants, Edinburgh. }

Such a bill of exchange, or an indorsed bill, is thus, in effect, an assignment to the payee or indorsee, of a debt due by the drawee to the drawer. This form of assignment took its origin entirely from the practice of merchants, to whose transactions it is peculiarly adapted. Its utility and extensive application to commercial transactions, which, among merchants residing at a distance from each other, would have been greatly encumbered by an adherence to more formal writings, early recommended the bill of exchange to the attention of the law in every country in Europe.

In Scotland, peculiar privileges have been conferred upon bills both by statute and by the common law. By the statute 1681, c. 20, payment of foreign bills may be enforced summarily, without the necessity of an action for constituting the claim; and the same privilege was extended to inland bills, by the act 1696, c. 36. At common law also, bills, both in their constitution and mode of transmission, have acquired an exemption from the strict form of other legal documents. The subscription of a party is in general necessary to render a bill binding; but it is not necessary that the bill should be either holograph or tested in the manner required in other probative writings. When a party cannot write, subscription by a notary and two witnesses has been sustained; Dinwoodie, 28th June 1737, M. 1419. In certain cases, other substitutes even have been received in place of the full subscription. Thus, subscription by initials or by a mark has each been sustained as sufficient; Shepherd, 19th Nov. 1760, M. 589; Kennedy, 25th May 1816, F. C. The mode of transferring right to the bill and its contents is equally simple. This may be done by the payee, or any indorsee from him, merely putting his name on the back of the bill, without stating the name of the indorsee, which is called a blank indorsation. In this shape a bill may be passed from hand to hand, without further indorsation, and the blank may be afterward filled up with the name of any one into whose hands it may come. The indorsement, however, may also be made in a special form, by the indorser putting above his subscription words to this purpose, "Pay the contents to E. F." And the effect of these indorsations in either form will be, to render the indorser liable in recourse to the indorsee for the amount of the bill, in case it be not paid by the acceptor. But it may happen that the indorser has no personal interest in the transaction, and though desirous of transmitting the bill to those who have right to it, or of assigning the debt to another, he may be unwilling to undertake any obligation of recourse, or guarantee for the sufficiency of the acceptor; and in that case he may indorse the bill with safety, to the effect of assigning the debt, by adding the words, "Pay the contents to E. F., without recourse on me, A. B."

Such is an outline of the privileges possessed by bills of exchange; and a short enumeration of some of the requisites essential to their constitution, and to their due negotiation, will convey all that can, with advantage, be embraced within the limits of this work. Bills must be written on paper duly stamped. The last statute regulating the stamp duties is 17 and 18 Vict., c. 83, 1854. A bill on unstamped paper, or on too low a stamp, is null; 31 Geo. III., c. 25, § 19, and 55 Geo. III., c. 184, § 8; and the commissioners of stamp duties have no power to affix the proper stamp, after the instrument has been engrossed. But it is of no consequence although the bill should be written on an improper stamp, provided the stamp duty be of equal or of greater value than the proper stamp, and that the stamp is not specially appropriated to some other instrument, by having its name on the face of it; stat. § 10. Bills must be for a sum of money, and unconditional. Bills for delivery of grain, or the like, or for a sum of money payable contingently on a particular event, have been denied the privileges of bills (Mor. p. 1399 and p. 1412). It is no objection to a bill, that it stipulates interest from the term of payment, or from its date. But a stipulation for a penalty, in case of failure to pay, has been held sufficient to annul the bill, although it has been doubted whether these precedents would now be followed; see Thomson on Bills, pp. 19, 20. A legacy, or mortis causa donation in the form of a bill would not be effectual to the payee, but good in the hands of an onerous indorsee; see Mor. pp. 8107, 12,341, 1444. Any essential vitiation in a bill infers nullity. For an example of an ingenious fraud by interpolation, where the stamp had not been written over, and as to the consequences of such a fraud, in questions with bond fide onerous holders, see Graham, 27th Jan. 1795, Mor. 1453; Pagan, 19th June 1793, Mor. 1660. The result seems to be, that where an acceptor has been so careless as to accept a bill with blanks, which can be filled up in such a manner as to render the fraud imperceptible, he will be liable to the bond fide onerous holder, although the acceptor may be himself entirely innocent of the fraud. Bills payable at a distant term have been considered inconsistent with the nature of bills; and in one case, a bill payable at three years after date, was held not entitled to the privileges of a bill; but it has been doubted by high authority whether the same strictness would now be observed.

What is called the negotiation of a bill, consists in the regular and punctual prosecution of those steps, which, in case of dishonour by the acceptor, are essential to preserve the holder's claim of recourse against the drawer and indorsers. For this purpose, three things must be attended to: 1. Presentment for acceptance or payment; 2. Protest in case of dishonour; 3. Intimation to the drawer and indorsers.

1st, The duty of presentment for acceptance will depend upon the terms of the bill. If it be made payable at a certain term, it is sufficient to present it on the day of payment. Where, on the other hand, it is payable at a particular period after sight, it is requisite to the due negotiation, that it be presented within a reasonable time after the indorsation; the precise extent of which will depend upon the custom, the distance to which the bill must be transmitted, and all the circumstances of the case. The draft, however, may be left with the drawee for twenty-four hours, that he may make up his mind whether to accept or not. With regard to an accepted bill, if it be payable at a particular term, it must be presented (and if dishonoured, it must be protested or noted), on the day of payment, or within the three following days, which are called days of grace; Cruikshanks, 29th Jan. 1751, Kilk.; Mor. p. 1576; British Linen Company, 19th May 1807, not reported, but noted in Bell's Com. i. 410. See Days of Grace. A bill payable on demand must be presented within a reasonable period, and without any undue delay. The presentment must be made at the place of payment specified in the bill, or, if no place of payment be mentioned, to the acceptor personally, or at his dwelling-house, or at his place of business, if at his place of business, it must be presented during the hours of business.

2d, The only legal evidence of presentment is an instrument of protest under the hands of a notary-public, certifying that he presented the bill, and protested it for non-payment or non-acceptance. The instrument of protest must specify that the bill was presented by the notary before two witnesses, whose names must also be inserted, although it is not necessary that they sign the instrument. It seems doubtful, however, how far the presentment by the notary's clerk is not sufficient; Stevenson, 14th Nov. 1764, Mor.

p. 1518; British Linen Company, 19th May 1807, supra. See also Bell's Com. i. 408, et seq. With a view to summary diligence, the protest must be recorded, and a decree of registration interponed, within six months after the bill falls due, in case of non-payment; and within the same period after the date of the bill, in case of non-acceptance.

3d, If the bill be dishonoured, notice must be sent to the drawer and indorsers, intimating the protest, and claim of recourse arising to the holder. This ought to be done in writing; but a verbal intimation is sufficient, provided the evidence of it be clear; Syme, 25th June 1813. The delivery of the notice into the Post-Office, or into the hands of any regular carrier, is held in the English cases to be sufficient, although the receipt is denied; Bell's Com. i. 415. In regard to foreign bills, the statute 12 Geo. III., c. 74, declares, "that notification of dishonour is to be made within such time as is required by the usage and custom of merchants." Erskine's doctrine, that the notification must be made "within three posts at farthest," seems to rest on no authority, and it was disregarded by the Court in the case of Carriock, 23d May 1790, Mor. p. 1614. In that case, the Court seemed rather to sanction the rule established by the English decisions, which appears to amount to this, that the notice must be sent the next day, where the parties reside in the same place, and, if possible, by the next post, to those who reside at a distance.

It is necessary to notify the dishonour to the drawer or indorsers notwithstanding the known insolvency of the acceptor. But neither notification of dishonour, nor protest is necessary, where the drawer has no effects in the acceptor's hands; for in that case the drawer loses nothing by the want of intimation or protest; Hill, 5th June 1805; Mor. App. voce Bill of Exchange, No. 18. See Accommodation Bills.

The intimation with regard to inland bills was formerly regulated by the act 12 Geo. III., c. 72, § 41, made perpetual by 22 Geo. III., c. 81, and which declared that it should be sufficient to preserve recourse, if notice was given of the dishonour within fourteen days after the protest was taken. This statutory provision was certainly an objectionable one, as making a great distinction between the notice of dishonour of inland bills in England and in Scotland. As, however, bills drawn in Scotland upon England were held to be foreign bills, the operation of the statute was strictly confined to Scotland. The provision, however, has been repealed by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of Scotland, 1856, so that notice of the dishonour of any bill or promissory-note must be given in the same manner and within the same time as is required in the case of foreign bills. By the same act it is declared, that the true date of bills or notes, when issued without date, may be proved by parole evidence: but summary diligence is not competent on such bills or notes. The same act declares, that no acceptance of a bill shall be valid unless it is made in writing on the bill, and signed by the acceptor, or some person duly authorized by him. It farther declares, that all bills or notes drawn or made within the United Kingdom and the islands mentioned in the act, on any party within the United Kingdom or such islands, shall be held to be inland bills. Under the same act a notarial protest of an inland bill of exchange is not now necessary, except for the purpose of summary diligence. Where a bill or note is lost, stolen, or fraudulently obtained, the holder must now prove that he gave value for it. Where, also, a bill or note is indorsed after the period of payment, the indorsee is subject to all the objections or exceptions to which the bill or note was subject in the hands of the indorser.

Bill-Chamber, Bonds in. See Caution. Attestor.

Bill-Chamber. "The Bill-Chamber is a particular department of the Court of Session, chiefly for determining upon applications for warrants to expedite signet letters. The Royal Signet in Scotland is placed under the direction and control of the Judges of the Court of Session; and it is in the form of letters passing under it that all ordinary civil actions are instituted, or legal execution against either person or property authorized. Some of these letters, such as ordinary summonses, are allowed to pass the signet without any special warrant from the court; but a variety of signet letters require the authority of the Court of Session to be interposed in the shape of a deliverance or fiat on a bill or petition as their warrant. (See Bills of Signet

Letters.) These warrants are, in the ordinary case, granted of course; and signet letters are now so well regulated by the recognised forms and practice of the court, that the fiat authorizing them to pass the signet is sufficient if signed by the officiating clerk in the Bill-Chamber; 53 Geo. III., c. 64, § 17. All bills praying for signet letters are presented at the Bill-Chamber; the clerks in which either themselves grant the necessary warrant in virtue of the act 53 Geo. III., c. 64, or they transmit the bill to the judge officiating in the Bill-Chamber for his determination upon its merits, before whom pleadings, either oral or written, may take place, after which he pronounces a judgment, either refusing the bill, or passing it, or remitting the case to the inferior judge. The decision of the Lord Ordinary officiating in the Bill-Chamber, with some exceptions, may be brought under review of the Court; and the judgment of the Court thus sitting on Bill-Chamber cases may be brought before the House of Lords by appeal, in the same manner with their judgments in ordinary cases. It is almost exclusively in questions as to the passing or refusing of bills of suspension of diligence, or in certain cases of advocacy of the judgments of inferior courts, that these discussions in the Bill-Chamber take place; and hence the result of such a discussion, however protracted, can only be the refusal or the granting of a warrant for expediting letters of suspension or of advocacy. So that the introduction of a cause into the court is all that is attained by the party who succeeds in getting such a bill passed; and, in general, even this advantage is not gained, unless caution be found to fulfil to the opposite party the decree which may be ultimately pronounced in the cause thus introduced."

The above quotation is made from the last edition of this work, since which time important changes have taken place. There is not now the same occasion for signet letters, or, where signet letters are necessary, for warrants by bill for expediting them, as formerly existed. The necessity of signet letters as warrants for diligence against person or property, where they proceeded upon decrees, is superseded by the Personal Diligence Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, which authorizes a warrant to be inserted in the extract decree, to charge the debtor or obligant to pay or perform within the days of charge, under pain of poinding and imprisonment, and to arrest and poind; and declares that diligence shall proceed upon such warrant in the same way as if it had been executed in virtue of signet letters. (See Bills of Signet Letters.) Again, it is no longer necessary that a summons before the Court of Session shall proceed upon a bill; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 18. And, especially, a change has been made in the practice as to advocations and suspensions. Before 1838 these had originated by the presentment of a bill to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, which bill of suspension or advocacy, being passed, became the warrant of the letters of suspension or advocacy. Still, all advocations and suspensions, with the exception of advocations of final judgments and of briefs, originate in the Bill-Chamber; but letters of advocacy and of suspension are abolished, and written notes, prepared in terms of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, and the relative Act of Sederunt, 24 Dec. 1838, passed to regulate proceedings in the Bill-Chamber, have superseded both the former bills and letters. The articles upon Advocation and Suspension show the modern forms of procedure. See also Caution. Horning. Arrestment. Poinding. Diligence. Letters.

The Bill-Chamber is open at all times, both during the sittings of the Court and in vacation; the junior Judge of the Court of Session officiating permanently in the Bill-Chamber during the sittings of the Court; 53 Geo. III., c. 64, § 2. In vacation and recess the Bill-Chamber business is performed by the six Judges of the Court of Session who are not Justiciary Judges, with power to all the Judges of the Court of Session, in case of indisposition or absence of any one of the six Judges, to act for him; 2 and 3 Vict., c. 36. The rotation in which the Bill-Chamber Judges officiate during vacation is fixed by Act of Sederunt, 8th August 1839 (See Shand's Practice, p. 71). As to the duties of the Bill-Chamber clerks, see Shand's Practice, p. 109.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, sequestration may be awarded either by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, or by a Sheriff. In sequestrations awarded by the former, and remitted to the Sheriff, the process of sequestration is held to be in the Bill-Chamber of the Court of Session, and the clerks of the Bill-Chamber to be clerks to such sequestration; § 43. The fees of these Clerks are regulated by § 181; and extracts of deliverances and decrees in sequestrations in the Court of Session are prepared by them; see Act of Sederunt, 20th July 1842, which, though bearing reference to the prior statute, is still observed in the practice of the Bill-Chamber.

For a historical account of the origin of the Bill-Chamber, see Beveridge on the Bill-Chamber; Juridical Styles, vols. ii. iii.; Ivory's Erskine, iv. 3, § 5; Shand's Practice, p. 444.

Bill of Rights. The statute 1 Will. and Mary, stat. ii., c. 2, is so called from declaring the rights of British subjects. Tomlins, h. t.

Bill of Lading; is an acknowledgment granted by the master of a ship to the shipper of goods, specifying the particular description of goods, and the quantity shipped. The bill of lading contains also an obligation on the master to deliver the goods so shipped at the port to which the vessel is bound, to a particular person named, or to his order, or to his assignees, on payment of the freight, &c. It is usual to sign three copies of the bill of lading, one for the buyer or consignee, another to go with the cargo, and a third for the seller or consigner, each bill containing a clause that, one being fulfilled, the rest shall be void. Bills of lading are invalid if not written on a proper stamp; Bell's Com. i. 543, et seq. The bill of lading is transferable by indorsation without intimation to the master; and the property of the goods specified in the bill is transferred to an onerous and bona fide indorsee unaffected by any claim of retention of the goods on the part of the original seller, or any right in him to stop them in transitu. The master is bound to deliver the goods to the holder of the bill, or to the person who has acquired right to it by indorsation; Bell's Com. i. 198. See the form of the bill of lading, Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 572. See also Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 414, et seq.; Bell's Illust. §§ 410, 415; Brown on Sale, p. 483; Smith's Maritime Practice, p. 30.

Bill of Health, or Sick Bill; is the name given to the application made under the Act of Sederunt, 14th June 1671, by an imprisoned debtor for liberation on account of bad health. The debtor's sickness "and extreme danger of life," had to be attested on oath under the hand of "a physician, surgeon, apothecary, or minister of the gospel in the place;" and, on such certificate being given, the magistrates were authorized to allow the debtor to reside during his sickness in some house within the town, they being always responsible in case he should escape, and bound that, on his recovery, he should return to prison. The practice in Edinburgh was for the debtor to present a petition to the magistrates, accompanied by the proper certificate; and if the magistrates were satisfied, they pronounced an interlocutor finding him entitled to leave the jail, on his lodging a bond with sufficient caution that he should return to prison on his convalescence. The question as to the nature of the security to be given for his return was necessarily one of circumstances; and it rather appears that the magistrates were not entitled to insist for unexceptionable caution, as that, in many cases, would have amounted to a total denial of the privilege. The general rule was that the magistrates should have regard to the health of the debtor, and take such precautions as circumstances admitted; and, where satisfactory caution was not found, it would seem that they were bound to place a guard over the person of the debtor, so as to prevent his escape. A prisoner liberated on account of bad health was not freed from restraint: he was confined to a house within the town, unless his illness were such as absolutely to require air and exercise. See Bell's Com. ii. 548, et seq.; 14 S., 124; Dow's Appeal Cases, vol. v. 37.

The remedy under the above Act of Sedentary was, till recently, confined solely to the case of Magistrates of Royal Burghs, who were formerly the keepers of the prisons. By the Prison Act, 2 and 3 Vict., c. 42, all liability of Magistrates for the holding, maintaining, and managing of prisons, or the aliment or escape of prisoners, is declared to cease, § 108; and it is further enacted, by 7 and 8 Vict., c. 34, § 11, that Sheriffs within their respective sheriffdoms shall have power, by summary application to the County Prison Board, accompanied by proper and satisfactory medical certificates, to authorize the removal of any civil or criminal prisoner afflicted with any contagious or infectious disease, or any disease which threatens immediate danger to life, and cannot be treated in prison, from any prison within the county to any hospital or other proper place within the same, or to any hospital near the same, for such period and under such precautions for the safe and proper custody of the prisoner, and of his re-imprisonment as they may direct.

Bill of Health, of a Ship; is a certificate of the health of the crew, required where the vessel has come from a suspected port. Under the obligation in the charter-party to furnish the ship "with everything needful and necessary for the voyage," the master will be bound to procure a bill of health, where that is necessary; and if, from a neglect to procure it when it might have been got, the vessel is prevented from delivering her cargo, the master or owners will be liable to make good to the freighter any loss thence arising. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 553, 5th edit.

Bill of Advocacy. See Advocacy.

Bill of Advocacy to Court of Justiciary; is an application to the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary, praying that the proceedings in an inferior criminal court may be advocated or brought under review of the Court of Justiciary. Instead, however, of expediting the letters of advocacy, as in the Court of Session, the practice is to debate and finally to discuss the whole merits of the case upon the bill. During the litigation on the bill of advocacy, the personal presence of the parties is not required; but after the bill is passed, the presence of both parties is necessary, as in an original criminal process in the Court of Justiciary. One Judge may pass a bill of advocacy, but two are necessary to refuse one. An interlocutor pronounced, at the first diet, in a criminal cause in the Sheriff Court, finding the libel relevant, cannot be advocated until the trial is concluded, though there may be, perhaps, such extreme cases as will induce the Court of Justiciary to stop an inferior Judge from proceeding with a cause pending before him; Jameson, 3d December 1855; 2 Irvine, 273; Hume, vol. ii. p. 511, 512; Bell's Notes, 306; Alison's Prac. p. 26.

Bill of Suspension. See Suspension.

Bill of Suspension in Court of Justiciary.

This (like the note of suspension in the Court of Session) is an application to the Lords of Justiciary, after the conclusion of a criminal trial in an inferior court, to stay execution of the sentence. The merits of the bill of suspension are judged of in the same manner with those of the bill of advocacy; and in it also one Judge may pass the bill, but two Judges are required to refuse it. It is no good reason of suspension or of advocacy that the verdict of a jury is not warranted by the evidence, the only ground on which a verdict can be brought under review in this form being that the inferior judge has admitted unlawful evidence, or has improperly circumscribed the proof; for these, and similar grounds of complaint do not affect the jury, but the Judge, who has not afforded the jury the legal materials for coming to a correct verdict. The Court of Justiciary, on the same principle, will judge of all objections which appear on the face of a verdict, or which arise from irregular proceedings on the part of the jury. It will not prevent the suspension of a sentence, that it has been already partly, or even wholly, executed; Gillies, 4th December 1839, 2 Swinton, 454. Hume, ii. 513; Bell's Notes, 506; Alison's Prac. 27.

Bills of Signet Letters; are the warrants necessary to authorize the keeper of the Royal Signet in Scotland to affix it to certain classes of the writs which pass that seal. Letters passing the signet were formerly much more in use than at present. In the case of diligences against the property or person, and in some other instances owing to the peculiar nature of the case, signet letters were required, which proceeded on an immediate warrant from the Court of Session, which warrant was interposed in the shape either of a decree, or of a deliverance or interlocutor on a bill, i.e. a petition praying for the letters; and signet letters upon decrees were said to pass per decretum Dominorum Concilii. Now, by the Personal Diligence Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, it is rendered unnecessary to execute diligence upon decrees of the Court of Session, Teind-Court, or Court of Justiciary, or Sheriff-Courts, or upon decree of registration, by virtue of signet letters, it being enacted that the decree itself shall contain warrant to charge the obligant to pay or perform under pain of poinding and imprisonment, to arrest and poind, and to open shut and lockfast places. Upon such warrant it is declared that diligence shall proceed against property or person to the same effect as if executed by virtue of letters of horning, or of caption, or as if arrestments and poindings had been executed under the forms previously in use. By 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, similar warrants may be inserted in the extracts of Exchequer decrees. When signet letters proceed upon a bill, they are said to pass ex deliberatione Dominorum Concilii. When bills were required in suspensions and advocations, and also in loosing arrestments when there was any pleading, the deliverance passing the bill was signed by the judge who passed it; but in all other cases the signature of the Bill-Chamber clerk officiating for the time is, by 53 Geo. III., c. 64, § 17, declared to be sufficient. In cases where evidence of the statements in the bill is required to be produced with it, the deliverance is expressed, "Fiat ut petitur, because the Lords have seen the precept" or other document produced in evidence; and the reason, as expressed in the fiat of the bill, must be repeated in the signet letters, of which it is the warrant. In cases where such evidence is not required; and where the bill is passed of course, a simple fiat ut petitur is sufficient. At whatever time the letters are signeted, they must always bear the date of the bill on which they proceed. Bills bear at the end the name of the writer to the signet; but do not require to be signed.

By the Act 1 and 2 Vict., c. 869, both bills and letters of avocation and of suspension are abolished, and superseded by written notes. See Avocation; Suspension. Bills of summonses are abolished by the Court of Session Act, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 18. See, upon the subject of this article, Bill-Chamber. Arrestment. Loosing of Arrestment. Poinding. Caption. Horning. Diligence. Letters.

In the Court of Justiciary, when the process against the accused person is raised by Criminal Letters, a bill is presented to the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary, setting forth at large the tenor of the intended charge, and praying for criminal letters. Where the Lord Advocate is the sole prosecutor, this bill is signed by him, or by some one having his authority; and where the prosecution is at the instance of a private party, the Lord Advocate must subjoin his concourse at the bottom of the bill. One of the clerks of Court signs the deliverance on the bill, which is as effectual for passing it as if the deliverance had been subscribed, as formerly, by one of the Judges of Justiciary; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 3. This is the warrant for raising criminal letters, which pass the signet of the Court of Justiciary, and proceed in the sovereign's name in the usual form, fixing a diet for trial, and authorizing the citation of the party, witnesses, and jury. Where the prosecution is instituted by indictment at the Lord Advocate's instance, although no such warrant is necessary to authorize the indictment, yet an application to the Lords of Justiciary, in the form of a bill, was, till lately, required as the warrant for letters of diligence for citing the party indicted, witnesses, and jury. The statute 16 and 17 Vict., c. 79, § 2, dispenses now with such bill, and ordains that letters of diligence, in cases both before the High Court and Circuit Courts of Justiciary, shall be issued by the clerk of Court to the Lord Advocate on exhibition of the indictment on which such letters require to be raised, or a copy thereof signed by the Crown agent; and it is not necessary that such letters pass the Signet. Bishops; the higher dignitaries of the Church of Rome or of England. When the church government of Scotland was Episcopal, there were two archbishops, the Archbishop of St Andrews and the Archbishop of Glasgow; the former had the title of Primate of all Scotland, the latter that of Primate of Scotland. In Scotland, under 1540, c. 125, the nomination of bishops was in the sovereign, who sent to the chapter or clergy of the cathedral a congé d'élire, at the same time recommending a particular churchman, whom they were bound to choose. After being chosen by the chapter, he was called bishop-elect; and the king's patent under the Great Seal, confirming the election, established in him a right to the spirituality of the benefice. The king then granted a mandate for the consecration of the bishop, at which it was requisite that three bishops should officiate. The last step was that of doing homage, and swearing obedience to the king. These ceremonies being gone through, the bishop acquired full right to the fruits of his benefice from the day of his election. Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 3, et seq.; Bank, vol. i. pp. 53, 560; Brown's Synop. pp. 794, 2570; Shaw's Digest, p. 596.

Black Act; in English law, an Act (9 Geo. II., c. 21.) for the punishment of persons committing devastations in disguise. Repealed by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 27.

Black Acts; are the Acts of the Parliaments of the five Jameses, with those of Mary's reign, and of James VI. down to 1586 or 1587. They were called the Black Acts, from the circumstance of their being printed in the Saxon character. Ersk. B. i. t. 1, § 37.

Black Mail; was a yearly payment for security and protection made to those bands of armed men who, about the middle of the 16th century, laid many parts of the country under contribution. The Legislature, in order to put a stop to this unlawful violence, enacted that, whoever, under pretence of securing his lands against "rievvers," should pay to them a yearly contribution in money, should suffer death; 1567, c. 21; 1578, c. 102. It does not appear, however, that the punishment of death was ever inflicted, either on the payer or the taker of this exaction. Hume, vol. i. p. 476. See a singular example of a contract of black mail of so late a date as 1741; Hume, vol. ii., App. No. 9, p. 531. See also Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 64; Bank, vol. i. p. 70; *Kames' Stat. Black Rod. The gentleman usher of the black rod is chief gentleman usher to the Sovereign, and has his title from the rod which he carries as the badge of his office. His duty is to keep the Chapterhouse door, when a chapter of the Order of the Garter is sitting; and during the sitting of Parliament he attends on the House of Lords. To his custody all Peers called in question for any crime are first committed. His deputy is called the yeoman usher. See Tomlins, h. t. and May's Parliamentary Practice.

Blanch-Holding; is one of the tenures of the law of Scotland. The duty payable to the superior in blanch-holding is in general trifling, as a penny Scots; or merely elusory, as a peppercorn, si petatur tantum. It may happen, however, that the duty is of greater value; and then the distinction received in practice is founded on the nature of the duty. Where it is of yearly growth, if it be not asked within the year, the right to exact it is understood to be lost; whereas, if it be not of yearly growth, it founds a claim at any time within the years of prescription. In Exchequer, the blanch-duty is always exacted; and where it is not converted into money in the investiture, it is valued and ascertained. The casualties common to this and to feu-holding are non-entry, relief, disclamation, purpresture, and liferent escheat. See these titles, and also Feu-holding. This manner of holding was anciently in use; and many estates were held both of the Crown and of the subjects-superior in blanch. On the abolition of ward-holding, by 20 Geo. II., c. 50, all the lands which held formerly of the Crown were converted into blanch-holding; and by the Act 25 Geo. II., c. 20, and the royal warrant under the Privy-Seal, January 1753, all lands held ward of the Prince were declared in future to be held blanch; whereby the extent of land held by this tenure was much increased. But the tenure is now seldom adopted in the constitution of what is termed an original right. See Charter. Besides the estates held blanch in one or another of those ways, there is an alternative blanch-holding inserted in every disposition of sale, so as to enable the purchaser to constitute a base right, holding of the seller, capable of carrying the property of the subject sold as it stood in the seller. Infestment on the precept of sasine, in a disposition containing the alternative holding, completes a feudal title in the person of the purchaser, who may afterwards complete his title with the superior, so as to come precisely into the seller's place. Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 33; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 7; Bank, vol. ii. p. 556, et seq.; Bell's Princ. §§ 682, 693, 4th edit.; *Swint. Blank Bonds; were bonds, formerly known in practice, blank in the name of the creditor. They passed, like bills, by mere delivery, the bearer being at any time at liberty to fill up his name and pursue for payment. The ostensible reason, and perhaps the original one, for introducing these bonds into practice, was to save the expense of conveyances, and to facilitate the transmission of the right. Experience, however, having proved that they were capable of being easily converted to fraudulent purposes, the act 1696, c. 25, declared all deeds in which the creditor's name is left blank to be null. But the insertion of the creditor's name, posterior to the delivery of the deed by the granter, must be proved in order to found the objection under the statute; Sinclair, 13th June 1746, Mor. p. 11559; Ruddiman, 30th July 1746, Mor. p. 11562. The statute excepts the notes of trading companies, and indorsations of bills of exchange. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 6; Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 17; B. iii. tit. 1, § 5; Bank, vol. ii. p. 194; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 16, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 1459; Brown's

Blasphemy; is the denying or vilifying of the Deity, by speech or writing. This is termed divine lese majesty, or treason against the Deity. A distinction is made between ascribing anything inconsistent with the divine attributes of God, and oaths and imprecations tending to throw contempt on religion. The former crime was, under the old law, punishable with death; the latter by an arbitrary punishment, proportioned to the circumstances of the offence. The acts 1661, c. 21, and 1695, c. 11, which provided capital punishment for offences of this description, were repealed by 53 Geo. III., c. 160. The punishment is now arbitrary at common law; and by 6 Geo. IV., c. 47, the publication of blasphemy, or of statements denying the existence or attributes of God, or the authority of the Holy Scriptures, is declared a cognisable offence, and punishable with fine and imprisonment. That statute also declares the criminal to be punishable on a second offence with banishment, a provision which is, however, repealed by 7 Will. IV., c. 5. As to offences against religion, see Hume, i. 568, et seq.; Shaw's Digest.

Blazon of a messenger-at-arms; the badge of his office displayed by a messenger in the act of apprehending a debtor. Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 14; Bank, ii. 503; Bell's Com. ii. 544; Hume, i. 389, 17 D. 292. See Apprehending of a Debtor. Deforcement.

Bleaching. The bleaching of linen cloth is the subject of various statutory regulations. See Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. iii. p. 223. The bleacher has a lien upon the cloth in his hands for the price of bleaching, not only that particular parcel, but also former parcels, when there has been a regular course of dealing between him and his debtor. Bell's Com. ii. 109; Bell's Prin. § 1435, 4th edit.; Bell's Illust. ib.; Brown's Synop. p. 1253; Hume, i. 108.

Blockade. Neither neutrals nor any other vessels can trade with a port under blockade, without danger of capture. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 305; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 43, and authorities there cited.

Blood-Wits; riots in which blood is spilt. The Sheriff of the county and Justices of the Peace have a cumulative jurisdiction in judging of these offences. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 4; Stair, B. ii. t. 3, § 62; Bank, i. 567.

Bloody-Hand; in English law, one of the four circumstances taken as presumptive proof that the offender has killed deer in the King's forest. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; and Wharton's Lex. v. Backberinde.

Bludueit; an unlaw or fine for wrong or injury, such as blood. A party infeft in the ancient law with bludueit, was entitled to hold courts and recover fines for effusion of blood. Skene, h. t.

Bona Fides. A bona fide possessor is a person who possesses a subject upon a title which he honestly believes to be good. A bona fide possessor, from whom the subject has been evicted by a person having a better title, will be entitled to retain the fruits or profits which he has reaped or received during his bona fide possession. This is an equitable rule founded not only on the hardship of subjecting a person who has lived in the belief that the property was his own, to a claim for repetition of what he has drawn from it, but also on the negligence of the real proprietor, who has himself to blame for his delay to vindicate his property. A crop of corn belongs to the person by whom it has been bona fide sown; and where the bona fides continues, until after the legal terms of payment of rent, the rent, although still in the tenant's hands unplucked, will belong to the bona fide possessor. Erskine (B. ii. tit. 1, § 26) is of opinion that interest of money erroneously paid to a person bona fide believing himself the creditor, is in the same situation with fruits and rents. In regard to the case of Olipphant against Smith, 30th Nov. 1790, Mor. p. 1721. Mr Ivory observes, "The judgment seems to have proceeded, not on any general denial of the doctrine in the text, but on a sort of specialty, viz., that the particular action before the Court—as being a condictio indebiti admitted no claim for annualrents, bona fide percepta."

Bona fides ends when the possessor becomes aware of the insufficiency of his title, whether by private knowledge or otherwise. But this is obviously a point which there must be considerable difficulty in fixing. When the defect of title is apparent at once, the execution of a summons for trying its validity will be held as a sufficient interruption of the bona fides. Where, however, the question of right is attended with difficulty, the interruption of the bona fides may not be held to have taken place until after litis contestation, or even until a final decree in the action has been pronounced. The question, indeed, is evidently one which must depend on the special circumstances of the particular case. The following Roman law maxims are applicable to this subject: Bona fides non patitur ut idem bis exigiatur. Bona fide possessor facit fructus consumptos suos. Contracts and actions in the Roman law, termed bonæ fidei, in contradistinction to stricti juris, are those in which the interpretation is not confined to the express terms of the convention, but may be extended according to equity and the presumed intention of the parties. *Ersk. Bond. A bond is a written obligation to pay or perform; and is, of course, as various in its nature as the circumstances vary relatively to which it may be granted. The most important bonds, in Scotch practice, are those of an heritable kind; but these, as well as the varieties of the personal bond, will be explained under other titles (see Heritable Bond. Disposition in Security. Bond of Corroboration, &c.); and the present observations shall therefore be confined to the simple moveable bond for repayment of borrowed money. The style of this bond commences with an acknowledgment by the grantor of the receipt of the money. The common and safe form in this part of the bond is to declare that the money has been "instantly" received. Sometimes the money is stated to have been received at a bygone period; but it is expedient, if possible, to avoid this form of expression, as it may expose the bond to reduction under the act 1696, c. 5, in so far as it is a security for a prior debt. The style then takes the borrower, his heirs, executors, and successors, bound to repay to the lender and his executors or assignees (and sometimes to nominatim substitutes) the sum lent at a definite period, generally at one of the terms of Candlemas, Whitsunday, Lammas, or Martinmas, with interest at such rate as may be agreed on, from the time of advance until repayment, and a fifth part more of the principal sum of penalty in case of failure. On this part of the deed, it may be observed, that as the grantor may be succeeded by various descriptions of heirs, some of whom would, by law, be liable subsidiarie only, and in a certain order, it is not unusual to add to the terms "heirs, executors, and successors," the words, "renouncing the benefit of discussion," which have the effect of rendering all the borrower's successors liable, con-

junctly and severally, to the creditor, reserving, of course, to the person who pays, his relief against the heir primarily liable. Under the penalty in the bond, the creditor on the debtor's failure in punctual payment is not entitled to recover more than the actual expense incurred in making the bond effectual; and it is not usual in moveable, as is in heritable bonds, to annex any penalty to a failure in the termly payments of interest. The form of the bond concludes with a consent to registration, in order that letters of horning, on a charge of six days, may proceed against the debtor if he should fail to pay; and the deed is closed with the usual testing clause; see the form, Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 21. Moveable bonds, like other deeds, may be granted by one or more obligants, who may bind themselves, either jointly and severally, or pro rata only; or they may be granted by bodies politic; and, like every other liquid obligation, may be made the ground of the diligence of adjudication against the debtor's heritage. Moveable bonds are transferred by assignation. Since the date of the act 1661, c. 32, they descend in all cases to executors, and are taken up by confirmation. Prior to the passing of that act, when a bond bore interest, it was regarded as a quasi feudum, and held to be heritable in questions of succession. The statute, however, altered that rule, except only in so far as regards the rights of husband and wife, and the fisk; that is to say, the principal sums in moveable bonds, in questions as to the legal rights of husband and wife, do not form part of the goods in communion; and did not fall under the single escheat before the abolition of that casualty. It is always practicable, however, to confer an heritable character on the bond, though it have no relation to a particular heritable subject, by merely making it payable to heirs, secluding executors; in which case, it necessarily becomes heritable by its own terms, and not because any heritable subject is impledged for the repayment. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 9, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 63, 910, 4th edit.; Bell's Illust. § 68; Jurid. Styles; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 45, 281; Ross's Lectures, i. 1, et seq.

Bond of Caution; is an obligation by one person as surety for another, either that he shall pay a certain sum, or perform a certain act. The terms of this bond must necessarily depend upon those of the principal obligation to which it is an accessory. In the ordinary case, the principal debtor and the cautioner are taken bound in the same deed; but it may happen that the obligation by the cautioner is undertaken in a separate deed. Separate bonds of caution are necessary in various steps of judicial procedure,—as in processes of suspension, in which, in the ordinary case, before the letters are expedite, the suspender must lodge in the Bill-Chamber a bond of caution to the satisfaction of the opposite party, and of the clerk of the bills, containing an obligation on the cautioner to fulfil the decree to be pronounced in the cause, and to pay whatever damages or expenses may be awarded. (See Suspension and Advocation, also Caution.) Judicial caution is also required to be found in losing arrestments, in law-burrows, by tutors and curators for the faithful discharge of their duty, and in many other instances which need not be enumerated here. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 362, et seq.; vol. ii. pp. 69, 372, 5th edit.; Bell on Leases, vol. ii. pp. 312, 347, 355, 4th edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Jurid. Styles; Dow's Appeal Cases, i. 247, 272; Menzies' Conveyancing. See Cautionary.

Bond of Relief; is a bond by the principal debtor, granted in favour of a cautioner, declaring the nature of the cautioner's obligation, and that it was undertaken solely for behoof of the granter of the bond of relief,—who binds himself to relieve the cautioner from the consequences of his obligation. Sometimes heritable security is granted to the cautioner for his relief, or the friends of the principal debtor become bound along with him in the bond of relief. See examples of such bonds, Jurid. Styles; see also Menzies' Conveyancing.

Bond for a Cash-Credit in a Bank. Where heritable security is not granted to the bank, this is a simple personal bond by the person in whose favour the credit is granted, and his cautioners, who are in the ordinary case bound along with him as principal debtors to the bank. See an example of such a bond, Jurid. Styles. As to the manner of granting heritable security for such credits, see Bank Credits. See also Menzies' Conveyancing.

Bond of Corroboration. A bond of corroboration is an additional obligation granted by the debtor in a bond, by which he corroborates the original obligation. This deed may be used, 1. For the purpose of accumulating arrears of interest into a principal sum, and adding it to the original debt, so as to make the whole bear interest. 2. Where the debtor in a bond dies, his heir may grant a bond of corroboration of his ancestor's debt, which will save the expense of constituting the debt against the heir. 3. Where the creditor in a bond dies, the debtor may grant a bond of corroboration to his heir, which will save the expense of a confirmation, or of completing a title in the person of the heir. It may be thought that, in those cases, the transaction would be simplified by cancelling or discharging the old bond and taking a new one; but it is to be observed, 1. That an inhibition which might strike at a new bond, of the date of the bond of corroboration, may have no effect against the original bond; and, 2. That a bond of corroboration may fall under the act 1696, c. 5, in case the granter should become bankrupt within the sixty days; in which case, the original bond must be resorted to, or the debt must be constituted precisely as if no bond of corroboration had been granted. See examples of this deed, Jurid. Styles. See also Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 60; Bell's Com. vol. i. pp. 531, 671; vol. ii. pp. 5, 212, 5th edit.; Brown's Synop. pp. 1064, 2569.

Bond of Bottomry; is a real security over a ship, granted by the owner or by the master, for payment of the money advanced for the outfit of the vessel, or for repairs. This form of security is of the nature of a contract of hazard, for the loan is repayable only in the event of the ship's safe arrival at the port of destination; and, in consideration of this risk, the lender exacts a certain rate of premium, greater or less, according to the risk. When bonds of bottomry are granted by the owner to raise money for the outfit of the vessel, they are preferable, according to the priority of their dates. But when they are granted by the master in foreign ports for repairs at different periods of the voyage, the last in date is entitled to priority in payment. It is proper to attend particularly to the description of the voyage, and to specify the ports at which the vessel is to touch, so as to avoid disputes as to the nature of the risk. See examples of this bond, Jurid. Styles. See also, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 17; Bank. vol. i. p. 399; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 530, et seq. 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 452, et seq. 4th edit.; Bell's Illust.; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. voce Bottomtree; Shaw's Digest; Smith's Maritime Prac. 129, 153; Menzies' Conveyancing.

Bond of Respondentia; is a bond precisely similar in its nature to a bond of bottomry, except that the security is given over the goods on board of the vessel instead of the vessel itself. See Jurid. Styles; Bell's Com. i. 535, 5th edit.; Smith's Prac. 135; Menzies' Conveyancing. See Respondentia.

Bond of Presentation; is an obligation granted for behoof of a person in custody on a legal warrant, in order to obtain his temporary liberation. The obligant in such a bond becomes bound to present the person so liberated, to the officer holding the warrant, at a particular day and place. A failure to produce the debtor in terms of this obligation will subject the granter of the bond in fulfilment of the obligation, for the non-performance of which the apprehension had taken place; e. g., to pay the debt where the debtor has been relieved from custody under a caption, or to produce the debtor at all diets of Court, where he has been freed from an arrest under a meditatio fuge warrant. But, although independently of express stipulation, this is the legal consequence of undertaking such an obligation, it is usual, in formal bonds of presentation, to insert an express clause to that effect. It will afford the obligant in a bond of presentation no defence, for his failure to implement his obligation, to allege that the debtor, during his temporary liberation, has obtained a sist on a bill of suspension; or has retired to the Sanctuary; or has done any thing to evade the presentation, which he could legally have avoided doing, it being the very object of the bond to provide against acts of that description. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the obligant is freed by the intermediate death of the debtor, and that he is entitled to have implement postponed on account of the debtor's sickness, or any other inevitable accident. It appears also to be clear, that he is liberated, by the debtor's imprisonment, previously to the time of presentation, on another warrant, for by that means the object of the bond is accomplished, and the creditor cannot possibly allege detriment. There is an old case, indeed (Potstead against Sax, 7th July 1681, Mor. p. 1807), in which the contrary was found; but the ratio of that decision, as stated in the rubric, viz., "that the being imprisoned for another debt was considered to be the act of the debtor," is evidently unsound both in law and in reason; and the judgment seems to be disapproved of by later authorities. (Bell's Com. i. 385.) The most effectual form of the bond of presentation is a deed regularly tested and executed on a proper stamp, containing, besides the clause of presentation, a specific obligation on the granter to pay the debt in case of failure to present, and a clause of registration, on which the obligant may be immediately charged with burning, should he not duly implement the principal obligation. It is not uncommon in practice, however, to accept of a simple letter of presentation with a similar clause; but such a letter can afford a ground of action only, and is no warrant for summary diligence. The letter ought to be regularly tested; but an informality in this respect will seldom affect its validity; for if the debtor has been liberated on the faith of the letter, that will be held a sufficient rei interventus; and the objection that it is not regularly tested will not avail; Dun-

Bonding of Goods; is the depositing of imported goods in the King's cellars, where they remain impledged for payment of the duties. The bonding system is regulated by the statute, 43 Geo. III., c. 132, under which the King's warehouse may be regarded as the warehouse also of the importer of the goods, where they lie at his risk and at his disposal, subject only to the King's pledge. It was at one time doubted in the Court of Session whether it was not necessary that the duties should be paid and the goods actually taken out of bond and delivered to the buyer, in order to complete the transfer. But it is now settled, that whether the duties are paid or not, an order of delivery, addressed to the keeper of the King's cellar, accompanied by notice to the keeper and a transfer in the cellar books, amounts to complete delivery. See Bell's Com. i. 186; Shaw's Digest.

Bonorum, Cessio. See Cessio Bonorum.

Book Debts; are debts by open account. The proof of debts of this description may sometimes be attended with difficulty. The evidence of furnishings made by merchants and retail dealers is generally parole; and the creditor's books, together with the evidence of the delivery by his clerks or porters, will, in the ordinary case, be held sufficient. If delivery cannot be proved, it would seem that circumstantial evidence of various kinds will be admitted on the part of the creditor; and it has been held that the books of a regular merchant afford a semiplena probatio, to the effect of allowing the claim to be supported by the evidence of a single witness and the oath of the merchant in supplement. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 330; Bell's Princ. § 629; Illust. ib. For the steps to be taken by a party in Scotland, desirous to recover a debt due to him in England, see English Debt. Claim.

Booking of a Prisoner for Debt. When a debtor has been apprehended and removed to prison, the amount of the debt for which he is incarcerated, and the prisoner's name, are recorded in the jail books, which is termed booking the prisoner. This record was originally introduced by the magistrates, who were formerly keepers of the prisons, in order to inform themselves of the amount of their responsibility; and it is the jailer's, not the creditor's, duty to see the proper entry made. It is the practice to enter the whole sum of debt; though formerly the creditor was safe in only entering a part of it, and arresting the debtor in prison for the remainder. Formerly, too, it was necessary to pay the jailer a fee proportionate to the sum booked; but by 2 and 3 Vict., c. 42, § 19, all jail fees, of every description, payable to the keeper or officers of prisons, are abolished. By the former practice, a debtor, after being once entered, could not be liberated without obtaining letters of relaxation and liberation from the King, after intimation to the creditor, and a charge to the magistrates to set him at liberty; but now, if the debtor pay the debt as it stands in the prison books, he is free. Bell's Com. ii. 554; Ross's Lect. i. 334, 343. See Act of Grace; Breaking of Prison.

Books of Adjournal. The records of the Court of Justiciary. In these books are engrossed the acts and regulations of the Court of Justiciary, and the relative procedure; and in other respects, the books of Adjournal are analogous to the books of Sederunt of the Court of Session. The power of the Court of Justiciary to pass acts of adjournal regulating the procedure of the court is conferred by 1672, c. 16. By 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 7, record copies of proceedings, instead of being transcribed in the books of adjournal, may be inserted therein.

Books of Sederunt. The books in which the Acts of Sederunt of the Court of Session are recorded. Besides the Acts of Sederunt, these books contain the names of the judges present at each meeting of the court, the dates of the admission of the judges, clerks of session, and other officers of the court, advocates, &c. Formerly, indeed, most of the public papers of importance were recorded in these books; and even matters totally unconnected with the business of the court, such as eclipses and other remarkable events. See McKenzie's Obs. on Stats. p. 164. See Acts of Sederunt.

Border Warrant; is a warrant issued by the Judge Ordinary, on the borders between Scotland and England, on the application of a creditor, for arresting the person or effects of a debtor residing on the English side of the border, and detaining him until he find caution judicio sisti (i.e. that he shall sist himself in judgment), in any action which may be brought for the debt within six months. The creditor applying for such a warrant must swear to the verity of the debt; and, as in meditatio fugæ warrants, to which these warrants are analogous, it is necessary to examine the debtor as to the fuga before warrant to incarcerate is granted; so in border warrants it is proper to examine the debtor as to his domicile, &c., before issuing a warrant for incarceration. Very important information on the subject of border warrants will be found in Landell, 26th January 1838, 16 S., 388; in which case the warrant was held to be illegal, and the procedure under it such as could not be sanctioned, even by the most inveterate usage. The alleged debtor afterwards brought action of damages against the party by whom the warrant was obtained, and the party (a Sheriff clerk) by whom it was granted, and obtained £500 damages against the former, and £300 against the latter; 3 D. 819; 7 D. 810. In the House of Lords, however, this action was afterwards held irrelevant, in respect that the summons did not expressly aver want of reasonable skill or gross negligence, or show facts necessarily raising such an inference; 4 Bell, App. 46. See Barclay's M'Glash. Sher. Court Prac. 405; Ersk. B. i. tit. ii. § 21; Bell's Com. vol. iii. p. 558, 5th edit. See also Meditatio Fugæ.

Borough-English; in English law, is a customary descent of lands or tenements, whereby in all places where this custom holds, lands and tenements descend to the youngest son; or if the owner of the land have no issue, to the younger brother. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Borough Laws. This name is given to a collection of ancient laws relative to burghs. These laws are not considered as obligatory, but are useful in tracing ancient manners and customs. Ersk. B. i. tit. i. § 36. See Regiam Majestatem.

Borrowing; is the act of receiving in loan. Contracts of loan are of two kinds, viz. mutuum and of commodate. The former of these comprehends the loan of such subjects as are consumed in the act of using them—such as corn, wine, money, &c.; the latter is that kind of loan in which the borrower is bound to restore the individual subject lent. See Mutuum. Commodate.

Bothna; according to Skene, is a park where cattle are fed and inclosed. Skene, h. t.

Bottomry; Bond of. See Bond of Bottomry.

Bought and Sold Note; in English law, where a note of sale is signed by a broker employed to sell a parcel of goods, the bargain is completed. Bell's Princ. § 89.

Bounding Charter or Infestment; a charter or infestment which describes the lands by their meaths or marches. Such a description confers right to all within the bounds, and, on the other hand, excludes what lies beyond. No prescription can confer right to that which is without the bound-dary, as part and pertinent. In describing boundaries, the walls surrounding the subject will be held as conveyed, if the subject be conveyed with the walls by which it is surrounded. If it be described as bounded by certain walls, the walls will not be held as conveyed; and where it is intended that the wall is to be mutual, this must be expressed. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, §§ 26 and 73; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 2, et seq.; Bank. i. 552; Bell's Princ. § 738; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 35; Duff on Deeds; Menzies on Conveyancing.

Bovata Terræ; an oxengate of land; sometimes erroneously written davata terræ. Skene, l. t.

Box-Day. In the Court of Session, box-days are two days appointed by the Judges, in each of the spring and autumn vacations, and one day in the Christmas recess, on one or other of which days papers ordered by the Court, or by the Lords Ordinary, towards the close of the preceding session, are usually appointed to be lodged. The first box-day is also the day on which interlocutors pronounced by any of the Lords Ordinary, within fewer than twenty-one days of the close of the session, become final, unless a reclaiming note be boxed, as it is termed, on the first box-day. See Reclaiming Note. In terms of 2 and 3 Vict., c. 36, § 13, and A. S. 8th August 1839, §§ 6, 7, summonses may be called at either of the box-days in the autumn vacation, the defences being returned at the second box-day, or at the meeting of the Court in November respectively; and by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 54, the Court is empowered to make regulations by Act of Sederunt for allowing summonses and notes of advocacy and suspension, &c., to be called at any box-day in vacation or recess, and making defences returnable at such box-days, or on the meeting of the Lords Ordinary, or of the Court after vacation or recess. The same statute, by § 8, allows the production in reductions to be satisfied on any of the box-days in vacation or recess; and by § 27, diligences may be reported on any of the box-days. In the inferior courts, also, it is enacted by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 45, that the Sheriff shall, before the termination of each session, appoint at least one court-day during each vacation for the despatch of all ordinary civil business, including the calling of new causes, and the receipt of condempnations, defences, and other papers, which, if the Court had not been in vacation, would have required to be previously lodged. See Sheriff-Court.

Breach of Arrestment; is the contempt of the law, committed by an arrestee who disregards the arrestment used in his hands, and

pays the sum, or delivers the goods arrested, to the common debtor. The person guilty of breach of arrestment was formerly liable to a prosecution both civil and criminal. The criminal action was competent either before the Court of Session or the Court of Justiciary; the punishment was arbitrary, with escheat of moveables, out of which the debt of the arrestee and damages were given. There is no example in modern times of such a prosecution. The civil action is for payment of the debt a second time by the arrestee, and for damages to the arrester, though even this rigour is not now countenanced; and at present the only consequence of breach of arrestment is, that the person guilty of it is liable in damages to the extent of the funds paid away, and the expenses; Grant, 27th Feb. 1792; Mor. p. 786. Where goods are arrested, and the arrestment loosed on caution, if the goods themselves cannot be restored, or their value cannot be clearly ascertained, the cautioner is held to be liable for the debt. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 29; B. iv. tit. 49, §§ 3, 7; More's Notes, p. cxc; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 14; B. iv. tit. 4, § 36; Bank. vol. i. p. 290; *Barclay's M'Glash. Breach of Trust. The distinction between theft and breach of trust, is often exceedingly narrow; Climie, 21st May 1838, 2 Swinton, 118; but of late years the tendency of the Court has been to bring under the category of theft various offences, the species facti in which appears to have been held by our earlier constitutional writers to amount only to breach of trust. See Hume, i. 58, et seq.; Alison's Princ. 354; Burnett, 112; Steele, 114. Accordingly, in the case of Brown, 3d July 1839, 2 Swinton, 394, the principle was adopted and enforced, that where a person holding property is the mere hand for detaining or transmitting it, without any permanent mandate or right of administration, and is bound to give over such property in forma specifica, appropriation by that holder is theft; while, on the other hand, where the holder has a right of management, or a power to exchange, or to account for the property or an equivalent, the appropriation of the property or its proceeds falls under the nomen juris of breach of trust. In Brown's case, therefore, the appropriation by a watchmaker of a watch left with him to be cleaned or repaired, was held to be theft, Lord MEADOWBANK observing:—"When a party puts his watch into the hands of a watchmaker to be cleaned or repaired, he only parts with the custody,—the possession of the watch is the possession of the owner,—and the watchmaker, in appropriating it, takes it out of the lawful possession of the owner, and so is guilty of theft." On the other hand, it is not theft, but breach of trust, where a pawnbroker appropriates articles pledged with him. In this case, the possession of the pawnbroker is not a limited and temporary custody; but the act of pledging gives him a title to the articles themselves, which by lapse of time becomes absolute, and enables him to sell and to give a valid right to all the world; Crosgrave or Bradley, 6th Feb. 1850; Shaw's Just. Cases, 301. Reference may be also made to the following cases:—Field, Jan. 22, 1838, 2 Swinton, 24, where a clerk, who had appropriated money delivered to be paid to a particular person, was held guilty of theft.—Michie, Jan. 28, 1839, 2 Swint., 319, where it was held that a person who had received a bank-note to get change, and who appropriated the note, committed theft.—Smith v. Wishart, May 18, 1842, Broun, 342; where the appropriation by a bank-teller of money intrusted to him in that capacity, was unanimously held to be theft. Such a person has no power of administration, his duty being simply to pay and receive the money of the bank, in the bank's possession, and within their premises. He has no right to alter the form or condition of the money intrusted to him, and he is, in fact, trusted no farther than he has access to it. Again, in Watt v. Home, 8th Dec. 1851; Shaw's Just. Rep. 519, it was held, that where yarn is given to a workman, for the purpose of his weaving it into a web, he is guilty, not of breach of trust, but of theft, if he appropriate the yarn to his own use. In this case, the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK HOPE observed—"I have ever been of opinion that theft under trust was a known crime, and that the property being under trust constituted the offence an aggravated charge of theft, and the distinction was again pointed out between such a case and one of pledge. The weaver holds the yarn for a special purpose as his employer's servant, and has no separate possession of his own. The pledger, on the other hand, parts with a property in the goods, and the broker acquires, by force of special contract, jus proprium in them; so that not only cannot the pledger redemand them, but he may even steal them from the pawnbroker. See also, Bell's Supp. to Hume, pp. 8-17.

Breach of trust may be committed by a person in whom no trust is reposed, if he be art and part in the crime of one who is trusted. The punishment of breach of trust varies from imprisonment for a few months to penal servitude. See Theft.

Breaking Bulk; or making use of an article, debars a buyer from afterwards objecting to it, and returning it to the seller.

Bell's Princ. 3d edit, § 99, and authorities there cited; Illust. ib.

Breaking Inclosures. There are several statutes for the encouragement of planting and inclosing, which provide for the punishment of those who destroy planting or break inclosures, or who allow their cattle to do so. The penalties are pecuniary, with right to detain cattle found trespassing, until the fine is paid, along with the damage and expense. The chief statutes are 1661, c. 41, and 1685, c. 49. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 39; Hume, i. 82, 124. See Planting and Inclosing.

Breaking of Prison; is the crime of escaping out of prison. In order to constitute this crime, it is necessary that the person guilty of it shall have escaped out of a lawful prison, in which he was confined on a legal warrant, whether as a criminal, or as a person accused of a crime, or as a debtor. It makes no difference whether the offence has been committed by violence or by corrupting the jailor. The punishment is arbitrary, and must necessarily be regulated by the circumstances attending the commission of the crime; Hume, i. 401; Bell's Notes; Alison's Prin. 555. Where a debtor made his escape, the magistrates of the burgh were formerly liable for the debt, whether the insufficiency of the prison, or the carelessness of the jailor had led to the escape. But if the debtor escape in the night-time by the use of instruments, or by open force, or by any accident which could not be justly imputed to the magistrates or the jailor, Erskine holds that the magistrates were not liable, if they could prove that, immediately on the escape being discovered, they made all necessary search for the debtor; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 14. It follows that the magistrates were not liable if the escape had been effected by superior external force, but the onus probandi lay with the magistrates to prove such force, as well as their own vigilance, and their prompt pursuit of the debtor; Bell's Com. vol. iii. p. 551. By the act 2 and 3 Vict., c. 42, passed to improve prisons and prison discipline in Scotland, the magistrates are now relieved of all obligations respecting prisons and prisoners; and the funds authorized to be levied under the act, are declared not to be liable for the escape of prisoners, reserving action, however, against the jailor for any neglect on his part touching their custody. An attempt to break prison is a relevant point of dittay.

Breve; a word used in the old law language of Scotland, and also in the civil law, signifying a short compendious writ. Breve testatum is a writ or instrument subscribed by a notary public. See Skene, h. t. See Briefves.

Breve de morte antecessoris; the brieve of mortancestrie. It is from this ancient brieve that the modern law concerning the service of heirs is derived. See a full account of the more ancient form, which in all essential particulars resembles and illustrates the prevailing practice, in Skene, h. t. See also Service.

Breve de recto; the brieve of right was anciently used before the Justice-General on the decision of the ground-right and property of lands, and the reduction of infestments; transferred to the Lords of Council and Session as early as the period of the Regiam Majestatem. Skene, h. t.

Breve de nova dissasina; in the Regiam Majestatem this means the brieve or summons of ejection or spulzie. Skene, h. t.

Breve de divisio faciendis; the brieve of division. Skene, h. t.

Breve Testatum. The breve testatum was an acknowledgment in writing, which, by the ancient practice, was made out on the lands, at the time of giving possession to the vassal, and attested by the seals of the superior, and pares curie; afterwards the breve testatum was signed by the superior wherever he happened to be, and possession was given separately by the superior's baillie; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 17; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 757; Bell on Purchaser's Title, p. 3, 2d edit.; Ross's Lect. ii. 121, et seq.; Menzies on Conveyancing.

Breves Pleadable; are all such breves as are pursued and defended by an ordinary form of process before a competent judge, where there may be a pursuer and defender. Skene, h. t.

Brevi Mann; is an expression used to signify the performance of an act by a party on his own authority. Thus, for example, it was anciently the practice in Scotland for an heritable proprietor, on his own authority, to poind his tenant's moveables for payment of his rent, without applying to any other judge. The landlord, in like manner, exercised the power of brevi manu removal when his tenant refused to remove at the stipulated term. The practice of poinding or detaining cattle found trespassing seems to be a remainder of the brevi manu poinding. Brevi manu in the Roman law is usually applied to a kind of constructive delivery. A thing is said to be transferred by brevi manu tradition, when it has been previously in the buyer's possession on some other title, as pledge or loan. Some interesting historical details connected with this subject will be found in Ross's Lectures, vol. i. p. 385. See also Kames' Stat. Law abridg. h. t.; Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 367; ii. 28; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 719; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest, h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 510.

Brewing. Anciently the right of brewing was given by a license from the superior, and there was generally a clause in the charter cum brueriis. But neither this clause nor a license is now held to be necessary to entitle a feuar to brew for his own use. A person, however, with a right of barony may prevent a feuar or a stranger from importing and vending ale within the barony without his license. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 8; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 72; Bank. vol. i. p. 592; Brown's Synop. pp. 3, 371, 2356.

Bribery; is the offering or taking of a reward, unduly to influence the conduct of the person receiving it in the exercise of his duty. This is an offence of peculiar atrocity, when it extends to the administration of justice. The punishment of the crime, when committed by a Judge of the Court of Session, is infamy, loss of office, confiscation of moveables, and an arbitrary punishment in the prison; 1579, c. 93. And there are many enactments directed against inferior judges who may be guilty of this offence. See Hume, i. 407; Bank. vol. ii. p. 480; Bell's Princ. §§ 36, 37; Kames' Stat. Law abridg. h. t.; Macfarlane's Jury Practice, p. 156; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 235; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 311. As to bribery at parliamentary elections, see 17 and 18 Vict., c. 102; the "Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854." See also Election Law. Barathy.

Bribery Oath; an oath formerly required from any parliamentary elector when attending to vote in the election of a member of Parliament. If required on the part of a candidate, the polling Sheriff will put the oath or affirmation of bribery to any registered voter before he poll; 3 Will. IV. c. 65, § 26. It was in these terms:—"I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm if a Quaker), that I have not received or had, by myself, or any person for my use or benefit, any sum or sums of money, office, place, or employment, gift or reward, or any promise or security for any money, office, or gift, in order to give my vote at this election."

This oath is now abolished by the "Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," 17 and 18 Vict., c. 102, Schedule A. See Reform Act. Affirmation.

Brieve. A brieve is a writ issuing from Chancery, in the name of the king, addressed to a judge, ordering trial to be made by a jury of certain points stated in the brieve. These writs seem at one time to have been the foundation of almost all civil actions in Scotland (Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 2); but it is in the election of tutors to minors, the cognosing of lunatics or of idiots, and the ascertaining the widow's terce, and sometimes in dividing the property belonging to heirs-portioners, that brieves are now in use. The brieve of perambulation, which was in use long after the institution of the Court of Session, by which all questions relative to marches were settled, is now supplied by a declaratory action; and the apprising of land, which proceeded before a jury, was converted into an action before the Court by the summons of adjudication. (See Adjudication.) The brieve of inquest, till lately in use in all cases of service of heirs, was abolished by 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, and is now superseded by the petition of service. (See Service.) Bank. vol. ii. p. 554; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 4, 5th edit.; Bell's Prin.; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. i. p. 165, 2d edit.; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t.; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 278, et seq.; vol. iii. p. 1; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 94.

Brieve of Inquest.—The principal object of this brieve was to require the Judge to whom it was directed to ascertain, by a jury, whether the person who applied for it was heir to a person deceased. It was executed edictally by the officer or the Judge to whom it was directed; and fifteen days elapsed between the date of executing, or proclaiming the brieve, and the service. The jury was not summoned: it might be taken without any previous intimation, and consisted, in modern practice, of fifteen persons. The inquest being set, in presence of the Judge, the claim of the heir was presented along with the brieve and executions. The heir also produced the necessary evidence of those heads of the brieve which he was called on to prove. Having proved or verified his claim, the inquest or jury served the claimant heir in the particular claimed and proved; and their sentence was attested by the Judge, and retoured by the clerk of the Court to Chancery, from which an extract, properly authenticated, was obtained, termed an extract-retour of the service. The brieve remained in every case the same, excepting in the description of the character of heir; but the points or heads of the brieve were differently answered in the general and in the special service. A petition of service is now substituted for the brieve of inquest, and the former procedure is repealed by 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47 (1847). See Service.

Brieve of Tutory.—The object of this brieve is to serve the nearest agnate tutor-at-law. It is issued from Chancery in the king's name, and is directed to any Judge. The heads of it are, 1. Who is the next male agnate of the full age of twenty-five years, and entitled to succeed to the pupil on his death? 2. Whether the agnate be attentive to his own affairs? 3. Whether he be next in succession to the pupil, in the event of his death? 4. Who is the next cognate? The first of these heads only is inquired into. After the brieve is taken out of Chancery, it is executed, upon fifteen days' warning, at the market-cross of the head borough of the Judge's jurisdiction to whom it is directed, against all and sundry. After the service is returned, a letter of tutory is expedited under the quarter seal in favour of the tutor, and is his title to act. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 6; More's Notes, p. xlv.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 6; Bell's Princ. § 2079; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 303. See Tutor.

Briefes of Idiocy and Furiosity.—The forms of these two briefes are very much alike. They are directed to the judge-ordinary of the bounds within which the person to be cognosed resides, or to the Sheriff of Edinburgh, constituted a commissioner for that purpose as Sheriff in that part; and the jury are directed to inquire—1. Into the state of the person. 2. Who is the next male agnate on whom the office of curatory may be conferred? In the brieve of idiocy, the direction is, to inquire Whether the person be of an unsound mind, furious, and naturally an idiot? In the brieve of furiosity it is, Whether he be of an unsound mind, prodigal, and furious? viz., who has neither time nor measure in his expenses, but squanders his estate by profusion; "Qui neque tempus nec modum impensarum habet, sed bona dilacerando profundit." The verdict of the jury is returned to Chancery, and becomes the warrant for letters of curatory. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 7; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 49; Bell's Princ. § 2107; Brown's Synop. p. 949; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 308, et seq.

Brieve of Terce.—The object of this brieve is to cognosce the widow to her terce. It is directed to the Sheriff of the county where the lands lie; and the jury are directed to inquire—1. Whether the claimant was the lawful wife of the deceased? and this is presumed, if she was habit and repute his wife. 2. Whether the husband died infest in the lands? which is proved by production of the husband's sasines. This is not a retourable brieve. The sentence of the jury serves the widow to her terce; and it is the duty of the Judge to "ken" her to it, by dividing the lands between her and the heir. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 11; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. ii. p. 114; *Jurid. Brieve of Division amongst Heirs-Portioners.—An heir-portioner who wishes to separate her share of the lands to which she succeeds, from that belonging to another heir-portioner, must apply to Chancery for a brieve, directed to the Sheriff of the county in which the lands lie. This brieve is proclaimed at the market-cross, and also served upon the parties concerned; and, at the diet appointed, the rights and allegations of the parties being settled, the Judge remits to an inquest of fifteen persons to measure the land and make a division. The jury report to the Judge; and lots being cast for the different shares, the Judge decerns in the division, and ordains possession to follow in terms of it. An extract of the decree is held conclusive, and may be enforced by the authority of the Judge. This form is now but seldom resorted to, the parties, in general, settling the matter extrajudicially by arbitration, or otherwise by action de communi dividundo. *Jurid. British Statutes; are the statutes of the British Parliament. Formerly, all British statutes were held to be of the date of the first day of that session of Parliament in which they were made; but now, by 33 Geo. III., c. 13, it is enacted, that from and after April 8, 1793, the Clerk of Parliament shall endorse in English, on every act, the time when it receives the royal assent; which is declared to be the date of its commencement, unless another period of commencement be mentioned in the body of the act. Ersk. B. i. t. 1, § 37. See Assent Royal. Act of Parliament.

Brocage; is properly the hire or commission due to a broker for managing a transaction. Brocage contracts (as they are termed), by which a reward is stipulated for the promotion of a particular marriage, by means of influence to be exerted over one of the parties, are held to be contra bonos mores, and can afford no ground of action. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 302; Bank, i. 114.

Broccards; law maxims, founded on inveterate custom, or borrowed from the Roman law, and accounted part of our common law; such is the maxim, Jus superveniens auctori accrescit successori; and many others. Bank, i. 24. See Maxims.

Broccarii. In the ancient law language of Scotland, these are described as lockers, brokers, mediators, or intercessors in any transaction, paction, or contract, as in buying and selling, or in contracting marriage. In the civil law, they are called Proxenetæ. Skene, h. t.

Broker. A broker is a person who negotiates sales of goods and other mercantile transactions, as agent for another, for which he exacts a certain fee or reward from the party for whom he acts. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 599, et seq.; vol. ii. p. 120, et seq. 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 2d edit. § 89, 1451; Bell's Illust. § 1451; *Swint. Bubble Act. By the statute which went under this name, and which was passed in 1720, joint-stock companies were prohibited as prejudicial to the public; but there were difficulties attending the construction of the act, and it does not seem to have been observed. It was repealed in 1825. Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 399; Bell's Illust. ib.; Shaw's Digest, p. 325, § 18. See Joint-stock Companies.

Bull; a brief or mandate by the Pope. By 13 Eliz. c. 2, the procuring, using, or publishing bulls is declared to be high treason; and by 7 Anne, c. 21, §§ 1-3, the English treason laws are extended to Scotland. Ross's Lect. ii. 102.

Bullion; uncoined silver or gold. See Regulations of the Scots Parliament as to Bullion. Skene, h. t.

Burdens. In a general acceptation the word burden may signify any restriction, limitation, or encumbrance affecting either person or property. In the present article, however, the term is to be considered as applicable solely to burdens in money, imposed either on the receiver of a right or on the subject of the right itself, in the deed by which the right is constituted. Burdens in this sense are said to be either personal or real. Where the grantee is taken bound by acceptance of the right to pay a certain sum either to the granter or to a third party; but where there is no clause charging the subject conveyed with the sum, the burden is said to be personal; that is, it will be binding upon the receiver and his representatives, but will constitute no real incumbrance on the lands, or other subject conveyed, nor amount, indeed, to anything more than a mere personal obligation on the grantee. But where the right is expressly granted under the burden of a specific sum which is declared a burden on the lands themselves, or where the right is declared null if the sum be not paid, and where the amount of the sum and the name of the creditor in it can be discovered from the records by having entered the instrument of sasine, the burden is said to be real. Where the burden amounts to nothing more than a mere personal obligation on the receiver of the right, there can be little difficulty either as to the mode of constituting or of exercising it. But there are several points in regard to the constitution and effect of real burdens which deserve attention. In order to create a real burden, it is necessary, 1st, To declare the debt imposed, or to be imposed, to be a burden on the lands themselves. Where the burden is laid upon the disponée merely, and not upon the lands, even although the conveyance should bear expressly to be granted and accepted under that condition; or, although the condition should be appointed to be engrossed in the infeftments, the debt will form no real burden. But where the right is declared void in case the sum be not paid, it is held to be a real burden. 2*d*, The next essential is, that the debt be properly expressed as a burden on the lands, in the dispositive clause of the conveyance. This clause is the criterion for determining the character of the burden, and it is only in case of ambiguity in the dispositive clause, that other clauses, or particular expressions in the deed, will be admitted to explain the nature of the burden. 3*d*, In order to render the burden effectual against the creditors of the disponee, it must be expressed and incorporated in the sasine, so as to enter the record. A general reference in the sasine to the burdens as appearing in the disposition, or other conveyance, was at one time held sufficient; but a contrary rule has been established by more recent decisions. While the disponee remains uninfert, however, the burden, if properly expressed as a real burden, will be effectual against him and his creditors as a qualification of the personal right. Lastly, As no indefinite and unknown encumbrance can be created on land, it is necessary that, both in the disposition and in the sasine, the burden should be specific in its amount, and in the name of the creditor, in order that creditors contracting with the disponee may know the extent of the burden, and whether or not it has been paid or extinguished. A clause charging the lands disposed with the disponent's debts in general terms was formerly held sufficient to constitute the debts real burdens; but the contrary is now settled, although it need hardly be added, that such a clause lays the disponee, who accepts the right so qualified, under a personal obligation to pay the disponent's debts.

The terms in which a real burden may be imposed are various. Thus, the disponent may expressly burden the lands conveyed with a sum payable to himself,—or he may create a burden in favour of a third party,—or he may reserve either to himself, or delegate to a third party, a power or faculty, as it is termed, to impose a real burden on the lands. (See Faculty to burden.) And with regard to reserved burdens generally, it may be observed that the real security which they afford depends on the disponee's sasine. A distinction has been sometimes made between burdens reserved in favour of the disponent, and those created by him in favour of a third party; and it has been said, that, in the former case, the disponent's original infertment constitutes the security. But there seems to be no good ground for such a distinction. The right under the burden is not a right of property, but in security merely, depending for its existence on the existence of the debt. A general service has been held a sufficient title in the heir of the disponent to discharge such a burden; (Cuthbertson, 7th March 1806, Fac. Coll., Mor. App. title Service and Confirmation, No. 2); and the principle on which the security depends, applies equally to the case where the burden is reserved in favour of the disponent and to that in which a third party is made the creditor. In neither case is it necessary to complete the transference of the real security, as in the case of an heritable bond by sasine. It seems also now to be understood in practice, that a simple assignation intimated to the holder of the burdened infertment is a proper transference of the burden to the assignee; and although such assignations are frequently recorded in the register of sasines and reversions, there does not appear to be any ground for preferring an assignation so recorded to a first assignation duly intimated, although not recorded. Whether the burden be reserved in favour of the disponent, or of a third party, a general service transmits the burden to the heir of the creditor.

The creditor in a real burden may make his right effectual, 1*st*, By pointing of the ground (see Pointing of the Ground). 2*d*, By adjudication, without which the creditor has no means of entering into possession, and no title to pursue an action of mails and duties. Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 1. Although the burdened land have been sold to another, and although the purchaser be not personally liable for the debt, yet the creditor may adjudicate the lands to the extent of the burden. With regard to the ranking of debts secured by real burdens, the rules are, 1*st*, That if the burden is properly laid on the lands, the creditor in it is preferable to the creditors of the disponee, whether the disponee be infert or not. 2*d*, Where the creditor in the burden is a third party, he is preferable to all posterior debts of the disponent, from the date of the infertment in the disponee's favour; and this although the disponent may have given heritable securities to the posterior creditors; because no debt posterior to the disposition and infertment can compete with a debt made real by them. 3*d*, In a competition between the creditors of the disponent, who creates the real burden, the preference of the creditor in the burden will depend on the date of the disponee's sasine, seeing that the disponent is not fully divested, until the infertment of the disponee. 4*th*, In a competition between the creditor in the real burden, and the creditors of the disponee, the preference of the creditor in the burden will be complete, whether infertment has followed on the disposition or not; the burden being a qualification of the right, whether it remains personal, or is made real by infert-ment. 5th. In questions of preference amongst one another, on a shortcoming of funds, the creditors in real burdens will be preferable according to the date of the diligences which they have used to make the burdens effectual. The proper diligence to afford a title in such competition seems to be adjudication; and those burdens upon which adjudication has been used will be preferred to those which have not been adjudged for; Creditors of Ross, 30th June, 1714, Mor. p. 10243.

The creditor in a real burden may validly transfer it by assignation intimated to the debtor; and such an assignation of the personal claim of debt will carry with it the real burden as an accessory. In one case, the Court held that "the real burden or security not being followed by infeftment, nor capable of it, could be validly transferred by disposition and assignation duly intimated and recorded in the register of sasines." But although the recording of the assignation in the register of sasines is mentioned in that particular case, it does not appear to have been held essential; and certainly this is not a deed which the act 1617, c. 16, requires to be recorded in the register of sasines; Miller v. Brown, 7th March 1820, Ross's L. C. vol. iii., p. 29. The proper diligence for attaching the right of the creditor in the real burden seems to be adjudication. And when the burden is paid off, the proper evidence of its extinction is a discharge and renunciation by the creditor in the burden, recorded in the register of sasines, &c. Personal burdens, which resolve into mere personal obligations on the donee, may be validly conveyed by an intimated assignation, and the creditor's right in them may be attached by arrestment. See on the subject of this article, Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 54, et seq. and tit. 10, § 1; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 49, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 579; Bell's Com. i. 685, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 892, 915, 1767, 3d edit.; Shaw's Digest; Bell on Purchaser's Title, p. 93, et seq. 2d edit.; *Jurid. By the act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 48, real burdens need not be inserted in full in conveyances if they have already been set forth at full length in a recorded instrument of sasine or resignation ad remanentiam, in which case they may be referred to in the terms, or as nearly as may be in the terms, set forth in Schedule C annexed to the act. A similar provision is made in regard to lands held in burgage tenure, by the act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 49.

Burdens, Public. See Public Burdens.

Burdenseck; is the name given to the provision of our ancient law, by which it is said that a man was not punishable for the theft of as much meat as he could carry on his back; provided the theft was committed to satisfy the cravings of hunger. There is some difference amongst authorities both as to the justice of this rule and the extent of its application; and it is not now recognised in the law of Scotland. Hume, vol. i. p. 55; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.

Burgage-Holding; is that tenure by which the property in royal burghs is held under the Crown. It is originally constituted by a charter from the Crown in favour of the burgh; the effect of which is to make every proprietor of property situated within the burgh hold that property directly under the Crown as superior, for the reddendo (now merely nominal), of watching and warding; or, as it is commonly termed, "service of burgh, used and wont." The title of a donee to burgage property formerly proceeded on a resignation made by delivery of staff and baton (see Act of Sederunt, 11th February 1708), in the hands of the magistrates, in virtue of a procuratory granted by the vassal last infeft, and followed by an immediate infeftment given by the magistrates in favour of the donee, without the intervention of any precept or charter by progress. By the statute 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 49 (1847), it is now no longer necessary towards obtaining infeftment in lands held in burgage upon a disposition or other deed of conveyance, or upon a decree of adjudication or decree of sale, that the party in right of the conveyance or decree, or his procurator should appear before the provost or one of the bailies of the burgh, in which the lands are situated, and resign into his hands, or into the hands of the Crown, and for the provost or bailie to give sasine to such party or his procurator. Neither is it necessary for the party or his procurator to proceed to the ground of the lands, or to the council-chamber of the burgh, or to use any symbol of resignation or sasine; it being now competent to resign and obtain infeftment in the lands by presenting to the town-clerk of the burgh, being a notary public, the deed of conveyance or decree of adjudication, or of sale and other necessary warrants; and by the town-clerk giving sasine therein by subscribing and recording an instrument, expressed in the form given in the statute, or as nearly as may be in that form. Instruments of resignation or sasine expressed in such form may be recorded in the burgh register at any time during the life of the party in whose favour the instrument was expedited; and the date of presentment and entry set forth in the instrument is taken to be the date of the instrument; and in case of any error or defect in the instrument, it is competent to make, and record of new, another instrument, as if no previous one had been made or recorded. The title of an heir in burgage subjects is completed sometimes by a precept of clare constat and infeftment, but much more frequently by a single act, called a cognition and sasine; the magistrate appearing on the ground, and taking a proof of the heir's propinquity, and afterwards giving him infeftment as heir, under the usual salvo jure cujuslibet. The service and entry of heirs more burgi, in burghs, in tenements holden in burgage, is not altered by the act 10 and 11 Vict., cap. 49 (1849). An adjudging creditor is infeft at once in burgage property on producing his decree of adjudication. When the title is merely personal (i.e., an unexecuted procuratory of resignation), the disponee, heir, or adjudger, obtains right to it in the ordinary form used in similar cases, and infeftment is then given to him in the manner above explained. As these infeftments are of the nature of charters, and are the only evidence of the interposition of the superior, it is properly the duty of the town-clerk to expedite them; and this is enjoined by the act 1567, c. 27. And by 1661, c. 11, these sasines are ordained to be recorded within sixty days of their dates, in a particular register kept by the town-clerk for the burgh. The proper vassal in burgage-holding being the whole community, which, in a legal sense, never dies, the casualties of non-entry, relief, &c., are not known in this holding. There is no widow's terce due from burgage subjects. The nature of the holding also properly excludes subinfeudations, although a base infeftment in an annual rent out of burgage property, given by a bailie of the burgh, as bailie in that part, and the town-clerk, as a common notary, has been held effectual; Bennet, 5th July 1711, Mor. p. 6895. The Crown, in granting the charter of the burgh, cannot prejudice the rights of other superiors, so that it sometimes happens that property situated within the limits of the burgh is not held by this tenure; nor does property acquired by the burgh, subsequently to the date of the charter, fall under this holding, except by a new erection. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 38; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 38, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 561; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 680, 750, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 685, 838; Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 32, 4th edit; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, pp. 479, 490; Brown's Synop. pp. 373, 1039, 2363; Shaw's Digest, pp. 96, 591; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. ii. p. 110; Bell on Purchaser's Title, p. 131, et seq. 2d edit.; *Jurid. Burgess; is a member of the corporation of a burgh, admitted either by the charter of erection, or by birth, as being the son of a burgess, or by serving an apprenticeship to a burgess, or by marrying the daughter of a burgess, or by election by the magistrates of the burgh. The oath taken by a burgess on admission is to the following effect: "I confess and allow, with my heart, the true religion presently professed within this realm, &c. I shall be leal and true to our sovereign lord (or lady) the King's (or Queen's) Majesty, and to the provost and bailies of the burgh; I shall obey the officers thereof, fortify, maintain, and defend them in the execution of their offices with my body and goods; and I shall not colour unfreemen's goods under colour of my own: In all taxations, watchings, and wardings to be laid on the burgh, I shall willingly bear my part thereof, as I am commanded by the magistrates: I shall not purchase nor use exemptions to be free thereof, renouncing the benefit of the same for ever: I shall do nothing hurtful to the liberties and commonweal of the burgh: I shall give the best counsel I can, and conceal the counsel shown to me: I shall not consent to dispose the common goods of the burgh, but for a common cause and a common profit: I shall make concord where discord is, to the utmost of my power: In all lineations and neighbourhoods I shall give my leal and true judgment, bot prayer or reward." On making this oath, and paying the dues of admission, the burgess receives an extract of the act of his admission under the hand of the town-clerk. The heir of a burgess has a right to heirship moveables. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 17; B. i. tit. 4, § 20, et seq., notes by Mr Ivory; Bank. vol. i. p. 56; Shaw's Digest, pp. 99, 617; Ross's Lect. ii. 550.

Burgh Acres; are acres, or small patches of land, lying in the neighbourhood of royal burghs; usually feued out to, and occupied by, burgesses, or persons resident within the burgh. The statute 1695, c. 23, concerning runridge lands, excepts burgh and incorporate acres from the provisions of the act. It has been held that this exception relates only to the case of royal burghs, and not to burghs of barony or others; Douglass, 22d Jan. 1777, Brown's Sup. v. 581; Bell's Princ. § 1099. See Runridge.

Burgh, Royal. A royal burgh is a corporate body erected by a charter from the Crown. The corporation consists of the magistrates and burgesses of the territory erected into the burgh. The magistrates are generally a provost and bailies, dean of guild, treasurer, and common council. By stat. 1663, c. 6, the provost and bailies of royal burghs have power to value and sell ruinous houses when the proprietors refuse to rebuild or repair them; and many enactments are to be found in the acts of the Scotch Parliaments, regulating the trade in royal burghs, and defining the privileges of the magistrates and burgesses; see Kames' Stat. Law abridged, art. Burgh Royal. The criminal jurisdiction of magistrates of royal burghs is now very much limited. They may judge in petty riots; and Edinburgh, Stirling, Perth, and some other royal burghs, have, by their grants, a cumulative jurisdiction along with the sheriff in blood-wits. The eldest magistrate of every royal burgh has, since the Union, been named in all the commissions of the peace. The magistrates have right, with consent of the majority of the burgesses, to impose certain small taxations or duties on the inhabitants, for the use of the burgh; and they have also the power of proportioning some of the taxes imposed by Parliament; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 22, Mr Ivory's edit., note 104. A convention, composed of commissioners from each of the royal burghs, meets annually at Edinburgh, with power to make regulations for promoting the trade and commonweal of the burghs, and to inquire how their annual revenues have been applied. But the care of the revenues of royal burghs belongs properly to the Crown; and neither the convention, nor any private burgess, or number of burgesses, have any title to call the magistrates to account for their administration of the revenue of the burgh, or even, it would seem, to complain against special acts of mismanagement or peculation; Ersk. ib. § 23, Ivory's edit., note 105. There are sixty-six royal burghs in Scotland; and, by 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65, it is provided that twenty-three of the fifty-three representatives of Scotland in Parliament shall be returned by the royal burghs. For the provisions regulating these parliamentary elections, see Reform Act.

The right of appointing their successors formerly belonged to the old councils, in terms of the statute 1469, c. 5, by which it was also directed, that when the new council was chosen, the members of it, along with those of the old council, should choose all the office-bearers of the town, as aldermen, bailies, dean of guild, &c.; and that each craft should choose a person of the same craft to have a voice in the said election of office-bearers. This simple and uniform plan of election was not universally adopted; and from local influences, the sets of the burghs exhibited an almost endless variety in their details; agreeing, however, with scarcely an exception, in the principle of self-election. This diversity has now been put an end to, and the "close system," as it has been called, abolished by 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76, by which the election of councillors is rendered popular, and given to male residents in the burgh or its vicinity, possessing certain qualifications mentioned in the act. The particular provisions of this act are the following: Every one is entitled to vote in the election of councillors who has resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of June, within the royalty, or within seven miles of it, and who is, by 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65, qualified, in respect of the property or occupancy of premises within the burgh, to vote in the election of the member of Parliament. In such burghs as do not now send members to Parliament, property of the same value is required for the qualification, and claims for this privilege must be lodged with the town-clerk on or before the 21st July in a particular form given in schedule (A) appended to the act, which claims, and the objections to them, are disposed of in accordance with various regulations laid down in the act. The councillors are chosen from among the electors residing, or personally carrying on business within the royalty; and where there is a body of burgesses in the burgh, each councillor, before his induction, must be entered a burgess; but it is at present in contemplation to do away with this requisite. The number of councillors in each burgh is such as, by the sett existing at the passing of the act, constituted the common council, or, where this was variable, the smallest number constituting a full council. The electors of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Perth, Dunfermline, Dumfries, and Inverness, are divided into wards or districts. At the election (1833) immediately succeeding the passing of the act, each ward elected six councillors; but as every year the third part of the council goes out of office, in the order prescribed by the act, two councillors are now annually chosen by each ward, there being no bar, however, to the re-election of an outgoing councillor. The electors in burghs not contained in schedule (C) choose the whole council exactly as these wards do their proportion of it, and consequently elect each year a third part in place of that which has retired. Upon the third lawful day after the election succeeding the passing of the act, the councillors met and chose, by a plurality of voices, a provost, bailies, treasurer, and other office-bearers, as existing in the council by the sett or usage of the burgh; and vacancies occurring among such office-bearers, in consequence of the annual retirement of the third part of the council, are directed to be supplied from the councillors in like manner, as soon as the election of the new third has taken place, the first attending magistrate having a casting vote in cases of equality. Vacancies taking place during the year by death or resignation are supplied, ad interim, by the remaining members of the council, and the persons so elected by the councillors retire at the succeeding election. The rights of the guildry, trades, &c., to elect their own dean of guild, &c., are still preserved; but they are now no longer recognised as official or constituent members of the council, their functions being performed by a member of the council, elected by the majority of the councillors. In Aberdeen, Dundee, and Perth, however, the dean of guild, and in Edinburgh and Glasgow, the convener of trades and the dean of guild, are ex officio members of council; and the electors in all the above-named burghs choose such a number of councillors as, together with the officers, makes up the proper number above specified. No magistrate or councillor can be town-clerk. The magistrates and council possess the same powers of administration and jurisdiction as was enjoyed by the magistrates and town-council before the passing of the act; and none of them is responsible for the debts of the burgh, or the acts of his predecessors, otherwise than as a citizen or Burgess. The existing council in all burghs royal must every year make up, on or before the 15th of October, a state of their affairs, to be kept in the town-clerk's or treasurer's office.

In schedule (F) appended to the act, nine of the ancient royal burghs are enumerated, which, on account of the smallness of their population, are excepted from all the provisions of this act; and in which the election is conducted just as it was before the act was passed. These excepted burghs are Dornoch, New Galloway, Culross, Lochmaben, Bervie, Wester Anstruther, Kilrenny, Kinghorn, and Kintore. The election of magistrates and councillors for burghs which return or contribute to return members of Parliament, and are not royal burghs, is regulated by the act 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 77 (1833), and 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 86 (1834). The act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 26 (1853), provides for the supplying of vacancies in town-councils of burghs, consequent on null and irregular elections. The police of towns and populous places, and the paving, draining, cleaning, lighting, and improving the same, is regulated by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33 (1850); and the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 93 (1853), enables burghs to maintain and improve their harbours. The exclusive privilege of trading in burghs is abolished by the act 9 and 10 Vict., c. 17 (1846). Burgh of Barony and Burgh of Regality.

A burgh of barony, or a burgh of regality, is a corporation analogous to a royal burgh, consisting of the inhabitants of a determinate track of ground within the barony erected by the King, and subjected to the government of the magistrates. The right of electing magistrates is vested by the charter of erection sometimes in the baron or the lord of regality, the superior of the barony, and sometimes in the inhabitants themselves; and whatever jurisdiction belongs to the magistrates, the superior's jurisdiction is cumulative with it. The same rule holds in burghs of regality, both in regard to the manner of incorporating them, and as to the superior's cumulative jurisdiction. See Ersk., B. i. tit. 4, § 30, Mr Ivory's edit. note 108.

Burglary; is an English law term, signifying the breaking and entering the dwelling-house of another in the night-time with the intention to commit theft or any other felony, whether the felony be completed or not. See Tomlins' Law Dict.; Wharton's Lex.; Russell on Crimes; Hume, i. 102. See Housebreaking. Theft. Slouthrief.

Burlaw, Byrlaw. Burlaw laws are made and determined by consent of neighbours, chosen by common consent in the byrlaw courts. Hence byrlaw-men or birley-men, a species of rustic judges for determining disputes in their neighbourhood. This seems to have been a very ancient institution. Skene, h. t.

Bursary; is the name given to an endowment or exhibition in a Scotch university, for the support of a student. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 12; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. pp. 290, 482.

Burying-Place. The right to a burying-place in a parish churchyard, is a right of a peculiar description, which, in the ordinary case, is attached as part and pertinent of the lands of the several heritors in the parish. But there is no proper right in the solum of the churchyard, vested in the heritor using it as a family burying-place, entitling him to exclude the management and control of the whole heritors of the parish, to whom the entire churchyard belongs, in the same sense in which the area of the parish-church belongs to them. This general rule, however, even in rural parishes, is liable to exceptions; and in burghs the same sort of property in a burying-place, which is admitted as to church-seats, seems to be recognised; although the extent of the right of alienation does not appear to be distinctly ascertained. In Edinburgh, the right to special burying-places in the churchyards is recognised, and the right transferred by conveyances, which are recorded in the town-council or kirk-session records; and there can be no doubt, that where the magistrates of a town have acquired a piece of ground, whether adjacent to the churchyard or elsewhere, and have inclosed and laid it out as a burying-ground, the feu of a special allotment in this inclosure may be acquired, inherited, or transferred, as a burial-place, according to the ordinary rules of law, and always consistently with this special use of the subject. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 13; B. ii. tit. 2, § 8; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 836; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. ii. p. 375, 2d edit.; Dunlop's Parish Law, 26, 58, et seq.; and authorities there cited. See Churchyard.

Butchers. By the present practice butchers are not summoned to act as jurymen in criminal trials; Hume, vol. ii. p. 314. By the act 1703, c. 7, butchers are prohibited from possessing, on lease or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, more than one acre for the purpose of grazing cattle, &c. The object of this act seems to have been to prevent monopolies; but there is no evidence of its ever having been enforced. Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 144, 4th edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 179; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest, h. t.

Buying of Pleas. By the act 1594, c.

216, it is enacted, that it shall not be lawful for members of the College of Justice, or for any inferior judges, their deputies, clerks, or "advocates," directly or indirectly, by themselves, or others, for their behoof, to buy any lands, teinds, rowms or possessions, extended by judicial construction to all debateable rights, whether heritable or moveable, which are or have been in dependence and remain undecided. The penalty is loss of office, place, and privilege. The object appears to have been to prevent parties connected with the court from purchasing depending suits, and using their influence in the court in promoting their success: and hence it seems to be held that the purchaser of the plea must be a practitioner in the court before which it depends, otherwise he will not be affected by the statute. Although the act does not mention procurators before inferior courts, Mackenzie holds that the word "advocates" before these courts extends to procurators. Mackenzie's Observ. on Stat. p. 289; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 8, and tit. 14, § 2, and tit. 17, § 14; Kames' Equity, 335, 8th edit.; Menzies' Conveyancing, p. 51. See Pactum de quota litis.

Bye-Laws. Every corporation lawfully erected has power to make bye-laws or private statutes for the government of the corporation, which are binding on themselves, unless contrary to the laws of the land, or to the terms of their charter. In burghs, the town-council is now the only authority for making bye-laws. 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 76, § 90; Brown's Syn. p. 404; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Calendar. The statute altering the calendar, and introducing what was called the new style, is 24 Geo. II., c. 23, which enacted, that from and after 31st December 1751, 1st January, and not 25th March, shall be reckoned the first day of the year; as also, that the day after 2d September 1752 should be reckoned 14th September. The statute provides for all the other changes connected with the alteration in the calendar. A calendar month consists of thirty or thirty-one days, except February, which has twenty-eight, and in leap-years twenty-nine days. See Suint. Abridg. h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Call, Ecclesiastical. After a clergyman has received a presentation to a living, and has preached his trial sermons, a day is fixed, within six weeks, for moderating in his call; notice being given from the pulpit at least ten free days before the day appointed, and not later than the second Sabbath after the meeting of presbytery. On that day, after sermon, the people are informed of the presentation which has been lodged, and are invited to subscribe a written call to the presentee to be their minister. The admission of ministers to benefices is now regulated by the act 6 and 7 Vict., c. 61 (1843). Upon a presentation to a benefice being laid before the presbytery of the bounds, they appoint the presentee to preach in the parish church, and thereafter they meet, and, after due notice, receive such reasons or objections against the presentation which do not infer matter of charge against him requiring to be prosecuted according to the forms and discipline of the Church. The Reasons and Objections so received are determined judicially by the presbytery, or are referred by them to the superior judicatory of the Church for decision as they may see cause. In either case the presentee and all parties having interest are heard on the objections and reasons; and in cognosing and determining on the same judicially, the presbytery or other judicatory must have regard only to such objections and reasons as are personal to the presentee in regard to his ministerial gifts and qualities, either in general or with respect to the particular parish to which he has been presented. They are entitled, however, to have regard to the whole circumstances and conditions of the parish, to the spiritual welfare and edification of the people, and to the character and number of the persons by whom the objections and reasons have been preferred. If the presbytery or other judicatory shall decide that the objections or reasons, or any of them, are well founded, and that, in respect thereof, the presentee is not a qualified and suitable person for the functions of the ministry in that particular parish, and ought not to be settled in the same, they pronounce a deliverance to that effect,—setting forth and specifying in the deliverance the special ground or grounds on which it is founded, and in respect of which they find the presentee not qualified for the charge. In this event the presbytery must intimate the deliverance to the patron, who is then entitled to issue another presentation within six months after the date of such deliverance, if no appeal is taken to a superior judicatory of the Church; but if such appeal is taken, then within six months after the date of the judgment of the superior judicatory, affirming the deliverance of the inferior judicatory, and dismissing the appeal. If the reasons or objections are not sustained by the presbytery, they proceed to the trial of the presentee, and admit him, if found qualified for the ministry of that parish. A presentee cannot be rejected upon the ground of any mere dissent or dislike expressed by any part of the congregation of the parish to which he is presented, and which dissent or dislike is not founded upon objections or reasons to be fully cognosed, judged of, and determined judicially by the presbytery or other judicatory of the Church. It is in the power of the presentee, patron, or objectors to appeal from any deliverance of a presbytery to the superior judicatories of the Church.

Calling of a Summons. After a summons has been executed, and the diet of appearance has arrived, the first step taken by the pursuer in order to bring the case into Court is to call the summons. In the Court of Session this was formerly done by the clerks of Court reading over the names of the pursuer and defender from a partibus written on the margin of the summons. This duty was performed every Thursday and Saturday morning during the sitting of the Court, and on each of the nine last sederunt-days of the summer and winter sessions; and appearance was made for the defender, by the clerk of the counsel who was to act for him appearing at this calling, and stating the names of the defender's counsel and agent, which were marked upon the margin of the summons by the clerk of Court. The summons thus marked was then given by the pursuer's agent to the agent for the defender to prepare defences. At the expiration of six days it was necessary to return it, and the cause was then enrolled in the Ordinary Action Roll, and debated and disposed of according to the former practice. If no appearance was made for the defender at these callings, the cause was enrolled in the Regulation Roll; and if, when it came to be called before the Lord Ordinary in the course of that roll, the defender still failed to appear, decree in absence was pronounced.

By Act of Sederunt, 11th March, 1820, these callings before the Clerks of Court were abolished, and calling lists substituted, containing the names of the pursuer and defender, and of the pursuer's counsel and agent, as in the partibus; which lists were thereby appointed to remain exhibited on the walls of the Outer-House during the forenoon of the calling days, so as to admit of the defender's agent entering appearance for him at the clerk's office in the course of the evening. In addition to being thus exhibited on the walls, these lists are now printed for circulation among practitioners, so that full intimation is given to all concerned. When appearance is entered for a defender, it is done by his agent going to the Clerk's office in the evening of the calling day, or of the day following, and getting the name of the defender's counsel and agent marked on the partibus, and borrowing the summons and productions, in order to prepare defences. The calling day in time of session is Thursday, except during the last nine days of the winter session, and the last seven days of the summer session, when a calling list is daily exhibited; and if appearance be not entered for the defender, the summons is returned to the pursuer's agent, with a marking that the defender is absent; upon which the summons may be enrolled in the roll of undefended causes; and decree in absence will ensue. No defences can be received after this, except of consent, or by reclaiming note to the Inner-House after decree in absence has been pronounced (See Regulation Roll. Decree. Reponing.) If appearance be entered, the defender (except in summonses of cessio) is allowed thirteen days to prepare his defences, counting from the calling day; and if these thirteen days expire during vacation or recess, the defences are not required until the box-day. There are many minute regulations about the partibus, and the productions to be made with the summons; the fee-funding, without which it cannot be called; the printing of the Summons in certain cases, and the like, as to which, see for the older practice, Ivory's Form of Process, i. 425, et seq., and A. S. 11th March 1820; and for the present practice, 50 Geo. III., c. 112, § 20; A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 31, 32; A. S. 8th July 1831; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36; Shand's Prac. 264, et seq.

In the inferior courts the calling was formerly made by the clerk reading the partibus in court, and marking appearance for the defender, where appearance was entered; failing which decree in absence was then pronounced. This procedure is now superseded by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, which enacts in § 3, that where a defender in the Sheriff-court intends to state a defence, he must enter appearance by lodging with the sheriff-clerk, at latest on the day of compearance, a notice in the form printed in a schedule. On the first court-day thereafter, or on any other court-day to which the diet may be adjourned, not being later than eight days thereafter, the sheriff must hear the parties; and for this purpose the pursuer's procurator must enrol the cause for the first court-day after the day of compearance. Where no appearance has been entered, the Sheriff may, at any court held after the day of compearance, give decree in terms of the summons, which decree is declared (§ 2) to be in all respects equivalent to a decree in absence obtained under the previously existing forms. See Stair, B. iv., tit. 2, § 2; tit. 38, § 2; Hume, ii. 263; Jurid. Styles, iii. 973; M'Glashan's Sher. Court Prac. 194. See also Partibus. Protestation.

A summons may be thus called on the day of compearance; and where the last day of the legal inducia of any summons, suspension, or advocacy, is not a sederunt day, the day of compearance was fixed, by A. S. 8th July 1831, § 3, to be the first sederunt-day thereafter. Now, in terms of 2 and 3 Vict., c. 36, and relative Act of Sederunt, 8th August 1839, summonses may be called at either of the box-days in the autumn vacation, the defences being returned at the second box-day, or on the meeting of the Court in November respectively; and the act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 54, authorizes the Court to make regulations for allowing summonses and notes of suspension, advocacy, &c., to be called at any box-day in vacation or recess, and making defences returnable at such box-days, or on the meeting of the Lords Ordinary, or of the Court, after vacation or recess. (See Box-day.) In the case of a summons, the instance falls unless it is executed within year and day of its signeting, and called within year and day of the day of compearance; A. S. 8th July 1831. If by mistake a summons has been prematurely called, the proceedings which have followed such erroneous calling may be held pro non scriptis, and the summons may be called of new at the proper time. The calling being held as a judicial step, a summons once called, though not enrolled, if not taken out of court by protestation, may be wakened at any time within forty years; and it would also appear that the calling renders the subject in dispute litigious in those actions in which a mere citation has not that effect. Shand's Prac., p. 276, and authorities there cited; 2 Bell's Com. 153. See Litigiosity. Citation. Diet.

Calling of a Suspension or Advocacy.

Previous to the statute of 1838, the calling of letters of suspension or advocacy was in all respects analogous to the calling of a summons. But in suspensions, where the charger had made appearance in the Bill-Chamber, or where intimation of the bill or sist had been made to him by a notary or messenger-at-arms, and a certificate or execution returned; and in all advocations where the respondent had made appearance in the Bill-Chamber, or where intimation of the presenting or passing of the bill had been made to the respondent or his agent in the inferior court, the suspender or advocator was entitled, at the expiry of ten days after the passing of the bill, to call and insist in the letters of advocacy or suspension without executing them; the charger or respondent being entitled, at the end of six days after the lapse of the period allowed for expeding the letters, to put up protestation in order to force on the discussion of the expedite letters, whether executed or not. All letters of suspension or advocacy not executed, or, where execution was unnecessary, not called, within year and day of the date of signeting, or though duly executed within that period, if not called within year and day of the day of compearance, fell asleep; but the instance did not fall as in the case of a summons; and it was competent, without a wakening, to revive the proceedings in a bill of advocacy or suspension which had lain over, by a written note to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, duly intimated fifteen days at least before presenting such note. See A. S. 8th July 1831; Stair, B. iv., tit. 52, 35, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit., vol. iii. pp. 980-4.

Since 31st December 1838, the calling of advocations and suspensions has been regulated by the act 1 and 2 Vict., c. 86, and relative Act of Sederunt, 24th Dec. 1838, superseding the use of bills and letters of suspension or advocacy, and substituting a short note, presented, except in the case of advocations of final judgments, in the Bill-Chamber. The note of advocacy of a final judgment must be lodged with one of the depute-clerks of the Court of Session, or his assistant. The lodging of the note must then be intimated to the opposite party by delivering a copy to him or his known agent; and within fifteen days after the date of the intimation it is competent to call, and thereafter to enrol, the cause in the weekly printed roll, when it proceeds in the same manner as expedite letters of advocacy did formerly (§ 1). In advocations of interlocutory judgments the written note, which must in this case have articulate reasons of advocacy annexed, is lodged in the Bill-Chamber, and forthwith laid before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills. If he pass it, the cause may, after the expiry of fifteen days from the passing, be called, and thereafter enrolled (§ 3). A decree in foro of an inferior court, and any diligence thereon, is now suspended by lodging in the Bill-Chamber a written note of suspension, the presentment of which being certified, operates as an interim sist of diligence. On the requisite caution being found, the note is forthwith passed. The note and interlocutor passing it must be served on the opposite party by a messenger; and after the expiry of fifteen days from the date of service it is competent to call, and thereafter to enrol, the cause (§ 4). In suspensions without caution, or on juratory caution, and of decrees of removing, an articulate statement of facts must be annexed to the note; and if the note is passed, the same procedure takes place as is provided in advocations of interlocutory judgments (§ 4). A decree in absence of the Court of Session is suspended by lodging in the Bill-Chamber a note, as above, which, upon consignation of the expenses decreed for, is passed. The note and interlocutor passing it must be served on the opposite party by a messenger; and fifteen days thereafter the cause may be called, and thereafter enrolled (§ 5). All suspensions and interdicts, and advocations or suspensions not specially provided for, are brought by lodging a note in the Bill-Chamber, as above, with an articulate statement of facts annexed. It is forthwith laid before the Lord Ordinary, who pronounces upon it; and the note and order, or interlocutor upon it, must be served upon the opposite party by a messenger. If the note is passed, the same procedure takes place as in advocations of interlocutory judgment (§ 6). The respondent or charger, in all notes of advocacy or suspension, may put up protestation after the expiry of fifteen days after the interlocutor passing the note shall have taken effect. A. S. § 12. See Suspension. Advocation. Protestation. Wakening.

Calumny, Oath of. The act 1429, c. 125, in order to prevent calumnious and unnecessary suits, ordains both parties, at the beginning of a cause, to swear, either by themselves or their counsel, that the facts set forth by them are true. This oath of calumny, as it is termed, was in practice never put, unless the adverse party required it; and, when made, it was held as an oath of credulity or opinion merely. The party putting it was not thereby understood to renounce all other probation; and the consequence of a party deponing against his allegations was to exclude him from insisting in them. A party was not bound to give oath upon each allegation separately, but only upon the whole generally and collectively. The practice of making counsel emit an oath of calumny became obsolete. The terms of the oath are prescribed in the Act of Sederunt, 13th Jan. 1692. Oaths of calumny have been little in use since the Act of Sederunt 1st Feb. 1715, by which it is provided (§ 6), that a party or his counsel may be called upon to confess or deny (but not on oath) any relevant matter of fact founded upon by him; and if he shall deny what shall afterwards be proved to have been known to him, he shall be found liable, without modification, to all the expenses to which his opponent shall have been put by such calumnious denial (see Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 16); and such oaths have fallen still more into desuetude under the modern system of records and judicial examinations, and are now very rare in practice, at least in those cases in which a party may examine his opponent as a witness. See Dickson on Evidence, p. 776; and the case of Paul v. Laings, 7th March 1855, 17 D. 604, where there was a great deal of discussion, whether this oath (in causes not consistorial) still exists in the law of Scotland. An oath of calumny, however, in order to guard against collusion between spouses, is always put to the pursuer in actions of divorce, and of declarator of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotency. See opinions of the Court in the case of Paul sup. cit.; 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., c. 69 § 36; Dickson on Evidence, p. 779. See also Divorce.

In the inferior courts the oath may be put, but only on consignment of a sum, not exceeding 40s. and not under 5s., to be fixed by the inferior judge, and, if he see cause, to be forfeited to the other party, in case the oath is passed from, or is negatived, over and above the party's travelling charges, and the expenses occasioned by the oath; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; A. S. 1839, § 92. In the same Acts of Sederunt for regulating the inferior courts, there is an analogous provision, whereby the inferior judge is empowered, at any stage of the cause, to order the parties, or either of them (not on oath, however), to confess or deny such facts, or to answer such pertinent interrogations as the sheriff or commissioner shall put; and on failure, to be held as confessed, without prejudice to his being reponed on cause shown; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825; A. S. 1839, §§ 66, 67. See Shand's Prac. p. 385, 421, 433; McGlashan's Sher. Court Prac. 326. A false oath of calumny will not subject the maker of it to a prosecution for the crime of perjury. Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 15, et seq.; Mr Mor's Notes, pp. cccxcv., ccccxvi.; *Ersk. Candidate. In parliamentary election law, a candidate is a person offering himself, or put in nomination, for the suffrages of the electors. By the Scotch Reform Act, halls, rooms, booths, or other places hired, constructed or prepared for taking polls, are so, by contract with the candidates, or if they cannot agree, then at their joint expense; the expense at any one polling-place in a county not to exceed L.30, and in a burgh L.20. The candidates are farther bound to pay a guinea a-day to each poll clerk, and a fee not exceeding three guineas a-day to each polling sheriff. Where a poll has been demanded, the candidates are also bound to defray the necessary expense incurred by sheriffs, or sheriff-clerks, or town-clerks, in the transmission of precepts, intimations, poll-books, or other communications required by the act; the proposer to be liable, if the candidate has been proposed without his own consent; 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 65, § 40. On the requisition of any candidate, the booths, &c., at each polling-place may be divided (Stat. § 27); the candidate or elector requiring such division to pay the expenses therewith connected; 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 78. See Reform Acts. See also Bribery Act, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 102.

Canon-Law. This law consists of the decretum, a collection made after the middle of the 12th century, drawn from the opinions of the Fathers and Popes, and from church councils, in imitation of the Roman Pandects,—of the decretalia collected from the Epistles of the Popes. Stair, B. i. tit. 14; Ross's Lect. i. 9.

Capias; in English law, a term applied to certain writs, from the occurrence of the word (capias) in the ancient Latin forms. Capias ad respondendum, is a judicial writ, by which all actions not relating to land or real property are commenced against any one not in custody whom it is intended to arrest or hold to bail. Capias ad satisfaciendum, usually called a ca sa, is a writ of execution to imprison the person of the defendant, after judgment has been pronounced against him, until he make satisfaction to his creditor. Capias utlagatum, is a writ against a person outlawed. Tomlin's Dict. h. t.; Ross's Lect. i. 244, et seq.

Capita, succession per; in contradistinction to succession per stirpes, is when each individual succeeds in his own right, and the right of representation is excluded. See Succession Stirpes.

Capital Punishment. The following recent statutes have been enacted, restricting the punishment of death:—4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 67; 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 81; 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict., c. 84 and 91. By these acts capital punishment is abolished throughout the kingdom, in cases of returning from transportation, letter stealing, sacrilege, and forgery; and in England and Ireland in cases of riot, rescue of murderers, seduction of soldiers or sailors, the administering of unlawful oaths, breaking of prison, slave-trade, and smuggling. See these several articles.

Capitis Diminutio; in the Roman law, signifies a loss or change of status. It was of three kinds, answering to the three kinds of status which might be lost. Minima was a simple change in the individual's situation in reference to family, as from being sui juris to alieni, or from alieni juris to sui. Media was a loss of civil rights, while that of liberty was retained. Maxima was a loss of both civil rights and liberty.

Caption. A caption is a warrant for the apprehension of the person of a debtor or obligant, on account of the non-payment of a debt, or the non-performance of an obligation. With the exception of the act of warding (see Act of Warding), which can be excuted within burgh only, the caption was, strictly speaking, till lately, the only civil warrant recognised in law for the above purpose. The fiction on which the apprehension under a caption proceeds is, that the debtor in the obligation having refused obedience to the Sovereign's letters, charging him to pay or perform, is imprisoned as a rebel. A caption is a writ which passes the signet, and which is prepared by a writer to the signet. It proceeds in the Sovereign's name, and is addressed, like all other signet letters, to messengers-at-arms, as sheriffs in that part, commanding them to charge sheriffs, magistrates, and messengers, within three days after the charge, to apprehend the person against whom the caption is directed, and to imprison him until he fulfil the charge in the letters of horning which he has disobeyed. In practice, however, the charge to sheriffs, &c., is never given, unless (which will seldom happen) they refuse to assist the messenger in the execution of his duty; and, by long-established custom, the messenger, on receiving possession of the caption, may, and does, apprehend and incarcerate the person against whom it is directed de plano, and without the necessity of adopting the form which its style apparently requires. In apprehending the debtor, the messenger is entitled, of course, when he may need it, to demand the assistance of the civil authorities; and, under the terms of the caption, he has unlimited power to open doors and lockfast places in search of the person of the debtor. A caption must proceed on proper evidence of the failure to pay or implement; and this evidence consists in the exhibition at the Bill-Chamber of letters of horning against the debtor, executed, denounced, and recorded (see Horning, Denunciation), along with a bill praying for letters of caption. The Bill-Chamber clerk, on being satisfied with the evidence produced to him, grants a deliverance on the bill, which is the warrant to the keeper of the signet to impress the signet on the caption.

The caption, though still competent, has been practically superseded by the forms contained in the Personal Diligence Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, which makes it competent to insert in extract decrees of the Court of Session, Justiciary, and of the Teind-Court, and also in decrees of registration, a warrant to charge the debtor or obligant to pay the debt, or perform the obligation, within the days of charge, under pain of poinding and imprisonment; and to arrest and poind, and for that purpose to open shut and lockfast places (§ 1). Within year and day after the charge has expired, the execution is recorded in the general register of hornings, such registration being declared to have the same effect as denunciation in virtue of letters of horning, and recording of these letters along with the execution of charge and denunciation (§ 5). The keeper of the register thereupon gives a certificate of registration of the execution; and thereafter a warrant of imprisonment can be obtained by presenting in the Bill-Chamber, along with the extract, execution, and certificate, a minute (indorsed on the extract) in terms of the schedule subjoined to the act. This is signed by a writer to the signet, and craves warrant to apprehend and imprison, and, if necessary for the purpose of such apprehension, to open shut and lockfast places; and warrant also to magistrates and keepers of prisons to receive and detain the debtor or obligant. Upon the extract the Bill-Chamber clerk writes his fiat, dating and subscribing it; and then such extract and deliverance can be used for the same purpose, and impose the same obligations upon magistrates and keepers of prisons, as if letters of caption had been issued under the signet (§ 6). The same act extends to sheriffs the power of imprisonment for civil debt; the sheriff-clerk, in the case of imprisonment following upon the decree of a sheriff, being, by § 11, empowered to issue warrant therefor in similar terms to that granted in the Bill-Chamber, which warrant is also declared to have the same effect as letters of caption issued under the signet. By § 33 of the Court of Exchequer Act, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, it is competent for the sheriff to cause extracts of decrees for debts due to the Crown, and execution of charge thereon, to be presented to the sheriff-clerk of the county where the charge was given, and the sheriff-clerk is to record the execution in the register of hornings, such registration being declared to have the same effect as the registration of any expired charge given in terms of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114. The sheriff-clerk then indorses a certificate of registration; and it is thereafter competent for the sheriff to issue his warrant of imprisonment, which must be in terms of a schedule annexed to the act (§ 34). No minute is necessary, such as is required by the Personal Diligence Act. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 13; Mr More's Notes, p. cccxxx; *Ersk. Caption Process. A process caption is a summary warrant of incarceration, granted on the application of the clerk of court, for the purpose of forcing back a process which has been unduly and contumaciously retained by the party whose receipt stands for it in the court books. In the Court of Session these warrants, which may be executed by macers or messengers-at-arms, are issued by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, on the application of the clerk to the process. They are directed against the agent and his clerk whose receipt stands for the process, and authorize their incarceration and detention until it is returned. The application is usually made at the request of the opposite party, who, at the time must be entitled to force back the process from his antagonist; and as this compulsitor is understood to rest on a presumed contempt of court, so it would seem that it is not the appropriate remedy where the process has been actually lost, or where, from some other inevitable accident, it cannot be returned. In such cases, the remedy is an action of damages at the instance of the party prejudiced against the party by whose fault or negligence the process has gone amissing. Where an attempt is made to enforce a process caption under such circumstances, relief may be applied for by note of suspension. In the inferior courts process captions are issued by the inferior judge, on the application of the clerk of court. In many inferior courts, however, an order of court, making it imperative on a procurator to return the process under an award, has in most cases superseded recourse to a caption; Barclay's Sher. Court Prac. p. 331; Barclay's Justice of Peace, h. t. See also A.S. 11th July 1823, §§ 34, 104; A.S. 10th July 1839, § 159; Pagan v. Horsburgh, 1835, 13 S. 471.

Captive. All actions against a prisoner taken by the enemy stop till his return; but execution by horning may proceed against him. A ransomed hostage is entitled to the wages during his captivity which he would have been receiving on board ship; and even a sailor who receives no wages is entitled to a sum as solatium. The owners of the ship are bound in every case to procure the immediate release of a hostage, and indemnify him for his losses. Brown's Syn. h. t.

Capture. The jurisdiction in all matters relative to prize and capture in war, and the condemnation of ships, is now exclusively vested in the High Court of Admiralty of England. The principles of capture were, that two powers at war had a right to make prizes of the ships, goods, and effects of each other upon the high seas. The goods of an enemy on board the ship of a friend might be taken. The goods of a friend on board the ship of an enemy ought to be restored. Contraband goods going to the enemy, though the property of a friend, might be taken. Stair, B. ii. t. 2. In Mr More's Notes, p. ciii., will be found cited a number of authorities upon this point, and a view of the principles of reprisals, extracted from the Report of Sir George Lee.

On the 28th of March 1854 war was declared against Russia, and the London Gazette of that date contained a declaration stating that it was impossible for Her Majesty to forego the exercise of her right of seizing articles contraband of war, and of preventing neutrals from bearing the enemy's despatches, and that she must maintain the right of a belligerent to prevent neutrals from breaking any effectual blockade which might be established with an adequate force against the enemy's forts, harbours, and coasts, but that Her Majesty would waive the right of seizing enemy's property laden on board a neutral vessel unless it be contraband of war. The declaration further stated, that it was not Her Majesty's intention to claim the confiscation of neutral property not being contraband of war found on board enemy's ships, and that being anxious to lessen as much as possible the evils of war, and to restrict its operations to the regularly organized forces of the country, it was not Her Majesty's present intention to issue letters of marque for the commissioning of privateers. The right of seizing enemy's property on board a neutral vessel had always before been uniformly maintained by England. The Treaty for the re-establishment of Peace was signed on March 30, 1856. After the Treaty was signed, additional conferences were held at Paris by the plenipotentiaries of the different countries, and at the meeting of April 14, 1856, they adopted the following declaration:—"1. Privateering is and remains abolished. 2. A neutral flag covers an enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war. 3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag. 4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effectual,—that is to say, maintained by force sufficient to prevent effectually access to the coast of the enemy." This declaration was adopted on the consideration "that maritime law in time of war had long been the subject of deplorable disputes, and that the uncertainty of the law, and of the duties in such a matter, gave rise to differences of opinion between neutrals and belligerents which might occasion serious difficulties and even conflicts."

Carrier; a person who holds himself out to the public as willing to undertake for hire the conveyance of goods from one place to another. The Roman edict, Nautæ, cauponæ, stabularii, which imposed a liability on shipmasters, innkeepers, and stablers, for goods intrusted to them, may be considered as part of the common law of Scotland; and the principle of the edict has been extended to the case of carriers by land as well as by water. No distinction will be made on account of the description of vehicle employed; and the owners, whether of waggons, carts, mail-coaches, or stage-coaches, will be liable to make good any losses happening to the goods while in their custody, and until they are delivered agreeably to their address; the rule, founded on considerations of public policy, being, that a person who holds himself out as willing to perform, for hire, this sort of service, thereby incurs an universal responsibility. Such persons are liable to the fullest extent for their servants and others employed by them. The carrier's engagement, however, is not understood to bind him to deliver the goods beyond the place to which he plies, unless he undertakes to do so; and, at common law, he is not responsible for losses arising from the act of God, or of the King's enemies. See Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 5; Mr More's Notes, p. lvii; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 29; and Bell's Com. i. p. 203, 445. 461, et seq.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. arts. 158, et seq. 235, 369; Bligh's Appeal Cases, i. 580; Brown on Sale, pp. 367, 467, 493, 542; Brown's Synop. pp. 1411, 1521; Shaw's Digest; *Jurid. The act 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., cap. 68 (1830), was passed for the more effectual protection of mail-contractors, stage-coach proprietors, and other common carriers for hire, against the loss of or injury to parcels or packages delivered to them for conveyance or custody, the value and contents of which had not been declared to them by the owners. By this act common carriers are not liable for the loss of gold and silver coin, or gold or silver in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, precious stones, jewellery, bank-notes, &c., &c., above the value of £10, unless their nature and value is declared when delivered, and an increased charge accepted by the owner. See act for its various provisions. The act 17 and 18 Vict., c. 31 (1854), provides for the better regulation of the traffic on railways and canals. By this act a railway or canal company is declared to be liable for neglect or default in the carriage of goods, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made by the company to the contrary, or anywise limiting their liability. A company, however, is not to be liable for loss of or injury to a horse beyond £50, or for any neat cattle beyond £15 per head, or for any sheep or pigs beyond £2 per head, unless the value is declared, and extra payment made. The proof of the value of the animals, articles, or goods lost or injured, lies on the person claiming compensation. No special contract between a company and other party is binding unless the same be signed by such party, or the person delivering the articles for carriage.

Cases. In the Court of Session a case is a written argument on the merits of a cause. According to the judicature act, the case must commence with a copy of the closed record; and each ground of law, or plea stated in the record, must be separately argued in the case; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 22; but this regulation has not been strictly observed in practice. Cases could formerly be ordered either by the Lord Ordinary, or by the Inner-House; and in practice they usually were ordered in all causes of intricacy or difficulty. Now it is no longer competent to a Lord Ordinary to direct cases, or minutes of debate, or other written argument, to be prepared by the parties, whether for the use of himself or of the Inner-House; but he may, at any time after hearing parties on a closed record, take such cause on report to the Inner-House without cases or minutes of debate; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 14. The interlocutor making the order for cases appoints the mutual cases to be lodged, interchanged, revised, and re-lodged within a certain limited time. The cause must be argued in the case strictly as it appears in the closed record; and if facts not set forth in the record are founded on in the argument, the case will be ordered to be withdrawn, and a proper one lodged. The cases are printed and boxed to the Court in the usual way. See 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, §§ 16, 22; A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 62, 63, 64, 107, 65; Shand's Prac. pp. 339, et seq., and 960. Casualties of Superiority. The casualties of superiority are certain emoluments arising to the superior, which, as they depend on uncertain events, are termed casualties. The casualties proper to ward-holding, while it subsisted, were Ward, Recognition, and Marriage (see these titles, also Ward-holding). The casualties common to all holdings are Non-entry, Relief, Disclamation, Purpresture, and Liferent weekat. (See these titles.) The superior is secured in his duties and casualties by his own charter and sasine. They form a debitum fundi preferable to the vassal's creditors, and may be made effectual by poinding of the ground. They form also a personal claim against the vassal. This preference is not confined to arrears or current feu-duties, but extends to non-entry and relief duties, and to the composition for singular successors. Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 1, et seq.; *Ersk. Casus Amissionis. In an action for proving the tenor of a deed or other writing which has been lost, it is necessary to condescend upon the particular accident by which the document was lost or destroyed, or at least to give some satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the loss has happened. In technical language this accident is termed the casus amissionis. The general rules as to the necessity of libelling and proving the casus amissionis are the following:—When the writ is such, that, upon payment or satisfaction, the debtor is usually content with its re-delivery, e.g., a bill or promissory note, a special casus amissionis must be clearly established. But where, on the other hand, the writ is not of a mere temporary nature, but intended for preservation, as a right to lands, or where it is usual to take a separate discharge of an obligation, the Court will sustain a more general statement of the casus amissionis; see Walker v. Block, 1852, 14 D. 362; Dickson on Evidence, p. 653; Stair, B. iv. tit. 32, § 4, et seq.; Mr More's Notes, p. cccxxxvi.; Bankton, iv. 29; Shand's Practice, p. 832. Catholic Creditor. A catholic or universal creditor is a creditor whose debt is secured over several subjects, or over the whole subjects belonging to his debtor; as, for example, one who has heritable securities over two or more estates for the same debt. Such a creditor is bound to claim his debt according to certain equitable rules, and is not entitled to exercise his right so as to injure unnecessarily the claims of secondary creditors. Thus, if, as he may, he draw his whole debt from one of the subjects, he must assign his security to the secondary creditors on the subject from which he has drawn payment, to the effect of enabling them to draw a proportional part of the debt from the other subjects over which the catholic security extended. But where a catholic creditor, secured over two estates, on each of which there is a secondary security, has bona fide purchased, or otherwise acquired, right to one of these secondary securities, it is held (although the soundness of the opinion has been doubted) that the catholic creditor, in these circumstances, is not bound to assign to the prejudice of the secondary security he has thus acquired, but that he may draw payment from one of the subjects over which the catholic security extends, so as to leave the other free to the operation of the secondary security over the other to which he has acquired right. It has also been held that a catholic creditor, before the bankruptcy of his debtor, may renounce his security over one of the subjects, reserving his claim for the whole debt against the other, although it should happen that the subject to which he has so restricted his security is burdened with a secondary security, the creditor in which, of course, suffers by the restriction; Edie and Laird, &c., 29th June 1793, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 3403. Where the subjects over which the catholic security extends belong to two different persons, one of whom is principal and the other cautioner, the catholic creditor, who has drawn payment from the subject of the principal debtor, cannot be required to assign so as to enable a secondary creditor on the principal's estate to claim upon that of the cautioner; and if the catholic creditor has drawn his debts from the cautioner's estate, the cautioner is entitled to an assignation, so as to enable him to operate full relief from the estate of the principal debtor. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 66; Bell's Com. ii. 523, et seq.; Kames' Princ. of Equity, vol. i. p. 124, et seq.; Ibid. (1825), 80-2; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest.

In the case of Littlejohn v. Black, 13th Dec. 1855; 18 D. 207, part of the sequestered estate of a bankrupt consisted of some heritable property and three ships. One creditor had a primary security over both the heritage and the ships. Another creditor had a secondary security over the heritage only;

and the question raised was, whether the secondary creditor was entitled to insist that the catholic creditor should make good his debt, in the first instance, out of the price of the ships, and should not except under deduction of what may thus be realized, attempt to make good any portion of his debt out of the heritage, so as to leave the latter, in so far as not, required for payment of the catholic creditor, available for the claims of the secondary creditor. The Court decided in favour of the claim of the secondary creditor, and farther held that the attachment effected by the sequestration in favour of the trustee did not disturb the respective relations and rights, legal and equitable, of the catholic and secondary creditors, but that these remained as they stood at the date of the sequestration, and that the trustee took the bankrupt estate tantum et tale as it stood in the bankrupt himself at the date of the sequestration. LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL observed, "In the ordinary case of a Catholic creditor, i.e., a creditor holding security over two subjects, and another creditor holding a postponed security over one of them, there can be no doubt that the catholic creditor is entitled to operate payment out of the two subjects as he best can for his own interest; but he is not entitled, arbitrarily or nimiously, to proceed in such a manner as to injure the secondary creditor without benefiting himself, as, for instance, capriciously to take his payment entirely out of the subjects over which there is a second security, and thereby to exhaust that subject to the detriment of the second creditor, leaving the other subject of his own security unaffected or unexhausted. The second creditor will be protected against a proceeding so contrary to equity, and the primary creditor will be compelled either to take his payment out of that one of the subjects in which no other creditor holds a special interest, or to assign his right to the second creditor from whom he has wrested the only subject of his security. But other interests may come into play so as to affect materially the right of this secondary creditor to control the primary creditor. These other interests may be brought into existence by the voluntary act of the common debtor. He may grant to a third creditor a second security over that one of the subjects which is not already conveyed directly to the second creditor; and if he does so, the security so given to that third creditor acting in bond fide will be valid. There will then be three creditors interested in the two subjects, the rule in such a case is, that the catholic creditor must use his right fairly as between the two secondary creditors, and not use it so as to benefit unfairly one of them to the prejudice of the other. His debt must be paid proportionally out of the two subjects. Priority of date is of no consequence as between the two secondary creditors. The effect, then, of another secondary creditor being brought into the field is to diminish, or it may be to destroy, in great measure, the value of the control which the earliest secondary creditor at one time had over the proceedings of the catholic creditor. The equity which supported him when there was no other interest in the way is no longer free to act to the same extent in his favour. The granting to a third creditor a second security over that one of the subjects which was conveyed and directed to the second creditor is a voluntary act of the common debtor, by which the position of the secondary creditor may be materially affected. Whether the same result would be brought about by the hostile act of another creditor adjudging the subjects for debt, has not, I believe, been decided; but I see strong grounds for contending that the same results might follow in that case. In the present case, nothing voluntary was done by the common debtor to affect the right of the secondary creditor, nor did any third creditor, by diligence, attach the ships so as to acquire for himself a security over them. But the bankruptcy occurred; and the question comes to be, Whether the statutory right and interest which the trustee so acquired in the ships is such as to interfere with the right which, but for that statutory interest, would have unquestionably belonged to the secondary security over the land. In other words, has the bankrupt statute placed the trustee, as regards the matter in question, in the same favourable position that would have been occupied by the holder of a second security over the ships. In this question I have given all the consideration I could, and I have come to the conclusion that the trustee does not occupy that position with reference to the subjects of the securities in question. The general object of the statute was to preserve, as far as possible, all rights and interests in the position in which they stood the moment before bankruptcy, and to give them the same effect to which they were then entitled. To effectuate that object the statute ousted the bankrupt, and transferred the estate to a trustee. It put a stop to all races to diligence then in process; but it abstained from disturbing any securities or preferences honestly obtained and lawfully completed. According to the nature of such securities or preferences, it expressly saved them. I think it follows from this, that the same event which in this case disabled and ousted the bankrupt, and called into existence the trustee, gave stability and permanency to the antecedent securities and interests affecting the land and the ships, with all the rights and qualities belonging to these securities as they then stood. I do not see in the statute anything which gives to the trustee the character of the holder of a second security over the ships, or which gives to him the character of the holder of a security at all. He is a statutory transferee for a particular purpose. His title is universal, and he takes the estate, subject to all qualities and conditions, as at the moment of bankruptcy. The saving words at the end of the 78th section appear important: 'subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null or reducible.' The trustee in the present case took the estate of the bankrupt subject to the debts and securities, with all their qualities, as they stood at the date of the sequestration. The demand of the secondary creditor is nothing more than that effect shall be given to this quality of his security in the distribution of the estate."

Cautionary; is that obligation by which a party becomes surety for another; or, according to Stair's definition, it is "the promise or contract of one, not for himself, but for another." A probative writing is essential to the constitution of a cautionary obligation. Where, however, rei interventus has followed on an improbable document, and matters are no longer entire, the improbable document will be held sufficient to constitute the obligation; Brown v. Campbell, 28th Nov. 1794, M. 17058, and Sinclair v. Sinclair, 3d Feb. 1795; Bell, 140. See also, Ross's L. C., vol. iii. p. 20, and the case of Church of England Life Assurance Co. v. Hodges, 12th Feb. 1857, 19 D. 414. Formerly it was the law, that, although a cautionary obligation must be constituted by a probative document, that rule suffered an exception when the cautionary obligation was undertaken at the same time with a principal obligation, which obligation was itself one that could be established by witnesses. In such a case it was held that the cautionary obligation might be proved by witnesses also. See Carruthers v. Bell, 13th Nov. 1812, and Rhynd v. Mackenzie, 20th Feb. 1616. Also Ross's, L. C. v. 3, p. 20. The law in this respect, however, has been altered by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act for Scotland, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, 1856, which enacts, that all cautionary obligations shall be in writing, and subscribed by the person undertaking them, or by some person duly authorized by him.

A simple cautioner, or adpromissor, as he was termed in the Roman law, is one who binds himself as cautioner with the principal, for the greater security of the creditor. Such a cautioner was formerly entitled to the benefit of discussion; that is, he was entitled to insist that the principal debtor be discussed, by the execution of diligence both against his person and property, before the cautioner was called upon to satisfy the debt or obligation (see Beneficium Ordinis). This, however, has been altered by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which declares that it shall not be necessary for the creditor, to whom a cautionary obligation has been granted, to discuss or do diligence against the principal debtor before calling on the cautioner for payment of the debt to which the cautionary obligation refers, but that it shall be competent for him to proceed against the principal debtor and the cautioner, or against either of them, and to use all action or diligence against both or either of them, which may be competent. There is nothing, however, to prevent a cautioner from stipulating in the document constituting his cautionary obligation, that the creditor shall be bound, before proceeding against him, to discuss and do diligence against the principal debtor; and a provision to this effect is contained in the statute. There is another description of cautioner, who was termed in the Roman law expromissor. Such a cautioner comes under a distinct and separate obligation, in which he is himself the principal, having, however, claim of relief, as mandatory or negotiator for another. A cautioner of this description had not the benefit of discussion. Cautioners are frequently taken bound, conjunctly and severally, or as full debtors, with the principal, in which case both parties are liable in solidum. Where there is more than one cautioner, bound simply as such, and not jointly, each of them is liable, in the first instance, only for his own share, if the subject of the obligation be divisible, unless, from the insolvency of the other cautioners, the creditor cannot recover from them. See Beneficium Divisionis.

It follows, from the nature of the obligation, that a cautioner who has paid the debt has an action ex mandato against the principal for relief; and for this purpose he is entitled to demand an assignation from the creditor, not only of the debt and whole diligence, but also of any other securities held by the creditor; and should this claim of relief be cut off by any proceeding on the part of the creditor, the cautioner is thereby liberated from his obligation. The cautioner's claim is for relief from the principal obligation, with the interest and expenses paid by him; but under this claim he is not entitled to include the expense of diligence against himself, because he ought to have paid without diligence. The cautioner is entitled to sue the principal debtor for relief from the cautionary obligation, even before payment: 1st, Where the debtor is taken bound to deliver the cautionary obligation, cancelled at the same term at which he is bound to pay the creditor, and where the term of payment is past, because in that case the cautioner is as fully entitled to insist for implement of the obligation as the creditor himself is. 2d, Where the principal debtor is vergens ad inopiam, the cautioner may attach his funds for his relief, before either payment or distress. 3d, If the cautionary obligation be conditional, and may be long pendent, the cautioner will be allowed to adjudge in security, although there have been no previous distress, under the qualification that no execution shall follow on the decree until distress. Where an additional cautioner is interposed, and becomes bound in a separate deed, as in a bond of corroboration, it has been questioned whether the new cautioner has a total relief against the original cautioners, or a proportional relief only. The rule seems to be, that if the new cautioner have become bound on behalf of the former cautioners, he will be entitled to claim a total relief from them. If he is interposed solely on account of the principal debtor, he will be entitled to a proportional relief only, precisely as if he had become bound along with the original cautioners. Smiton v. Millar, 15th Nov. 1792, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 2138. See 3 Ross, L. C. 28.

Extrajudicial cautioners have the benefit of a limitation or prescription of their obligation. This was introduced by the act 1695, c. 5, which provides that no person binding and engaging for, and with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contract for sums of money, shall be bound for the said sums longer than seven years after the date of the bond; but that, from and after the said seven years, the said cautioner shall be eo ipso free of his caution; and that, whoever is bound for another, either as express cautioner, or as principal, or as co-principal, shall be understood to be a cautioner, and to have the benefit of this act, provided that he have either clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart intimated personally to the creditor at his receiving of the bond, without prejudice to the true principals being bound in the whole contents of the bond or contract; as also of the said cautioners being still bound conform to the terms of the bond, within the said seven years, as before the making of this act: As also, providing that what legal diligence by inhibition, horning, arrestment, adjudication, or any other way, shall be done within the said seven years, by creditors against their cautioners, for what fell due in that time, shall stand good, and have course and effect after the expiring of the seven years, as if this act had not been made. The limitation introduced by this statute does not extend.—1st, To a letter of credit or of guarantee in a mercantile transaction, when it is not accompanied with any obligation of relief by the principal debtor; 2d, To an obligation for an annual payment; 3d, To an obligation ad factum præstandum; 4th, To a cautioner in a bond of relief; 5th, To a cautioner in a bond of corroboration; 6th, To the case where the term of payment of the debt is beyond the seven years from the date of the bond; 7th, To a cautioner in a contract of marriage, or for the discharge of an office; 8th, To an engagement, by letter or otherwise, to pay, or see paid, a sum already lent; 9th, To the case of a bill of exchange wherein one signs as cautioner; or, lastly, To judicial cautionary.

Where the cautioner has a separate bond of relief, in order to secure the benefit of the act, it must be intimated either notarially or judicially to the creditor; mere private knowledge is not sufficient. The cautioner's obligation will be extended beyond the seven years, provided, 1st, That the bond has been renewed, or a corroboration granted by the cautioner, or negotiations carried on for paying the debt, so as to bar the cautioner, personali exceptione, from founding on the act; 2d, That the creditor shall have raised diligence against the cautioner, or shall have obtained decree against him within the seven years; for it would seem that mere citation in an action is not sufficient in this, as it is in prescriptions. It is also to be observed, that the diligence or decree within the seven years does not operate in the septennial limitation like an interruption of prescription in the ordinary case. The effect of the limitation is effectually to liberate the cautioner from all responsibility beyond the seven years; and the diligence or decree against the cautioner can extend only to the sum in the bond, and the interest falling due within the seven years; Bell's Com. i. 356. A cautioner who has by mistake paid the debt after the expiration of the seven years, will be entitled to demand repetition from the creditor. Carrick v. Carse, 5th Aug. 1778, Mor. p. 2931.

With regard to the discharge of extrajudicial cautionary obligations, it may be observed generally, that a discharge of the principal is a discharge of the cautioner, for the cautioner has become bound, relying on his relief from the principal. A discharge of a co-cautioner was formerly a discharge to the remaining cautioners to the extent of the share which the discharged co-cautioner would have borne. This, however, has been altered by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, which enacts that a discharge by the creditor of one co-cautioner shall operate as a discharge to all the cautioners. See Church of England Assurance Company, 1857, 19 D. 1079. The renunciation by the creditor of any security held by him over the principal debtor's estate will also discharge the cautioner. Even the discharge of the debtor from prison by the creditor will have this effect; as will the acceptance of an extrajudicial composition on the debtor's estate by the creditor individually, without the consent of the cautioner. So also, if the creditor give the principal debtor time, without the cautioner's consent, the cautioner will be free. But mere delay or forbearance to enforce payment does not amount to "giving time." The creditor must farther have bound himself to delay beyond the term of payment stipulated in the obligation in security of which the cautioner interposed. The arrangement must be such, for example, that, if the cautioner were to pay the debt and take an assignation, he would be barred from proceeding against the principal debtor by the creditor's agreement to give time. This, or any other agreement whereby the creditor ties up his own hands and the hands of the cautioner quoad the principal debtor, without the cautioner's consent, is "giving time" in the legal acceptation of that expression; Bell's Princ. § 262, and authorities there cited. In like manner, it will discharge the cautioner, if the creditor, without consulting him, ranks on the debtor's bankrupt estate, or consents to the acceptance of a composition under the bankruptcy statute, so as to enable the principal debtor to get his discharge; although this general doctrine is somewhat affected by the decision, Whitelaw, &c. v. Steins, 20th May 1814, Fac. Coll. But see Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 359. To take a statutory composition, however, where the creditor was not a concurring creditor, will not liberate the cautioner; Bell's Com. ib. See 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, § 9.

Mere negligence on the part of the creditor, unless it has been gross, will not free the cautioner: Thus, the creditor is under no obligation to execute diligence when the term of payment arrives, although, if he has completed diligence, he cannot himself discharge it, without forfeiting his claim against the cautioner. Unless fraud or collusion between the creditor and the principal debtor can be proved, it will not avail the cautioner to plead that, by due diligence, the debt might have been recovered from the principal; for the cautioner in such circumstances has in his own power the remedy of inhibition, adjudication, or arrestment, in security. The loss of recourse, in the case of undue negotiation of a bill of exchange, seems to be an exception to this general rule (see Bill of Exchange), and some cases of cautionary for the due execution of an office may afford another exception. See Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 360, 5th edit. Cautionary for the faithful Performance of an Office.—The cautionary obligations of this description are various; but it is unnecessary to enumerate them particularly. The most important are:—1. Cautionary obligations for the intromissions of a bank-agent.—The responsibility which the cautioner in such a case undertakes is very serious; and on the failure of the agent, difficult questions of equity may arise, as to the degree of vigilance which the bank ought to have exercised in the periodical accountings with the agent. In all such questions much must necessarily depend on the terms of the particular bond; but cases of neglect may easily be figured which would bar all claim against the cautioner. The bonds given on these occasions refer to past as well as future losses; and any improper concealment by the bank at the time of arranging the caution might also have the effect of liberating the cautioner. It may be observed here, that a clause, frequently inserted in these bonds, providing that no suspension shall pass except on consignment, will not receive effect, as being a pactum illi- citum; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 364. 2. Cautioners for a messenger-at-arms.—In this case the cautioners are taken bound to make good “the damage, interest, and expenses which the lieges shall sustain through the negligent, fraudulent, or informal execution of the messenger.” See Darling's Messenger-at-arms. Under this obligation it is held, 1. That the cautioners are liable only for what the messenger does in his character of messenger, and not for his actings as agent, a capacity in which messengers are frequently employed: 2. That the messenger, as such, has no discretionary power: 3. That the cautioners are liable not merely to the employer of the messenger, but to those against whom he has committed any fault: 4. That, in estimating the damage arising from the messenger's neglect, the law holds the damage to be the amount of the debt; nor will any proof be allowed of the desperate circumstances of the debtor, in order to show that due execution of the diligence would not have secured payment; Bell's Com. ib. 3. Cautioner for a notary.—The responsibility here is similar to that in the case of the messenger. It is not necessary to make out a case of fraud; for the cautioner will be liable for the consequences of neglect, or error, even though it should arise from want of skill. Bell's Com. ib. p. 366, et seq.

It may be observed in general, with regard to cautioners for the due performance of an office, 1. That, having once engaged for the officer's fidelity, they are not entitled to withdraw suddenly, although they may do so after a reasonable notice; and, 2. That, on the death of the cautioner, the obligation will subsist against his representative, until he shall, by a similar withdrawal, terminate the obligation. Bell's Com. ib. p. 366. See also Wyllie v. Black's Trustees, 13th Dec. 1853, 16 D. 180.

Judicial Cautionary.—There are several descriptions of cautionary required in judicial procedure.

1. In a Suspension or Advocation.—In advocations, caution is required for the expenses incurred in the inferior court, and also for such expenses as may be incurred in the Court of Session; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 2; and the bond of caution is prepared by the clerk in the inferior court. In suspensions, caution is found in the Bill-Chamber; and the cautioner, by the form of his bond, becomes liable, jointly with the principal, for the sums, with interest and expenses of process, which may be decreed for against the suspender upon discussing the note. But although such are the express terms of the bond, it is provided by A. S. 14th June 1799, that, in case of a suspender or advocator failing to expedite the letters, or in case of the respondent obtaining protestation, the cautioner is to be liable, as well as the principal, for the expenses. And by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 47, a still farther extension of the cautioner's liability has been effected. It is thereby enacted, that “cautioners in a bill of suspension shall be liable to fulfil the obligation in their bond, although the letters of suspension shall not be expedite before the day of citation mentioned in the deliverance, and also in case of the charger's obtaining and duly extracting protestation for not enrolling, calling, and insisting.” The obligation on the cautioner is not affected by the death of either the charger or the suspender, during the dependence of the process; A. S. 29th Jan. 1650. An attester is liable only subsidiarie, and is consequently entitled not only to insist that both the principal and cautioner shall be discussed before himself, but he may also claim a total relief against both of them. It has been held, that a person who has signed a bond of caution of this nature, which has been returned from the Bill-Chamber to get an attester, may withdraw his obligation at any time before the attested bond has been accepted of by the opposite party, and received by the Bill-Chamber clerk; Stewart v. Mitchell, 1786; Mor. p. 2157. After the bond has been lodged in the Bill-Chamber, and answers put in for the charger, however, although no express acceptance has been signified, the cautioner is not entitled to rescind; Crawford v. Lynde, 26th May 1819, Fac. Coll. Neither could the charger, after the cautioner had been accepted, and the letters expedite, require a new cautioner in the event of the insolvency of the cautioner already received; but this was altered as regards suspensions of liquid obligations by A. S. 11th July 1828, § 18, which made it competent for the Court, in such an event, to order new caution to be found. The cautioner in a suspension is not liberated by the circumstance of the decree under suspension being converted into a libel. A. S. 27th Dec. 1709; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 71; Bell's Com. 5th edit. vol. i. p. 385; Hume, i. 144; Ross's Lectures, i. p. 365, et seq.; Shand's Prac. p. 476; Beveridge on Bill-Chamber; Barclay's Mc'Glash. Sher. Court Prac.; Juridical Styles; Dickson on Evidence, p. 323, et seq. For authorities on caution in suspensions, see the authorities under the general word Caution. See also Advocation. Attestor. Suspension.

2. Caution in Loosing Arrestment.—The obligation extends no farther than to the sums arrested. The cautioner was never held to be entitled to the benefit of discussion; Ross's Lect. i. p. 458; A. S. 11th July 1826; Shand's

Prac. p. 573; Juridical Styles, ii. p. 90. See Arrestment.

3. Caution judicio sisti lays the cautioner under an obligation to produce the party for whom he becomes bound at all diets of court, when required. In case of failure to do so, the bond is forfeited, and the cautioner incurs the penalty, which is generally the debt sued for, without the benefit of discussion. A cautioner judicio sisti may at any time liberate himself by producing the party in court, and protesting to be free from farther liability. In like manner, when the pursuer extracts the decree without calling upon the cautioner to produce the party, the obligation is at an end. *Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, §§ 19 and 21; B. iii. tit. 3, § 73, notes by Ivory; Bell's Com. i. p. 380, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 274; Shand's Prac. pp. 415, 504; Hutch. Caution judicio sisti in maritime causes is abolished by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 24.

4. Caution judicatum solvi.—This species of cautionary was required only in maritime suits, such as were formerly pursued before the Court of Admiralty. The cautioner became liable for the solvency of the party during the dependence of the process, and for payment of the debt subsidiarie, and had, of course, the benefit of discussion. Caution judicatum solvi in the Court of Session was abolished by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 24; and as regards the Sheriff Courts, it cannot be required from any party domiciled in Scotland, unless on special grounds to be stated by the judge; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 22. Ersk. Styles, 3d edit. ii. p. 94; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. p. 340, Barclay's Sher. Court Prac. p. 61. See Admiralty.

5. Caution usufructuaria; is that caution which liferenters may be required to give for the preservation of the liferented subjects against waste or injury. The act 1491, c. 25, authorizes such caution to be insisted for at the suit of any party interested; and on refusal, the act 1535, c. 15, imposes the penalty of exclusion from the profits of the subject until security be given. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 59.

6. Juratory caution; is a description of security sometimes received in advocations and suspensions, where the party is unable to procure other caution. It consists of an inventory of his effects given up upon oath, and assigned in security to the opposite party.

See A. S. 14th June, 1799; A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 2 and 3; A. S. 10th July 1839, § 121; and 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 34. See also Juratory Caution.

7. Cautioner in bail.—This cautionary is applicable to criminal cases, and resembles the caution judicio sisti. The cautioner becomes bound, under a specific penalty, to produce the person of the accused, "to answer to any libel that shall be offered against him for the crime or offence with which he is charged, at any time within the space of six months." The six months will be computed from the date of the bail-bond; and unless there is an express obligation to produce the person of the accused "at all diets of court," the cautioner will be discharged of his obligation, by producing him on the first diet; and if the trial is then delayed, bail must be applied for of new. Hume, vol. ii. p. 94; Alison's Prac. 174; Jurid. Styles, ii. p. 93. Upon failure to implement the obligation, the cautioner's bond will be declared forfeited, and the penalty will be recovered by the Exchequer. See Bail.

8. Caution in law-burrows.—The caution here is, that the complainer shall not be molested in his person or property by the party complained of, under a certain penalty, which, on contravention, will be levied from the cautioner. One-half of the penalty goes to the complainer, the other to the public; 1581, c. 117. See Jurid. Styles, ii. pp. 91, 92. See also Law-burrows.

Caveat; is an intimation made to the proper officer to prevent the taking of any step (the presenting of a signature for instance) without intimation to the party interested, so as to enable him to appear and object to it.

Cellar, King's. See Bonding Acts, and King's Cellar.

Cepum animalium; used in the leges burgorum; the fat of animals. Skene, h. t.

Certificate; a declaration of a fact by an officer or other person acting in a public character. A certificate of baptism is signed by the session-clerk. A certificate of bad health by a physician or surgeon must bear to be on soul and conscience. In the Bill-chamber proceedings, an attestation by the clerk that no caution has been received is termed a certificate. In cases of homicide, and other crimes against the person, medical certificates produced respecting the nature of the injuries must be verified on oath by the medical persons who granted them. Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, 15, and tit. 43, 1, et. seq.; Burnett, 486; Dickson on Evidence, pp. 959, 965.

Certificate; in English law, a writing made in any court, to give notice to another court of anything done therein, usually by

Certificate. See Attorney's Certificate.

Certificate of Registry of a Ship; is a copy of what is entered in the register of the ship in the books of the Custom-house. It is granted by the collector, comptroller, or principal officer of the customs at the port of registry of the ship, and delivered to the captain as a voucher of the character and privileges of the vessel as a British ship; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 158, 5th edit. See the form of this certificate, schedule D, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 104, 1854, being the act to amend and consolidate the acts relating to merchant shipping. See also the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act, 1854, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 120. Also the act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 91, 1855. Also, Abbott's Law of Merchant Ships, 10th edition, 1856.

Certification; in judicial procedure, signifies properly the assurance given to a party of the course to be followed in case he disobeys the will of the summons or other writ, or the order of the Court. Erskine defines it to be "the penalty to be inflicted on the defender if he shall neither comply with the will of the summons, nor show a reason why he is not bound in law to comply with it;" B. iv. tit. 1, § 7. Certification is either expressed or implied. In the ordinary summons, the defender is ordered to appear in court against a certain day, "with certification as effairs." This certification was at one time so severe, that reiterated contumacy on the part of the defender was punished with confiscation of his property (1449, c. 29); but now, the certification in the summons amounts to nothing more than an absolute assurance to the defender, that if he fails to appear in the usual manner, the judge will decree in his absence. The certification in the general charge is, that in default of the heir's entry, the creditor shall have the same action against the heir as if he had entered. In the special charge, the certification is, that action shall be had not only against the heir, but also against the lands belonging to the deceased; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 12. The most important certification in our law, however, is that in the process of reduction-improbation. In that action two terms are allowed to the defender for the production of the writ sought to be reduced, and, after the expiration of these terms, ten days longer are allowed; but should the writ not then be produced, decree of certification may be pronounced by the judge, the effect of which is to hold the writ as forged and fabricated; and such a decree, once pronounced, can hardly be recalled, even although it has been pronounced in absence. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 31; More's Notes, p. cccclxxvi.; Ersk. B.

iv. tit. 1, § 21; Bell's Com. 5th edit. vol. ii. p. 277, et. seq.; Jurid. Styles, vol. iii. p. 846. In the simple reduction, the certification is merely, that the deed called for shall be held as void until produced. Ersk. ib. § 24; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. pp. 459, 489; Shand's Prac. 632, 641, et. passim.

Certiorari; is an English writ, analogous to our letters of advocacy. It is issued out of the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in civil cases, and the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench in criminal cases, and is directed in the Queen's name to the judges or officers of inferior courts, commanding them to certify, or to return the records of a cause depending before them, to the end that the party may have more sure and speedy justice before the Queen, or such judges as she shall assign to try the cause. Tomlins' Dict.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.; 2 Hale, p. 210; 4 Black. Com. p. 320.

Cess. See Land-Tax.

Cessio Bonorum. The process of cessio bonorum may be termed an equitable relief from the severity of the law of imprisonment for debt. This process was formerly sued out exclusively in the Court of Session, in the form of a summons at the instance of the imprisoned and insolvent debtor, in which the whole of the creditors were called as defenders. When the process came into Court, the pursuer was bound to exhibit a condescence, containing a full statement of his affairs; and to satisfy the Court that his inability to pay his debts had arisen from innocent misfortunes. This process is still competent before the Court of Session; and any one of the creditors is entitled to appear and object to the statement; and the pursuer will not be allowed the benefit of the process, until he has given a satisfactory explanation of the state of his affairs; the onus probandi, however, of all objections, lies with the creditor. When the objections have been obviated, the Court pronounce an interlocutor, finding the debtor entitled to the benefit of cessio; and upon his lodging in the hands of the clerk of Court a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of his creditors, and making oath that the condescence contains a full and true state of his affairs, and that he has made no conveyance of any part of his property, either before or since his imprisonment, to the prejudice of his creditors, decree of cessio will be pronounced; the effect of which is to liberate the debtor from imprisonment, and to protect him from re-incarceration for any debts due, prior to the decree, to the creditors who have been called in the action. The decree also generally contained a dispensation to the pursuer from the necessity of wearing the dyvour's habit. See Dyvour.

By 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 56, the jurisdiction in cases of cessio is extended to sheriffs. The principal provisions of that statute are,—

1. Any debtor in prison, or who has been in prison, and is afterwards liberated, or against whom a warrant of imprisonment has been issued, may present to the Sheriff of the county in which he lives a petition, stating his inability to pay his debts, and willingness to surrender his estates, and praying for decree of cessio and interim protection; the petition to contain a list of his creditors, and to be accompanied by the warrant, or a certificate of imprisonment.
2. The debtor then, on a warrant from the Sheriff, publishes a notice in the Edinburgh Gazette, requiring the creditors to appear in court within thirty days, and sends letters with the same notice to each of the creditors, or, at his option, cites them in terms of law. He then lodges a state of his affairs, subscribed by himself, and all books, papers, &c., relating to his affairs, with the Sheriff-clerk. The jurisdiction of the Sheriff extends to foreign creditors; Kennedy, March 10, 1838.
3. On the day appointed for compareance, the Sheriff may examine the debtor upon oath; after which, the Sheriff, if necessary, shall allow parties a proof, and make a note of the creditors' objections, and either grant decree, or refuse it in hoc statu; or grant it, subject to a declaration, that it shall not be extractable or available as a protection to the debtor for such time as shall appear proper, or make such other orders as to him appear just; and where he shall grant decree under such limitations, or refuse decree in hoc statu, he shall state the grounds of his decision, and his note of the objections shall form part of the process.
4. If such decree be pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute, any one aggrieved may lodge a reclaiming petition within six days; and if the complainer intimate in the petition his desire that, if the Sheriff-substitute be disposed to refuse it, the petition may be laid before the Sheriff, it shall be transmitted to the Sheriff.
5. Any person, after disposal of such petition, or without presenting one, may, within ten days, or in Orkney within twenty days, after the last judgment complained of, lodge with any of the clerks of Session a reclaiming note, a copy of which shall be delivered within the said period to the respondent, or his known agent; and a copy, certified by the said clerk of Session, shall be a sufficient warrant to the Sheriff-clerk to transmit to the said clerk of Session the proceedings in process.
6. If the Court of Session be sitting, the Court shall, after enrolment of the reclaiming note, pronounce judgment, or remit to the Sheriff with instructions, or to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation or the Christmas recess. If the Court be not sitting, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills may act as judge during vacation or Christmas recess, subject to review; but if the proceedings have not been brought to a termination before the Lord Ordinary at the commencement of the ensuing Session, the cause shall be re-transmitted and enrolled before the Inner-House, which may give judgment therein, as if it had been enrolled, or had continued without interruption, before the Inner-House.

7. In cases originating in the Court of Session, the procedure remains as before; but the Court are, in addition, empowered to remit to the Sheriff to examine as above (3.), and report to the Inner-House, who grant decree, or refuse hoc statu, or grant with limitation.
8. If the Court of Session be not sitting when the report is made, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills may hear parties viva voce, and pronounce judgment; or if the Court be sitting, but the proceedings cannot be terminated before vacation or Christmas recess, the Inner-House may remit to the Lord Ordinary. And if the proceedings be not terminated before the Lord Ordinary at the commencement of the ensuing session, the Inner-House takes them up.
9. The Lord Ordinary shall possess, for the purposes of the act, the same powers during vacation and recess as the Inner-House during session; but any person aggrieved by his judgment may lodge a reclaiming note to the Inner-House within ten days.
10. The Inner-House, the Lord Ordinary, or the Sheriff, may grant interim protection or liberation, provided that, before the issuing of the warrant, the debtor lodge a bond with a sufficient cautioner, binding themselves under a penalty, to be divided among the creditors, that he shall attend all diets when required; and the effect of such warrant of liberation or protection shall not be suspended by the mere lodging of a reclaiming note; but the Inner-House or Sheriff (as the case may be) may, on its being lodged, and parties heard, recal the warrant of liberation or protection; and the Inner-House, Lord Ordinary, or Sheriff, may grant warrant to bring the debtor before them for examination, and carry him back to prison. The debtor cannot apply for interim protection or liberation sooner than the day of compareance; Shand's Prac. p. 803.
11. The decree shall operate as an assignment of the debtor's moveables for behoof of the creditors, in favour of any trustee mentioned in the decree; but it shall be in their option to require a disposition omnium bonorum.
12. When decree is refused in hoc statu, the debtor may at any time thereafter apply for decree, without the necessity of raising a new summons or presenting a new petition.
13. The dyvour's habit is abolished, and the act 1696, c. 5, in reference to it, is repealed. 14. The debtor must prove his insolvency, and take oath before the Sheriff as before the Court of Session. 15. Any person may lodge a petition of appeal to the House of Lords against the judgment of the Inner-House within ten days, if Parliament be sitting; but if not sitting, or not sitting long enough, within six days after it next meets. 16. No fee-fund or government duties are exigible in any of the proceedings. 17. Court of Session agents may practise in the Sheriff-courts.

This act of 6 and 7 Will. IV., together with two explanatory Acts of Sederunt,—that of 24th December 1838, applying to the process of cessio in the Court of Session, and that of 6th June 1839, applying to cessions in Sheriff-courts,—now regulates the law upon the subject. By § 3 of the recent Bankrupt Act, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, insolvency, concurring with an application for cessio, renders a debtor notour bankrupt; and by § 167, the trustee, for behoof of the creditors of the pursuer of a cessio, is placed under the supervision of the Accountant in Bankruptcy.

The effect of a decree of cessio being not to discharge the debtor, but merely to relieve him from the operation of personal diligence, it affords no protection against the attachment by his former creditors of any property which he may subsequently acquire, either by his own industry or otherwise. The creditors, however, before proceeding with diligence against the new acquisitions of the debtor, are bound to realize the property conveyed by the disposition omnium bonorum, and to apply it, as far as it will go, in extinction of their debts; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 589, 5th edit. In surrendering to his creditors either new acquisitions or the property formerly belonging to him, the debtor is not entitled to retain anything but his working tools, properly so called (see Beneficium Competentiae); and where the debtor has a fixed salary or fixed wages, it is settled that he must give up all that exceeds a proper aliment: Thus clergymen have been held bound to give up part of their stipend, and officers in the army a proportion of their half-pay; Bell's Com. ibid. p. 594. Cestui Que Trust; in the law of England, is the party beneficially interested under a trust; or, according to the English law definition, "is he in trust for whom or to whose use or benefit another man is infeoffed or seised of lands or tenements." The cestui que trust, if in possession, votes in parliamentary elections. Tomlins, h. t.; Chambers, h. t.; Wharton, h. t.; Lewin on Trusts; Hill on Trusts.

Chalder, a chalder of victual consists of 16 bolls.

Chalking of Door; a mode of warning tenants in burghal tenements to remove. In Edinburgh this is performed by a town-officer, acting ex officio, and at the request of the landlord, but without any express judicial warrant. It is not clear that the officer need notify to the tenant the purpose of his visit; although the safe course is to do so. The chalking consists of marking the principal door of the tenement with chalk forty days before Whitsunday; and a certificate, or execution of chalking, being returned, subscribed by the officer and two witnesses, becomes the warrant for a summary removing before the burgh court, under which decree of removal will be pronounced, immediately on the arrival of the removing term; and if the tenant do not then remove, he may be ejected on the expiration of a charge of six days. Bell on Leases, vol. ii. p. 118, 4th edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 85; Ross's Lect. ii. 551. See Removing.

Challenge; an invitation or defiance to fight a duel, whether given verbally or in writing. By 1696, c. 35, the person, whether principal or second, or other interposed person, concerned in giving a challenge, was punishable with banishment and escheat of moveables, although no fighting ensued. This statute was repealed by 59 Geo. III., c. 70; but both the sender and acceptor of a challenge, or one who posts a person as a coward for not fighting, are still guilty of an indictable offence. The challenge must be serious and formal, and not mere intemperate expressions or words of defiance, which, though importing a design to fight, are not followed up by more deliberate proceedings. Hume, i. 438, 442; Bell's Notes, p. 111; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. i. p. 386; Alison's Princ. p. 580; Burn's Justice by Chitty, p. 586. See Duelling.

Challenge of Jurors. To challenge a juror, is to object to his acting as a jurymen. The English Treason Laws, which were extended to Scotland by 7 Anne, c. 21, allow a person tried for that crime thirty-five peremptory challenges, i.e., challenges without cause assigned. In other criminal cases the panel had not, until lately, by the law of Scotland, any right of peremptory challenge; but he is served with a list of the whole forty-five persons from which the jury is to be selected, and has thus an opportunity of learning all reasonable objections which may be stated against any of them, and, on cause shown, he may object without limit. The lawful grounds of objection are,—1. That the proposed jurymen are infamous infamia juris, or an outlaw; 2. That he has hostile feelings towards the panel, or that he has expressed such feelings; 3. That he is insane, or deaf, or dumb, or a minor; 4. Where the prosecution is at the instance of a private party, it is a good objection that the jurymen are near of kin to the prosecutor, or that he is dependent upon him in such a manner as to create an undue bias; Hume, i. 5, 545; ii. p. 309. And now, by the statute 6 Geo. IV., c. 22, the prosecutor and panel have, each of them, five peremptory challenges without reason assigned; Alison's Prac. p. 383; but in both criminal and civil trials only two in the special list can be peremptorily challenged. See Jury. By the act establishing the jury court in civil causes in Scotland (55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 21), peremptory challenges to the number of four to each party are allowed; and challenges, on cause shown, are of course unlimited. The act 59 Geo. III., c. 35, by which the jury court is made permanent, makes no alteration in regard to the right of challenge. See Jury Trial.

Chamberlain. The chamberlain of Scotland was an officer of high dignity and of supreme jurisdiction. He had the inspection of all royal burghs, and power to inquire into the conduct of the magistrates, and to apply the burgh revenues to their proper use. He decided disputes betwixt burghs and burghs, and held circuits for the exercise of his jurisdiction. He judged also in matters of public police within burghs, a power now exercised by the Dean of Guild. The office of chamberlain of Scotland has been long since abolished. Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 4; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 38.

The Lord Great Chamberlain of England is an officer of considerable importance. He is governor of the Palace of Westminster; and, upon all solemn occasions, such as the coronation of the King, the keys of Westminster Hall are delivered to him. He has the care of providing all things in the House of Lords during the sitting of Parliament. The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Yeoman Usher, &c., are under his authority. The office is hereditary. Tomlins' Dict.; Wharton's Lex.

The Lord Chamberlain of the Household has the superintendence and government of all affairs belonging to the King's chamber (except the bed-chamber), and also of the wardrobe; of artificers in the King's service, King's messengers, comedians, &c. The serjeants-at-arms are also under his inspection, and the King's chaplains, physicians, apothecaries, surgeons, &c. He has a vice-chamberlain under him; and both are Privy Counsellors. Tomlins' Dict.; Wharton's Lex.

Champertry, or Champerty; in English law, a bargain with the plaintiff or defendant in any suit, to have part of the land, debt, or other things sued for, if the party that undertakes it prevails therein; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit at his own expense. It is strictly forbidden by several English statutes, being a species of maintenance, and punished in the same manner. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.; Story's Com. ii. 289; Story on Contracts, § 208. See Maintenance. Buying of Pleas.

Champert; in old law language, a gift taken by a great man or by a judge for delaying a just, or expediting a wrongous action. In England it is used where the judge himself, either directly or indirectly, maintains the plea. Skene, h. t.

Chancellor of a Jury; is the preses or foreman of the jury, who announces the verdict when it is a verbal one, and who delivers it in, and, along with the clerk, subscribes it in name of the jury, when it is in writing; Hume, vol. ii. p. 426; Alison's Prac. 639. By the Jury Court act, 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 33, it is provided that the chancellor of the jury in civil causes shall be elected by a majority of the jury after they are sworn, and, in case of an equality of votes, the juror first sworn shall have a double vote. See Verdict.

Chancellor, Lord. The office of Lord Chancellor of England is the highest under the Crown. The Lord Chancellor is appointed to the office by the mere delivery of the King's great seal into his custody. He is a Privy-Councillor ex officio, and Speaker of the House of Lords by prescription. He has the appointment of all justices of the peace throughout the kingdom. In England he is the guardian of all infants, idiots, and lunatics, and has the general superintendence of all charitable institutions. In his judicial capacity he exercises the very extensive jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. He not only keeps the King's great seal, but all patents, commissions, warrants, &c., from the King are perused and examined by him before being signed. The highest branch of his jurisdiction is that of cancelling the King's letters-patent when granted contrary to law. The Lord Chancellor is superior in point of precedence to every temporal Lord. Tomlin's Law Dict.; Wharton's Lex, h. t.

The office of Lord Chancellor in Scotland was abolished at the Union in 1707. The Chancellor of Scotland was formerly an officer of very great importance. He presided in the Scots Parliament, and in all courts of judicature (1661, c. 1), and had the principal direction of the Chancery. He had the custody of the great seal, and was chief counsellor to the King (Balf. Practicks, p. 15); and took precedence of all others ratione officii. On the abolition of the office, a keeper of the great seal for Scotland was appointed; in affixing the seal, however, to the writs passing under it, he acts merely ministerially. See Great Seal.

Chancery or Chancery. The Chancery in Scotland is an office managed by the Director of Chancery and his deputies, in which are recorded all charters, patents of dignities, gifts of offices, remissions, legitimations, presentations, commissions, brieves, retours, precepts thereon, and all other writs appointed to pass the great or the quarter seals. The Director of Chancery is keeper of the quarter seal, or testimonial of the great seal as it is also termed; and in this office all writs passing under the quarter seal are written. All writs passing through Chancery are recorded before they are given out to be sealed. It is from Chancery that all brieves are issued, and to it all retourable brieves are returned to be recorded. Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 2; tit. 3, § 1; tit. 48, § 39; Brown's Synop. h. t. See Brieves.

Chancery; in England, the highest court of judicature next to the Parliament. Its jurisdiction is of two kinds, ordinary and extraordinary, in the former of which the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, &c., is bound, in his proceedings and judgments, to observe the order and method of the common law; the latter is that which the court exercises in cases of equity. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Chapels and Altarages. Before the abolition of Popery, it was usual for pious persons to found and endow chapels, which were served by a chaplain; or altarages, which were small endowments for the maintenance of a priest to perform divine service at an altar, on behalf of the soul of the founder, or some of his deceased friends. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 3. See Altarage.

Chapter. In times of Popery and Episcopacy the chapter was the bishop's council, consisting of an archdeacon, dean, and canons or prebendaries, who were generally ministers within the diocese. By the advice of this council, the bishop managed both his spiritual affairs and the temporal affairs of the diocese. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 15; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 5.

Character of Panel. Evidence of the prisoner's general bad character cannot be brought to support a specific charge. The charge of habit and repute in theft is of course excepted. In certain cases of homicide, proof of a vindictive temper, and of a series of cruelties practised towards the individual killed, is competent; but such cruelties must be set forth in the libel. Proof of character is allowed on the part of the panel, both as evidence in his favour, and in mitigation of punishment, as, for instance, in homicide on sudden quarrel, that he is of a mild temper, and that the deceased was the reverse. Such evidence of character must be given on oath, unless when offered in mitigation of punishment, in which case a written certificate is admitted, valeat quantum, where the case has not gone before the jury; Dickson on Evidence, p. 965. Where the character of the injured person is impeached by a panel, the prosecutor may bring evidence to support it. In cases of rape, the woman's general loose manners, and even particular acts of criminality, may be proved; but the prosecutor must have notice of this line of defence, unless he has attempted to set up her previous character. Hume, ii. 413; Alison's Prin. 215; Alison's Prac. 629; Dickson on Evidence, 21. In charges of rape also, the prosecutor may anticipate the ordinary defence, that the connection was voluntary, by proving the woman's good character, though not impugned on record; M'William, 1846; Arkley's Rep. p. 209.

Character of Parties. In an action of damages for defamation, it is competent to the pursuer to adduce evidence in support of his general character, as upon that the amount of his damages in some degree depends. When a pursuer leads evidence in support of his character, the defender is entitled to attack it and lead counter evidence, but not to impugn a general character in favour of which evidence has been led, by questions as to particular acts. Upon the question, whether the defender is entitled to attack the general conduct of the pursuer, although evidence has not been led in support of it, there are several conflicting decisions cited by Mr Macfarlane; Jury Prac. 217. In the most recent of these, evidence was admitted that the pursuer was of a violent and quarrelsome disposition, there being a statement to that effect in the record; and the principle seems now to be recognised, that general evidence against the pursuer's character will be rejected, unless the defender has attacked it on record, or taken an issue in justification; Dickson on Evidence, p. 18. It is incompetent in civil cases to lead evidence as to the defender's general character, either pro or contra. See Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 216-8, and authorities there cited; Dickson, ut supra.

Character to Servant. There is no legal obligation upon a master to give his servant a character; but if he give a false one, he is liable to the servant in damages. Bell's Princ.

Charge. In the technical language of Scotch law, a charge is the command of the Sovereign's letters to perform some act. The term is also applied to the messenger's copy for service, requiring the person to obey the order of the letters; as a charge on letters of horning, or a charge against a superior.

Charge to enter Heir.—General Charge.—This formerly was a writ issued in the sovereign's name, and passing the Signet, ordering the heir within forty days to enter heir to his predecessor, under certification that, if he failed, the creditor should have action against him, in the same manner as if he had entered. The general charge was intended merely as the foundation of proceedings against the heir; and although such a charge might have been given during the currency of the annus deliberandi, yet no summons could be raised for constituting the debt, until after the expiration of the year, unless, during the course of it, the heir had intromitted with the effects of the deceased, and so incurred a passive title. When the action had been raised on the expiration of the general charge, the heir, if he chose, might appear and renounce the succession; in which case decree cognitionis causæ might be obtained at the instance of the creditor. This decree was termed a decree of cognition, because its chief object was to ascertain the amount of the debt; but such a decree, proceeding on a renunciation by the heir, could not affect either his person or separate property. Where no appearance was made for the heir, decree was pronounced against him as lawfully charged to enter heir, which had the effect of constituting him debtor personally, and gave the creditor action against him and his estate, as well as against the estate of the ancestor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 12, et seq.; Bell's Com. 5th edit. vol. i. p. 709; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Shaw's Digest; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 328; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. ii. p. 9, 11, 67; Ross's Lect. i. 498; Menzies' Lectures.

The debt being thus constituted, it still remained, that the heritable rights which belonged to the ancestor should be vested in the heir, or made liable to the diligence of the creditor; and for this purpose the heir required to receive either a special or a general special charge.

The Special Charge was a writ also issued in the Sovereign's name, and passing the Signet. It narrated the general charge and procedure for constituting the debt, and that the heir would not enter himself heir in special to the heritage in which his ancestor died infest, so as to enable the creditor to adjudge that property; and it ordained the heir, within forty days, to enter himself heir in special to his ancestor, under certification that, if he failed, the creditor should have action of adjudication against him and the lands, precisely as if he had so entered. The execution of this charge was by 1540, c. 160, made equivalent, fictione juris, to the heir's actual entry; and on the expiration of the forty days, an adjudication at the instance of the creditor effectually carried the subjects to which the heir was charged to enter. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 13; Bell's Com. ibid. pp. 712 and 740; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. pp. 375, 415, 763.

The General Special Charge.—The only difference between this charge and the special charge was, that it was applicable to those heritable subjects to which the ancestor had personal rights, not completed by sasine; and the heir was charged to make up his titles to the unexecuted procuratories or precept, &c. under certification that, if he failed, the creditor should have the same action against the heir and the heritage, that he would have had if he had been retoured heir in general to his ancestor. Ersk. ib. By the statute 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 8, it was enacted, that, after one charge, whether general or special, had been given on induciæ of forty days, every subsequent charge might be on induciæ of twenty days only; and by the same section of the act, these induciæ were declared to be applicable whether the heir was within Scotland or not. Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 371.

Where the heir himself, and not the ancestor, was the debtor, there was no occasion for a general charge. All that the creditor had in view in such a case was, that his debtor should complete his titles to the property to which he had succeeded, so that it might be attached for his debt; and, for this purpose, it was necessary to raise letters either of special or of general special charge, according to the state of the titles to the subjects of the succession; and, on the expiration of this charge, whether the heir entered or not, the subjects were effectually attached by adjudication at the creditor's instance. 1621, c. 27; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 14. But, even in this case, the heir was not obliged to answer the charge until the expiration of the annus deliberandi; and the creditor could not go on with his proceedings during the year, unless the heir chose either to obey the charge, or to assume possession of the estate, or grant conveyances of it. It has been doubted whether the heir, when he was himself the original debtor, was at liberty to renounce the succession which had opened to him, and which might have enabled him to discharge his debts; and it was once held that such a renunciation was competent; Carse, 23d March 1627, Mor. Supplement, p. 40; but the correctness of that decision has been questioned; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 709, 5th edit.

The act 1540, c. 106, authorized charges to enter to be given only where the heir was of perfect age; but, by immemorial usage, it was the practice to charge minors. It has been already observed, that the charge might be given during the currency of the annus deliberandi; and in those cases where the general charge was meant to be the foundation of an ordinary summons, the action was sustained if the summons on which it proceeded was not executed until a year after the ancestor's death, although the forty days of the charge were not elapsed at the date of the execution. But where a special charge had been given with a view to an adjudication, the summons of adjudication, according to the construction put on the statute, could not be raised until the expiration of the annus deliberandi, and of "the forty days next ensuing that year, within which the heir is charged to enter." Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 32; tit. 5, § 22, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 51, § 10; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 15; Bell's Com. 5th edit. vol. i. p. 743; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1855, et seq.; Menzies' Lectures. See Adjudication.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 48, § 16, general, special, and general special charges are abolished. The execution of a summons of constitution of an ancestor's debt against an unentered heir is made equivalent to a general charge. The execution of a summons of adjudication following on the decree obtained in such action of constitution is made equivalent to a special charge, or general special charge, as the case may require. The same effect is given to the execution of a summons of adjudication against an unentered heir, founded on his own debts. See on this subject the article Adjudication contra Hæreditatem Jacentem.

Charge on Letters of Horning. The will of letters of horning commands messengers-at-arms, as sheriffs in that part, to order the debtor to pay the debt within a certain number of days; and this the messenger does by leaving for the debtor what is termed a copy of charge; by which, in virtue of the letters of horning, he commands and charges the debtor to make payment of the debt, specifying the sum, and describing the voucher of debt as in the narrative of the letters of horning, and that within the days and under the pains expressed in the letters. This must be signed by the messenger (1592, c. 141). The date must be in writing (1693, c. 12), and the names and designations of the witnesses inserted. The form of giving this charge is regulated by the act 1540, c. 75;

and the cases provided for are charge is delivered personal form is simple. 2. Where found, and the charge is left In this case, it must be left dwelling-place, and with the dwelling-place; and that stated in the execution. 3. provided for by the act is cannot be found, and access that case, the messenger must ble knocks on the door, and of charge on the most path house. The execution returner is a certificate of through the form of deliver which execution must be signed by the witnesses, whose names must also be inserted. 1 the debtor is furth of the king may be given edictally, provided contain a proper warrant See Citation.

Since the Personal Diligence Act, c. 114, the use of letters of horning is abolished. That act provides, § 1, that decrees of the Court of Session and Court of Justiciary, and decrees on registered deeds, a warrant to charge the debtor to pay or perform; in virtue of the charge may be given; a must be returned in terms of schedule, § 83. A similar warrant is inserted in extracts of Sheriff, § 9. Extract decrees in Edinburgh also may, by 19 and 20 Vict. warrant to charge. See 6 *Geo. Charge against Superiors may be used by heirs, by a purchasers.

Charge by an Heir.—The charge is used against a superior, or a copyholder of a superior. 1. Against the Heir. The 20 Geo. II., c. 50, the heir of his special retour, may oblige the superior to letters of charge, to charge the superior to enter him on fifteen days he is bound to do on receiving and relief duties, and exhibiting sufficient titles; and this charge is enforced by personal diligence against the superior. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 79. 2. Charge by a Purchaser. When the charge is used against the superior, and the heir unentered, the charge must, in terms of the act 1 charged by the heir of the vassal to infeft himself within forty days, under certification that, should he fail, he shall lose the tenant for his lifetime; which has been explained to mean the casualties arising from the delinquency of the vassal, and besides be liable in damages; and should the heir fail to enter, the vassal may proceed to charge the intermediate superiors, until he comes to the Crown, from whom he will receive a title. Ersk. ib. § 80.

Charge by an adjudger.—Where an adjudger wishes to render his debt real, and capable of competing with other real rights, he must obtain infeftment; and, with this view, where the superior refuses to enter him, he must raise letters of horning (the warrant of which is contained in the decree of adjudication), and upon these charge the superior to enter him within twenty-one days. This was introduced by the act 1647, c. 43; and although that act was rescinded, the practice has continued; and the superior is bound to give an entry on payment of a year's rent of the subject. Should the superior neglect the charge, the next highest superior may be charged to give an entry to the adjudging creditor, and so on up to the Crown, from which a charter will be obtained, which will vest a feudal right in the adjudging creditor. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 25. As to the mode of rendering an adjudication the first effectual one, see Effectual Adjudication. See also Adjudication.

Charge by a purchaser.—By the act 20 Geo. II., c. 50, § 12, every purchaser possessed of a disposition with a procuratory of resignation, may demand an entry from the superior, on payment of the entry-money stipulated in the original charter, or of a year's rent. On the superior's refusal, the purchaser may apply to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, praying a warrant for letters of horning to charge the superior to receive him; and upon production in the Bill-Chamber of the disposition or other conveyance, containing procuratory of resignation in favour of the purchaser, warrant will be granted for letters of horning, on fifteen days' induciae, to charge the superior to enter the purchaser. Should the superior be himself unentered, the purchaser may proceed and charge him in the manner above explained.

This formerly was the only way in which a superior could be compelled to give an entry; for although the purchaser might be entered by confirmation, that entry was the voluntary act of the superior, and admitted of no charge at the instance of the pursuer. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3. § 30; Bell's Com. 5th edit. vol. i. p. 718; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 823; Ross's Lect. ii. 301; Menzies' Lectures.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 48, § 6, a superior may be compelled to grant a charter of confirmation in the same way and form as he might have been compelled to grant a charter of resignation. See Confirmation.

Charity; receipt of charity or parochial relief disqualifies to vote for a member of Parliament. See Alms.

Charter. A charter is the written evidence of a grant of heritable property, made under the condition that the grantee shall annually pay a sum of money, or perform certain services to the granter; and by our law it must be in the form of a written deed. The granter of a charter is termed the superior,—the grantee the vassal,—the vassal is said to hold the subject of the superior,—and the annual sum or service stipulated is termed the duty. Charters are called blench or feu, from the nature of the stipulated prestation,—a me or de me, from the kind of holding,—and original, or by progress, from being first or renewed grants of the same subjects. See Menzies' Lectures; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing.

Blench and Feu Charters.—In former times, the duty which superiors almost always required from their vassals was military service, and the vassal was then said to hold ward. This holding, however, was abolished by the act 20 Geo. III. c. 50; and since that act took effect, the only duties which it is lawful to insert in charters are blench and feu duties. A blench-duty is a mere nominal payment; as a penny Scots, or a red rose, si petatur tantum. A feu-duty is a consideration of some value. Charters containing these different duties are termed, according to their nature, blench or feu charters. Original blench-charters are not very common in modern practice. From the nature of the duty stipulated in them, superiors can derive no advantage from granting such rights, but, on the contrary, subject themselves to considerable inconvenience and expense, in so far as it is necessary for them to complete titles to the superiority in favour of themselves or their heirs, to enable them to renew the blench right after the death of the original vassal. Jurid. Styles, 3d edit. vol. i. pp. 10, et seq.; 24, et seq.; 4th edit., p. 16, et seq.; 41, et seq.

Charters a me and de me.—All charters were originally written in Latin, and one of the clauses began with the words, "Tenendas prædictas terras de me," to show that the grantee was to hold the lands of the granter, or to consider him as his superior. A charter having a clause in these terms was called a charter de me. It often occurred, however, that vassals disposed their lands to a third party, to be held, not of themselves as superiors, but of their superiors; and, for this purpose, they granted charters conveying the lands, to be held a me de superiore meo; and these were termed charters a me. As, however, the vassal had no authority to grant such charters, it was necessary to get them ratified by the superior, in order to render them valid. A charter de me, then, is a grant of lands to be held of the grantor; a charter a me, is one to be held of the grantor's superior. Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 143.

Original Charters, and Charters by Progress.—An original charter is one by which the first grant of the subject is made: a charter by progress is one renewing the grant in favour of the heir or singular successor of the first or succeeding vassals.

I. Original Charter.—According to its modern form, the original charter contains the following clauses:—1. The narrative, which contains the name and designation of the grantor or superior, and the inductive cause or consideration, onerous or gratuitous, which may have induced the superior to grant the right; and, where the consideration is pecuniary, the narrative also contains a receipt and discharge for the sum paid. 2. The dispositive clause, in which the superior declares that he has granted and disposed, and thereby grants and disposes, the lands to the vassal: it specifies the heirs who are to succeed to them: it contains a minute description of the lands, stating the county, parish, &c., in which they are situated; and when the superior means to reserve any right in the subjects to himself or others, or to make the grant under any peculiar conditions, such reservations or conditions are inserted here. 3. The tenendas, stating that the grantee is to hold the lands of the grantor as superior. 4. The reddendo, which expresses the duty in money or services to be paid by the vassal to the superior, with the sum which an heir, and sometimes a singular successor, is to pay for a renewal of the grant, termed relief and entry-money. 5. The clause of registration, which is only for preservation, and in the books of Council and Session. 6. The precept of sasine, which, now, is a mandate to any notary, to give symbolical delivery to the vassal of the subjects conveyed. And, 7. The testing clause. Besides these clauses, it is usual to insert a clause of absolute warrandice, which warrandice, however, is implied; and an assignation to the rents, which is only useful before infeftment is taken on the precept. Original charters are now seldom granted by the Crown. As most of the lands in the kingdom have already been inserted in charters from the Sovereign, the charters which the Crown is now called on to grant are chiefly renewals of former rights. Nevertheless, when property has fallen to the Crown as ultimus hæres, by forfeiture or otherwise, there is no other mode by which the donatary to whom such property may be gifted, can complete his right, except by obtaining an original charter from the Crown. But even such a charter is assimilated in its form more to a charter by progress than to an original grant, as it contains the clause termed a Quæquidem, stating to whom the property last belonged, and how it reverted to the Crown, and was gifted to the new grantee. Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. pp. 143-4-7; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. pp. 1-71.

II. Charters by Progress.—After an original charter has once been granted, and the vassal infeft on it, no person claiming either as his heir or singular successor can obtain a complete title to the subjects as they stood in his person, without a renewal of the grant from the superior. The requisites to enable the claimant to demand such a renewal from the superior differ, according as he is an heir or a singular successor.

1. Precept to an Heir.—When a vassal has died infeft in lands, his heir, in order to establish his right to them, must expedite a special service; a proceeding by which it is ascertained judicially, that the ancestor was the last feudal proprietor of the lands when he died, and that the heir is now entitled to them. On the production of the retour of such a service the superior is bound to issue a warrant for infefting the heir, which, however, is not in practice called a charter, but a precept upon a retour. In its form, this precept merely relates the retour, and grants warrant for infeftment; and it contains, of course, the usual registration and testing clauses. It is issued for the purpose of infefting the heir only. It is not, therefore, granted to his heirs or assignees; and he is not entitled to convey it, so as to enable another person to infeft himself by virtue of it.

When a subject is superior of the lands, and when he refuses to give an entry, the vassal may, by exhibiting his retour to the Court of Session, obtain a warrant for letters of horning, to charge the superior to grant the precept within fifteen days, on payment of the non-entry and relief duties. It is not usual, however, for subject-superiors to require the heir to expedite a special service; for, if they be satisfied, from other sources, of the heir's right, they may legally grant warrant for his infeftment without any other authority. The precepts issued in cases of this kind, are termed precepts of Clare constat. See Clare constat. Also Entry.

When the ancestor has died uninfeft, having a right to a disposition of the lands containing a procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, or to a decree of adjudication, or of sale, his heir, by expeding a general service, may place himself in precisely the same situation, and enjoy the same right as his predecessor; and therefore, like him, he may obtain from the superior a charter, as a singular successor, in the manner about to be explained.

2. Charters to Singular Successors.—These are of various kinds.

Charter of Resignation.—When a person has purchased lands from a vassal, to be held of his superior, and when he wishes to be placed in precisely the same situation in which his author stood, by becoming immediate vassal of the superior, this can only be accomplished with the superior's consent. To obtain this consent, certain forms are necessary. One of these forms, and that most consistent with feudal principles, is for the original vassal to grant a procuratory of resignation in favour of the purchaser, which is a mandate to a procurator to appear before the superior, and there, for the vassal, to resign the lands into the superior's hands, for the purpose of his granting them again to the purchaser. The resignation is made symbolically, by the procurator delivering a staff and baton to the superior. When the superior is thus reinstated with the property, he makes a new grant of it to the donee; and, in evidence of this grant, he executes a charter in his favour. This charter, as being preceded by a resignation of the subjects, is called a charter of resignation. It differs from an original charter, in having a clause called, from its first word, a Quæquidem, inserted immediately after the dispositive clause. The object of the Quæquidem is to specify that the subjects belonged formerly to the granter of the procuratory of resignation, and were, by virtue of that procuratory, resigned for new infeftment in favour of the grantee, as having right, either as the donee named in the procuratory, or as the heir or singular successor of that donee. It also differs from an original charter, in having a clause saving and reserving the rights of all parties, so that the superior incurs no new warrandice, not incumbent on him already by the original grant. At one time, no superior could be compelled, against his inclination, to receive, as vassal in the lands, any person who was not the heir expressed in the original grant; but by the act 20 Geo. II., c. 50, superiors are bound to enter all singular successors who have got from the vassal dispositions containing procuratories of resignation,—they receiving the fees or casualties to which law entitles them on a vassal's entry, viz., a year's rent of the lands, and, if they refuse, such donees are entitled to apply for letters of homing to charge the superiors to receive them. Superriors are also bound to give the new grant under all the conditions specified in the procuratory of resignation, in so far as they do not alter or impair their own rights. Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. pp. 344, 406; Ross's Lect. ii. 285. See Entry.

Charter of Confirmation.—Besides the mode just explained, there is another by which a donee may be received as vassal in the lands, in place of the disponer. In its modern form, the disposition includes the clauses of a charter a me; and when the donee has taken infeftment on the precept it contains, the superior may declare that infeftment to be equivalent to sasine on a precept granted by himself. This is accomplished by means of a charter of confirmation, so called because it ratifies and confirms the otherwise invalid title of the grantee. The clauses of this charter are all similar to those of an original grant, except the dispositive, which in this case narrates and confirms the title-deeds in favour of the donee; and, as the infeftment has already been taken, it contains no precept of sasine. Formerly superiors could not be compelled to grant charters of this description, but this was altered by the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 48, § 6. See Confirmation; Jurid. Styles, vol. i. p. 521; Ross's Lect. ii. 294. See Entry.

Charters of Adjudication and of Sale.—The mode of entering adjudgers and purchasers at judicial sales differs from that of entering a donee who has right to a procuratory of resignation, only in so far as it is not necessary to resign the lands into the superior's hands, to entitle him to grant the charter in their favour. The charter of adjudication, therefore, or of sale, is almost precisely similar to that of resignation, only the Quæquidem omits the mention of the resignation, and recites merely the decree and other deeds, by which the lands are transferred to the new vassal. Superiors were compelled to enter appraisers, on payment of a year's rent, by the statute 1469, c. 37; and this rule was extended to adjudgers by 1672, c. 19, and to purchasers at judicial sales by 1681, c. 17, joined with 1690, c. 20. Bell's Com. 5th edit. vol. i. p. 705, et seq. See Adjudication.

Charter of Novodamus.—It sometimes happened that an heir or singular successor applies for a charter, when he cannot exhibit a sufficient legal title to require the superior to grant one, though, at the same time, from immemorial possession of the lands, or other circumstances, there can be no doubt of his right. In such cases, superiors are in the practice of giving new grants of the subjects, under the reservation, however, of their own rights, and the rights of all others, as accords of law. As such charters are not granted upon the resignation of a vassal, or in obedience to a decree, they proceed a non habente potestatem, and therefore they are ineffectual till prescription has followed on them. Jurid. Styles, vol. i. p. 520; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 151.

III. Mode of Expediting Crown Charters.—To authorize the issuing of a Crown charter in favour of a singular successor, certain previous warrants were formerly necessary. The first and most important of these was the signature. This was a writ prepared by a writer to the Signet, containing all the clauses of the charter which it was wished to expedite. It was presented to the Baron of Exchequer, who held a commission from the Crown for this purpose, and was revised by him, to ascertain if it was correct. When the charter was a charter of resignation, the lands were resigned in the hands of the Crown, which was done by one of the officers of the Court of Exchequer, as attorney under the procuratorship of resignation, delivering a baton to the Baron; and instruments were taken by a notary upon the act of resignation. The signature was then signed by the Baron; and the cachet, which is a stamp containing a fac-simile of the royal sign-manual, was adhibited. When the charter was one of novodamus, or if it created a barony or the like, the signature was superscribed by the Sovereign. At one time the signature was the warrant of a precept under the Signet, directed to the Keeper of the Privy Seal. The precept under the Signet was prepared by the writers to the Signet, and framed in Latin: it was directed to the Keeper of the Privy Seal, and became the warrant of a new precept, under that seal, to the Keeper of the Great Seal, authorizing a charter in the terms of the warrant. These warrants were recorded at the respective offices, and retained by the officer giving out the new warrant. Thus, the signature, which was the warrant of the precept, was retained at the Signet; the precept was retained by the Keeper of the Privy Seal; and the Privy Seal precept was retained by the Keeper of the Great Seal, by whom the charter was sealed, and given out to the Crown vassal. But these forms were curtailed, and the precept under the Signet became the warrant of the charter. The Great Seal completed the charter, and rendered it equivalent to a formally subscribed private deed. In giving investment on the Crown charter, the precept might have been executed by any one as bailie, and any notary might have acted as notary. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 14, et seq.; More's Notes, p. clxvii.; Ross's Lect. ii. 117, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 9, et seq.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 757, et seq.; Brown's Synop. p. 2158.

By the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 51, signatures and precepts to Chancery are abolished, and Crown charters are now obtained at any time by lodging in the office of the Presenter of Signatures a draft of the proposed charter, together with a note praying for a charter in terms of the draft. Along with the note and draft there must also be lodged the last Crown charter, or Prince's charter, or retour or decree of service, and precept from Chancery, of the lands, and all the title-deeds of the lands subsequent thereto, together with evidence of the valued rent when necessary, and an inventory and brief of the titles. The draft charter is then revised by the Presenter of Signatures. Mistakes in former titles may be rectified in the new charter, the rectifications being first reported to the Judge in Exchequer by the Presenter of Signatures, and approved of by him. The amount of composition, or other duties payable to the Crown, is marked on the draft, and certified by the signatures of the Auditor of Exchequer and of the Presenter of Signatures. If no objections are made to the draft as revised by the Presenter of Signatures, a docquet is put upon it, signed by him, and also by the agent applying for the charter. The draft is then officially transmitted by the Presenter of Signatures to the office of the Director of Chancery, and is the warrant for the immediate preparation of a charter in Chancery, in terms of the draft. If the party applying for a charter is dissatisfied with the draft as revised, he may lodge a note of objections to it or against the amount of duties and composition marked on it. Such note of objections is laid before the Judge in Exchequer, and disposed of by him. A similar mode of procedure is adopted when the Presenter of Signatures refuses to revise a draft charter for want of a sufficient production of titles. The charter, when engrossed, has affixed to it the seal appointed by the Treaty of Union to be kept and used in Scotland in place of the Great Seal thereof formerly in use, or the Seal of the Prince if the charter be of lands holden of the Prince, and a separate seal be then in use for such charters, and is recorded in Chancery. The ceremony of resignation is now abolished, resignation being held to be made in terms of the procuratorship of resignation, by the ingiving of the note applying for a charter of resignation, and to be of the date of such ingiving; and the charter sets forth that resignation was made of the date of applying for it, and also deduces the titles according to the law applicable to such charters. Where a charter of novodamus, or a charter containing any new or original grant, is applied for, the party applying must first obtain the consent of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests, or any two of them, and written evidence of such consent must be produced along with the note applying for such charter in the office of the Presenter of Signatures. Such charter, too, after being revised and engrossed, but before being sealed, must be lodged with the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer, and transmitted by him for the sign-manual of the Sovereign, and the signatures of the Lord High Treasurer, or of the Commissioners of the Treasury, or any three of them. If the charter be of lands holden of the Prince and Steward of Scotland, and his Royal Highness be then of full age, it must be transmitted for the consent and approbation of the Prince, signified under his sign-manual. On this being done, the proper seal is attached to the charter. In competition of diligence, and in all other cases, the lodging of a draft charter and note is held equivalent to the former practice of presenting a signature in Exchequer, and the recording a copy of the note and an abstract of the draft charter in the Register of Abbreviations of Adjudications is equivalent to the former practice of recording an abstract of the signature in such register. All Crown charters are now expressed in the English language, and may be in the form given in schedule C annexed to the act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 51. Conditions of entail may be referred to as set forth in the recorded deed of entail, or in any recorded instrument of sasine forming part of the progress of title-deeds under the entail, the reference being made, or as nearly as may be, in the terms directed in the schedule C annexed to the said act. In the same manner, real burdens may also be referred to as already set forth in any recorded instrument of sasine forming part of the progress of titles of the lands.

IV. Mode of Expediting Crown Precepts.—Under the former practice, when the Crown was superior of the lands, the heir of the party last infest obtained a precept from Chancery, as a matter of course, on producing his special service. The precept was directed to the sheriff of the county in which the lands were situated, who acted as bailie for the Crown, and gave infestment accordingly; and by a special clause in the precept, he was directed to take security for the casualties payable on such an occasion. As these casualties were calculated to a particular term, the precept became null in consequence of a declaration inserted to that effect, if the infestment was not expedite before the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas immediately posterior to its date, and if infestment was not so expedite, a new precept required to be obtained. The sheriff-clerk had the exclusive privilege of acting as notary in expediting infestments, or such precepts.

Under the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 51, a precept from Chancery is obtained by an heir specially served, by his lodging the retour or decree of his special service, and a draft of the proposed precept in the form, or as nearly so as the case will admit, of the schedule B annexed to the said act, together with a note praying for a precept in terms of the draft, and lodging also the last charter or retour or decree of service, and the titles of the lands subsequent thereto. In revising the draft precept the same procedure is adopted as in revising Crown charters, and when revised, it is officially transmitted to the office of the Director of Chancery, and is the warrant for the preparation in Chancery of a precept in terms of the revised draft. The precept is then engrossed and recorded in Chancery, and delivered to the heir on payment of the usual fees and charges, and also on paying the amount of duties payable to the Crown or Prince. A precept may also be granted to an heir holding only a general service, on his lodging along with the last charter an extract retour or decree of general service, duly expedite and recorded, instructing his propinquity to the party who died last vest and seised in the subjects, or the character of heir otherwise vested in him, and establishing his right to succeed to the lands. The precept granted on production of such extract retour or decree of general service is expressed in the form, or as nearly so as the case will admit, of the schedule B annexed to the said act. Contrary to the former practice, it is now competent to obtain a Crown charter of confirmation, combined with a precept for infesting the heir to the party last seised in the lands.

Charter Party; is a mutual contract between the owners of a ship and the freighter, by which the freighter hires the vessel, either to perform a particular voyage, or for a certain specified time, at a stipulated hire or freight. Where the vessel is hired by time, the commencement and termination of the time must be accurately stated; and where hired by the voyage, the voyage must be properly described, and provision made for deviations or accidental interruptions. The charter party also specifies the freight, and whether it is to be paid by the voyage, or by the day, week, or month; and contains various other regulations and provisions arising out of the nature of the contract; and it generally contains a clause of registration, which may be the ground of summary execution without a previous action. Writing is not absolutely necessary to prove this contract. It may be proved by the oath of the owners; but before either informal missives or any other writings can be founded on in Court to prove the contract, such writing must be stamped. The stamp for a regular charter party, or for any memorandum or other writing equivalent to it, is, by 5 and 6 Vict., c. 79, § 21, five shillings. The owners are bound, by the nature of this contract, that the vessel shall be seaworthy, or fit for the stipulated purpose, and that the master and seamen shall be skilful; that the ship shall be at the destined port on the day appointed, and shall sail at the stipulated time; and that the goods shall be delivered according to the bill of lading, and in good condition, unless prevented by the act of God or the Queen's enemies. The freighter, on the other hand, is bound to furnish the cargo and pay the freight in terms of the bargain, and, in case of delay occasioned through his fault, to indemnify the owners for the lost time. These conditions, which may be termed the naturalia of the contract, may, of course, be modified or varied by express stipulation. Difficult questions may also arise as to the owner's right to demand freight pro rata itineris; but these and all other questions depending upon the construction of the special contract, or arising out of accidents in the course of the voyage, must depend so much on the circumstances under which they occur, that they can hardly be comprehended under any general rule. See the form of this contract, and a specification of the particulars deserving of attention in framing it, Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 564; vol. iii. p. 629, 2d edit. Chartered Companies. See Joint Stock Companies.

Chase. In the older law of England, a chase was a large extent of ground, open, and privileged for wild beasts and wild fowl. It differed from a park in not being inclosed, and also in this, that a man might have a chase in another man's ground. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Chattels; is an English law term, signifying all goods moveable or immoveable, except such as are in nature of freehold, or parcel of it. Tomlins' Dict.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 249. 5th edit.; Ross's Lect. i. 40.

Chaud Melle, or rixa; is a term in our ancient law, applied to homicide committed on a sudden, and in heat of blood. Skene defines it, a hot, sudden "tulzie" or debate, contradistinguished from forethought felony. Skene, h. t. The person guilty of this offence had the benefit of sanctuary, from which, however, he might have been taken for trial; but if he proved chaud melle, he was returned safe in life and limb. The privilege of sanctuary to criminals was abolished at the Reformation; but the act 1649 (re-enacted by 1664, c. 22.) seems to be held in practice to include the case of homicide in chaud melle. The object of that statute is to fix the different degrees of casual homicide, and to remove doubts in future. The cases specified are—homicide committed in lawful defence, or upon thieves or robbers breaking houses during the night, or homicide committed in the time of masterful depredation, or in pursuit of denounced rebels for capital crimes, in none of which cases is a capital punishment to be inflicted. But as homicide in chaud melle is not specified, it has been doubted whether the benefit of the statute ought to be extended to that offence. Our practice, however, has been favourable to such an extension; and this construction of the statute has the sanction of the highest authority in the criminal law of Scotland. See Hume, vol. i. p. 240, et seq.; Alison's Princ. 92. See also Homicide.

Checker; the Exchequer. - See Skene, voc. Scaccarium.

Chevisance; in English law, an agreement or composition; in ancient statutes, an unlawful contract. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Chief Baron; formerly the President of the Scotch Court of Exchequer, but the duties of that Court are now transferred to the Court of Session by the Acts 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, which declares that Court to be also the Court of Exchequer in Scotland. See Exchequer.

Child-Murder. The trial for child-murder differs from that of other cases of murder in nothing, except that stronger evidence of intentional violence is required; since, in unassisted births, the mother is sometimes unconsciously the cause of her child's death. The exposure and desertion of infant children may amount to murder, culpable homicide, or misdemeanour merely, according to the circumstances attending the commission of the offence. Hume, i. 299; Alison's Princ. 158; Steel, 102; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t. For the provisions of the statute regarding Concealment of Pregnancy, see that article.

Child-Stealing, or Plagium; is a crime punishable by our law with death. Hume, vol. i. p. 82, et seq.; Alison's Princ. 620. On restriction of the pains of law, a panel convicted of plagium was sentenced to 7 years' transportation; 2 Brown's Rep. 288; while another panel found guilty of the same offence, aggravated by previous conviction of theft, was sentenced to 18 months imprisonment; Irvine's Rep. 234.

Children; are either lawful or unlawful. Lawful children are those children who are either procreated in marriage, or afterwards legitimated by the intermarriage of the parents. The legal presumption is, that all children born of a woman who, at the time of conception, was lawfully married, are legitimate; nor can this presumption be defeated, except by direct evidence that the husband could not possibly be the father of the child. Thus, if it can be proved that the husband is impotent, or that he was absent from his wife at the time of conception, the presumption of legitimacy ceases. It seems to be fixed in our practice, that the period of absence necessary to elide the legal presumption must have commenced at least ten months before, and that it must have continued until within six lunar months of the birth of the child. The legal presumption, Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant is now held to be overcome by such clear evidence as will satisfy the Court that de facto the husband is not the father of his wife's child, although neither impotency nor the utter impossibility of access be established. See the case of Mackay v. Mackay, Feb. 24, 1855, 17 D. 494. It must always, however, be difficult to establish the illegitimacy of a child born in wedlock, without evidence either of the husband's impotency, or of impossibility of access between the spouses; but neither of these circumstances appears to be indispensable elements of the evidence. This also appears to be the law now recognised in the Courts in England. Children legitimated by the subsequent intermarriage of their parents enjoy all the rights of lawful children; and, of course, an eldest son thus legitimated will succeed as heir to his father's heritage, to the exclusion of a son procreated in wedlock. But if the parents are domiciled, and intermarry in a country where legitimation per subsequens matrimonium is not recognised, such marriage will not render their children, born before their marriage, legitimate, to the effect of entitling them to succeed as lawful children in Scotland. Sheddan, 1st July 1803, Fac. Coll., Mor. App. voce Foreign, No. 6; affirmed on appeal, 2d March 1808. See *Ersk. Children of a Marriage. In marriage settlements it is very common to destine lands, or to give provisions, to the children of a marriage, or to the bairns of a marriage, or to the heirs and bairns of a marriage. For the construction of the different terms, see Heirs and Bairns. Bairns of a Marriage. Destination.

Chiltern Hundreds. The Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds was formerly an officer to protect the inhabitants of a part of Buckinghamshire from banditti. The duties have long since ceased; but the office is nominally retained, and any member of the House of Commons, wishing to resign his seat, attains his object indirectly, by applying for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which is granted as a matter of course; and being a place of honour and of nominal profit under the Crown, his acceptance of it vacates his seat. The place is in the gift of the Chancellor of Exchequer. This practice in vacating seats began in 1750. Chambers' Election Law, h. t.

Chimney-Sweepers. From motives of humanity, chimney-sweepers have been made the subject of various statutes, the latest of which is 3 and 4 Vict., c. 85, 1840. Any one who shall compel, or knowingly allow, any child or young person under the age of twenty-one years to ascend or descend a chimney, or enter a flue, for the purpose of sweeping, cleaning, or coving the same, or for extinguishing fire therein, is liable to a penalty of not more than L.10 or less than L.5. No child under sixteen years of age can be apprenticed to any person using the trade or business of a chimney-sweeper, and every indenture to the contrary is null and void. The construction of chimneys is also regulated by the same act.

Chirographum apud debitorem repertum præsumitur solutum. The written voucher of debt being found in the possession of the debtor affords a presumption that payment has been made by him. This, however, is not a præsumptio juris et de jure, and may therefore be elided by an express proof that the voucher did not come into the hands of the debtor by the consent of the creditor. Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 3; B. iv. tit. 32, § 3. More's Notes, p. cxxv.; *Ersk. Chose in Action; in the English law, is a thing to which a man has only a bare right, or jus ad rem, as distinguished from jus in re, without any occupation or enjoyment. A thing sold, but undelivered, is the vendee's property, but only a chose in action. Bell's Com. i. 105, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 1338; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.; Brown on Sale, p. c. 6; Ross's Lect. i. 39, 177; 1 Hume, 79.

Christmas Recess; a vacation at Christmas, formerly of three weeks' duration, during which the Court of Session is adjourned. By the Court of Session Act, 20 and 21 Vict., c. 56, 1857, this adjournment cannot now be for longer than fourteen days; § 9. The Court rises on the Saturday before Christmas. There is one box-day appointed in this recess, and three or four days of it are usually devoted to the trial of jury causes. A. S. 21st Dec. 1661; A. S. 11th July 1828, 8th July 1831; *2 Geo. Church of Scotland. The Roman Catholic religion was abolished in Scotland by the Act 1560, ratified by the Act 1567, c. 2. After the Reformation, the form of church government inclined to Episcopacy or to Presbytery, as the influence of the one party or the other predominated; until, at last, by the Treaty of Union in 1707, Presbytery was finally established as the form of church government in Scotland. Immediately after the Reformation, the government of the church was given to parochial presbyters, under the control of officers termed superintendents. In 1572, the titles of Bishops and Archbishops were given to the clergymen who were then, or should thereafter, be ordained ministers of the cathedral churches. They had also the privilege of sitting in Parliament; but by 1592, c. 116, Presbyterian church government was established in kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies. Episcopacy was restored by 1606, c. 2, and gave place to Presbytery in 1638. Episcopacy was a second time restored in 1662; and in 1689 was again succeeded by Presbytery, which, from that time, has continued to be the established religion of Scotland. Presbytery being thus established, those Presbyterian ministers who had been expelled from their churches in 1661 were, by the act 1690, c. 2, ordered to be replaced; and the church government is declared, by 1690, c. 5, to be in their hands, and in the hands of the ministers and elders chosen by them, or whom they may thereafter choose: a general assembly is appointed, with directions to settle all the disorders of the late times, and a confession of faith is recognised. This act is confirmed as the foundation of the Treaty of Union betwixt the two kingdoms by the Act 1707, c. 6, and the confession of faith and form of church government, as established in Scotland by law, are declared to be a fundamental and essential condition of the Treaty of Union; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 5, et seq. Many severe laws were formerly enacted for enforcing conformity to the established form of church government. See Cook's Church Law Styles. See also Nonconformity.

Church. Churches, and other things destined to sacred purposes, are held to be extra commercium, and cannot be applied to uses of private property; yet, from expediency, it frequently happens that the situation of churches is changed, church bells and communion cups are disposed of, and new ones purchased in their place; and the parishioners also acquire a quasi property in the seats or area, for the special purpose of attending divine service. In a judicial division of the area of a church amongst the heritors, they are preferred, both with regard to priority and extent of choice, according to the amount of their valued rents. The burden of upholding parish churches and the walls of the churchyard is, by long usage, imposed on the heritors of the parish; and where the parish is partly within burgh, and partly in the country, the expense must be borne by heritors and proprietors of houses, in proportion to their real rent; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 8, and tit. 10, § 63. But although this is a burden which attaches to the lands, it is not properly a debitum fundi. Singular successors in the lands, and creditors, are not liable for arrears, but only for that part of the expense applicable to the years of their possession.

The transportation of churches from one part of a parish to another is regulated by statute, 1707, c. 9. Parliamentary churches are regulated by 4 Geo. IV., c. 79, and 5 Geo. IV., c. 90. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 701, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1164; *Jurid. Church, by voluntary contribution. By 4 and 5 Will., c. 41, it is enacted, that ministers to churches in Scotland, built by voluntary contribution, and erected into parochial churches, shall be appointed according to the mode prescribed by the church courts, and that no one having right to the patronage of the parish within which such church is erected shall have claim to the patronage of the newly-established church. But the patron of a parish, building and endowing a church therein, shall retain every right to which he would have been legally entitled before the passing of the act; and so, in the case of churches built by the patron and heritors, unless an objection shall be transmitted in writing to the moderator of the presbytery, signed by heritors who have contributed one-fourth of the sum laid out in building and endowment, in which case the said church shall be within the provisions of the act. None of the expenses of the new churches shall fall upon the teinds. One-fifth of the sittings shall be at rents fixed by the church courts.

By section 8 of the act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 44, entitled "An act to facilitate the disjoining or dividing of extensive or populous parishes, and the erecting of new parishes," it is provided that churches built or acquired at the expense of private persons may be erected by the court, on the application of such persons, into a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland, without any concurrence of heritors; districts may be marked out, designated, and attached thereto quoad sacra, and such district disjoined quoad sacra from the parish or parishes to which it may have belonged, and erected into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland; the minister and elders whereof are to have the status, and all the powers, rights, and privileges of parish ministers and elders, provided that the titles to the church shall be so taken and conceived that the church shall be inalienably secured as the church of the new quoad sacra parish in connection with the Church of Scotland, and that due provision shall be made for the maintenance of the fabric of the church, and the security of a competent stipend to the minister in all time coming. The 9th section provides for a portion of the sittings in such churches, not exceeding one-tenth, being set apart as free seats; and for another portion, not exceeding one-fifth, being let at a rent to be fixed by the presbytery; and for the remaining portion being also let under certain conditions. The same section also regulates the expenditure and application of the pew rents.

Church Officers. In Scotland there are no church officers, properly so called, except the beadle and the precentor. The appointment of the beadle in burghs belongs to the magistrates, and in landward parishes, it would seem, to the heritors; unless where it is otherwise provided in the decree of erection of a new parish; or unless there has been long contrary practice. The beadle usually holds the appointment of sexton and of bellman; but where the offices are disjoined, the same rule as to their appointment will apply. It does not seem to be clear, however, that, in so far as the beadle acts as session officer, his appointment is not in the kirk-session. The precentor, where it is not otherwise provided by the decree erecting the parish, is in the ordinary case appointed by the kirk-session. He is removable at pleasure. Dunlop's Parochial Law, p. 53, et seq. See Elders.

Church Judicatories. The judicatories of the church are kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies. The constitution of these shall be explained in their order: 1. Kirk-Session, composed of the minister of the parish and ruling elders. 2. Presbyteries, which include a certain number of parishes, varying in number, according to local situation and other circumstances, there being thirty parishes in some presbyteries and no more than four in others. The presbytery is composed of a minister and ruling elder from each parish within its bounds. With regard to Professors of Divinity within the bounds of a Presbytery the practice has varied exceedingly. It would appear that they are not necessarily members of presbytery; but the matter is at present being investigated by a committee of General Assembly. The number of presbyteries in Scotland is at present eighty-four. The inequality in the number of parishes of which presbyteries are composed produces this anomaly, that in those cases in which matters are decided in the General Assembly by a majority of presbyteries, a presbytery consisting of three or four parishes has equal power and weight with one which is composed of twenty or thirty parishes. There is a moderator of the presbytery chosen twice a-year, a clerk of the presbytery, and an officer to execute its orders. 3. Provincial Synods. These are composed of three or more presbyteries: the number of provincial synods is at present sixteen. Every minister within the bounds of the synod is a member of court; and the same elder who last represented the kirk-session in the presbytery is the representative of the kirk-session in the provincial synod. A communication is established amongst the different provincial synods, by sending one minister and one elder, who are entitled to sit, to deliberate, and to vote with the original members of the synod. The synod has a moderator, clerk, and officers of its own choosing. 4. General Assembly. This is the supreme ecclesiastical court, consisting of representatives from the presbyteries, royal burghs, and universities in Scotland, and from the churches in the East Indies connected with the Church of Scotland. The representation is regulated by the 5th act of Assembly 1694, which provides, "That all presbyteries consisting of twelve parishes, or under that number, shall send in two ministers and one ruling elder: That all presbyteries consisting of eighteen parishes, or under that number, but above twelve, shall send in three ministers and one ruling elder: That all presbyteries consisting of twenty-four parishes, or under that number, but above eighteen, shall send four ministers and two ruling elders; and that presbyteries consisting of above twenty-four parishes shall send five ministers and two ruling elders: That collegiate kirks, where there are two or more ministers, are, so far as concerns the design of this act, understood to be as many distinct parishes; and no persons are to be admitted as members of assemblies but such as are either ministers or ruling elders." And by a subsequent act (Assembly 1712, c. 6), it is provided, that when the presbytery exceeds thirty ministerial charges, it shall send six ministers and three ruling elders. The sixty-six royal burghs of Scotland are represented in the General Assembly by ruling elders; Edinburgh sending two, and every other burgh one. Each of the five universities in Scotland is represented by one of its members.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland meets by the joint authority of the Church and of the Crown, the meeting being appointed both by the moderator and of the Sovereign's commissioner. See Commissioner. The act 1592, establishing Presbyterian government, declares "it lawful to the kirk and ministers, every year at the least, and oftener, pro re nata, as occasion and necessity shall require, to hold and keep general assemblies." And the act 1690, by which Presbyterian government was restored at the Revolution, allows the general meeting and representation of the ministers and elders, according to the custom and practice of Presbyterian government throughout the whole kingdom. In pursuance of these acts, the General Assembly meets annually in the month of May, and continues to sit for ten days. The Assembly has a moderator, chosen by itself, who presides in its deliberations; a procurator or advocate; principal and depute clerks, agent, printer, and other officers. The annual meeting of the General Assembly is honoured with a representative of the Sovereign, in the person of a Lord High Commissioner. When the Assembly is dissolved, it is done first by the moderator, who appoints the time for holding the next General Assembly, and then by the Lord High Commissioner, who, in the Sovereign's name, dissolves the present, and appoints another Assembly to be held on the same day named by the moderator; thus uniting the civil and ecclesiastical powers of the state, which indeed seem to be indispensably necessary to the constitution of a regular Assembly. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 6.

It has been questioned whether the Commission of the General Assembly is not also a judicatory of the Church, established and recognised by the laws and constitution of the realm; but the point, although fully argued upon one occasion, has not been decided. See the case of Middleton v. Anderson, 4 D. 957.

The jurisdiction of the Church includes certain civil as well as ecclesiastical powers. The civil powers consist in the right which presbyteries have of pronouncing decisions with regard to manes and glebes, and the qualifications of schoolmasters (see Schools). The ecclesiastical powers of the Church of Scotland are legislative, judicial, and executive.

The legislative power has been explained under the article Acts of the General Assembly. It is sufficient here to mention, that the General Assembly has no power to pass acts affecting or encroaching upon the civil rights or patrimonial interests of the subjects, and altering the law of the land, and that the Court of Session has jurisdiction to afford protection and redress against any such incompetent Act of Assembly. Earl of Kinnoull v. Presbytery of Auchterarder, 16 S. 661, aff. 3d May 1839; M'L. and Rob. App. 220; and subsequent cases mentioned in Shaw's Digest, hoc. tit.

The judicial power of the Church consists in the infliction or removal of those censures which belong to a spiritual society; and in regard to the clergy, a judgment of deposition will have the effect of depriving the individual of the emoluments of his office as minister of the parish. But a difference takes place in the origin of the procedure, where it is directed against a layman, from what takes place when it is directed against a clergyman. The procedure against a layman of the established church must commence in the kirk-session of his own parish; and the judgment of the kirk-session may be brought under review of the presbytery, while that of the presbytery may be again brought before the synod, and from that the case may still be carried to the General Assembly. The procedure against a clergyman cannot commence in the kirk-session, because the clergyman is the moderator of that court; and the other members being inferior, he cannot be tried there. It is therefore before his superiors, the presbytery, that the procedure against a clergyman must commence; and the judgment of the presbytery may be reviewed by the synod, that of the synod by the General Assembly. It is by this gradual progress, from judicatory to judicatory, that the injustice of inferior courts may be rectified by the more unbiassed and enlarged views of the supreme ecclesiastical court of the country. This system of review differs from that in civil causes, from the situation of the judges, who have all an interest equally with the parties, to have the doctrines and principles of church discipline and order preserved entire. Although, therefore, in civil causes, the power of appeal rests in the parties, yet, in ecclesiastical causes, the members of the different courts have an interest that entitles them, as well as the parties, to carry the decision of their own court to the review of a superior one. Thus, a point may be brought before a superior court, 1. By reference: and then, in place of deciding, the inferior court refers to the superior court, and may sit and vote in that superior court; a circumstance which is an objection to this form of procedure, since the joining of so many members may give a bias to the decision of the superior court. 2. By appeal: where the party is entitled to bring the whole proceedings of the inferior court under review of the superior court; and in defending the judgment, the members of the inferior court are entitled, and in some degree bound, to defend the judgment which they have pronounced. 3. By complaint: where a decision appears to the members of a court to be wrong, the minority may enter their grounds of dissent in the minutes; and they may also, if they see cause, complain to the superior court, which will bring all the members of the inferior court, as well as the parties, to the bar of the superior court, which may decide on the cause in the same manner as if the cause had come before them by appeal of the parties. In the lawful exercise of their judicial powers, the sentences of church courts, in matters purely ecclesiastical, are not subject to the review of any civil court. But the Court of Session, at least in cases of flagrant wrong, and gross excess or abuse of powers, has jurisdiction to afford redress against an illegal sentence of a church court. Cruickshank v. Gordon, 5 D. 909.

The executive power of the church is exercised in a great measure by the presbyteries, though the supreme executive power remains with the General Assembly. The most important occasions of exercising this power are the settlements of vacant parishes, in which the General Assembly gives directions to the presbytery within which the parish lies as to the manner in which they are to proceed; or, when any reluctance appears on the part of the presbytery, the whole course of procedure is prescribed by the General Assembly; and the presbytery act in a ministerial capacity, and must implicitly obey the instructions they receive. See Hill's Theological Institutions; Hill's Prac. 86.

Church Rates; in England, a taxation or assessment laid on the parishioners to defray the expense of upholding and repairing the fabric of the church. The rate is usually imposed by the parishioners, convened by the church-wardens; and the vote of a majority of such meeting binds the whole parishioners. See Tomlins, voce Church-Warden; Wharton's Lex. h. t.; 4 and 5 Vict., c. 36; Steph. Com. 91. In Scotland, the burden of supporting the fabric of the church is laid on the heritors of the parish. See Church. Heritor.

Church-Road. It frequently happens that there are in the country bye-ways or paths, sometimes mere footpaths, and sometimes foot and horse roads, used chiefly, if not solely, by the parishioners in going to the parish church. These are called church-roads; and although statute-labour and turnpike-road trustees have power to shut up useless roads, or to substitute others for them, they are not empowered to shut up any horse or foot road to kirk or mill. Blair's Justice's Manual, 122, and authorities there cited. See Road. Highways.

Church-Wardens; in England, are ecclesiastical officers, chosen by the parishioners and minister jointly, sometimes by the minister alone, sometimes by the parishioners assembled in vestry, as custom directs, to protect the edifice of the church; to superintend the ceremonies of public worship; to promote the observance of religious duties; to form and execute parochial regulations; and to become, as occasion may require, the legal representatives of the body of the parish; they are generally two in number. Tomlin's Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.; 3 Steph. Com. 89.

Churchyard. The parish churchyard is, generally speaking, subject to the same regulations with the area of the church; and in landward parishes belongs to the heritors, for the special purpose of interring the dead of their families, and those resident on their properties. In England, a churchyard has been described as "a consecrated place entitled to public protection, and in which nothing should be done but under the direction of public authority" (per Sir W. Scott, Haggard's Reports, i. 19). In Scotland, a churchyard is not recognised as a consecrated place ; but it is a place which considerations of public decency require to be protected against outrage ; and which the heritors will be entitled to protect against any attempt at exclusive appropriation by parties using it as the place of interment of their family or friends. See Dunlop's Parochial Law, p. 58, et seq. ; Erskine, i. § 13. See also Burying-place. Gravestone.

Cinque-Ports. Those havens which lie towards France, and have therefore been thought to require peculiar vigilance. They have an especial governor, called Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and various privileges granted them, as a peculiar jurisdiction, their warden having not only the authority of an admiral amongst them, but sending out writs in his own name. This jurisdiction was preserved by the Municipal Corporation Act, 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 76. They are Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, and Hythe; to which are now added Winchelsea and Rye. The constable of Dover Castle is Lord Warden. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. ; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Circuit Court of Justiciary. The act 1672, c. 16, divides the kingdom into three districts, and appoints circuits to be made by the Justiciary Judges. This regulation is affected by different statutes, as 20 Geo. II., c. 43 ; 23 Geo. III., c. 45 ; 30 Geo. III., c. 17. The circuit courts of the southern district are directed to be held at Jedburgh, Dumfries, and Ayr ; the western at Stirling, Inverary, and Glasgow ; and the northern at Perth, Aberdeen, and Inverness. The court must remain at each place not less than three days ; and no business begun at any of the places must be left unfinished. There are two circuits in the year ; one in spring, which must be held between the 12th of March and the 12th of May, and another in harvest ; and under a recent statute there is an additional circuit court held at Glasgow, for criminal cases only, during the Christmas recess of the Court of Session ; 9 Geo. IV., c. 29 ; 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV., c. 37. By 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 8, the judges on circuit in Glasgow are authorized to sit separately in different courts. One judge may proceed to business in absence of his colleague ; and, when necessary, the circuit court may certify a case commenced before it to the whole Court of Justiciary for consideration ; but there is no right of appeal from the circuit. See Hume, vol. ii. p. 19, et seq. ; Bell's Notes.

With regard to presentments and information, in order for trial before the circuit courts, it is enacted, by 8 Anne, c. 16, that the sheriffs, magistrates of burghs, justices of the peace, and other inferior judges, shall hold courts at their usual places of sitting, on the 22d February and 22d July yearly, to receive information of matters criminal to be tried at the ensuing circuit, and to transmit written abstracts of the accusations offered before them, and the evidence by which they are supported, to the Lord Justice-Clerk and his deputies, forty days at least before the sittings of the respective circuit courts, so that indictments may be raised in due time. In practice, however, this duty has devolved on the Sheriff, who is bound to make immediate inquiry into the circumstances of every crime committed within the sheriffdom, as soon as his fiscal, or the injured party, shall lay a complaint before him ; so that in general the offender is in custody or under bail, and the precognition duly transmitted to the Lord Advocate, before the days mentioned in the statute ; Hume, vol. ii. p. 23. As to the jurisdiction of the circuit court in certain appeals, civil and criminal, see Appeal. Ersk. Princ. 13th edit. 32-3 ; Brown's Synop. p. 1155 ; Shaw's Digest.

Issues in civil jury causes may also be tried before one or more of the Justiciary Judges on circuit, or by any other judge of the Court of Session, at any circuit town ; twenty-one days' notice of such sittings being given by intimation on the walls of the Outer Parliament House, and in the lobby of the Court of Exchequer, and also on the door of the courthouse of the circuit town, and the door of the Sheriff's court in the other county towns of the circuit. 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 15 ; A. S. 9th Dec. 1615, § 7 ; 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 22 ; 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 11. See Jury Trial.

Circuit Courts. Circuit courts are established in Scotland, for the trial of small debt causes by the sheriffs, by 1 Vict., c. 41, 1847. See McLaurin's Digest, and Notes of Small Debt Act. See also, Small Debts.

Circumduction of the Term ; is the sentence of a judge declaring the time elapsed for leading a proof ; after which the party is precluded from adducing farther evidence. When the time limited for leading and reporting a proof or a diligence for the recovery of writings has expired, the opposite party may move for circumduction ; and the term will be circumduced, unless upon cause shown, when a prorogation may be granted. Circumduction will be opened up upon payment of a greater or less sum of expenses, wherever that course is fair and reasonable in the circumstances, Dickson on Evidence, 1017. Before judgment can be pronounced on the proof, the term must either be circumduced, or the parties must judicially declare their proof concluded. A judgment on a mere circumduction, not followed by any judgment on the merits of the cause or proof, is not a res judicata, but a mere judgment by default, against which a party may be reponed.

In the Sheriff courts, upon the expiration of the term for proving, circumduction is granted, unless sufficient cause for not proceeding be shown to the Sheriff, who may renew the diet, on payment of expenses or not, as he may think proper. If circumduction be granted, the party will not be reponed, except on cause shown to excuse his former failure, and on payment of an indemnification to the other party. When a proof has been reported, and an interlocutor pronounced, no further proof will be allowed, except on very weighty reasons shown, and on payment of expenses. If such further proof is applied for, the facts and the witnesses must be condensed on in the petition for farther proof; A. S. 10th July 1839, §§ 81, 82, 83. Where the proof is by oath of party, and he fails to appear, and no satisfactory reason be assigned, the term is circumduced, and he is held as confessed, and decerned against accordingly. He may be reponed, however, against a holding as confessed, in indemnifying the other party for his expenses. § 79. See Stair, iv. 46, § 6; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 32; MacLaurin's Form of Process, 32; M'Glashan's Sher. Court Prac., p. 287; Shand's Prac. 360. See Proof. Reponing.

Circumstantial Evidence; is evidence deduced from the existence of a fact, or of a group of facts, bearing immediately upon, and inferring the existence of, the principal fact which is sought to be proved. This evidence, on a superficial view, is often thought inferior to direct evidence; and there can be no doubt that it is a matter of considerable difficulty to draw the conclusion which the evidence warrants. But when that conclusion is correctly drawn, and every other hypothesis by which the facts may be accounted for is excluded, or shown to be exceedingly improbable, the conviction produced upon the mind is, and justly ought to be, as strong as if the same fact were proved by the most direct testimony. And it enjoys this decided advantage over direct evidence, that there is less chance of witnesses combining to establish a falsehood, and less chance of their escaping detection. In criminal cases the utmost caution ought to be employed in weighing circumstantial evidence; and until every other supposition, besides the pannel's guilt, which might have been attended with the same circumstances, has been shown to be morally impossible, i. e., so certainly false, that, upon the conviction of its falsehood, any one would hazard his own most important interests, a verdict of guilty is not warranted. But it is no reason to acquit a prisoner, that his innocence is not absolutely impossible, since no evidence, however direct and complete, will establish that. When the probability of the prisoner's guilt bears to his innocence a finite ratio, however great, conviction is not warranted, since the principle of sacrificing one innocent person, for the sake of punishing ninety-nine guilty persons, has always been repudiated. "When the proofs of a crime are dependent on each other, that is, when the evidence of each witness, taken separately, proves nothing, or when all the proofs are dependent upon one, the number of proofs neither increases nor diminishes the probability of the fact; but when the proofs are independent on each other, the probability of the fact increases in proportion to the number of proofs" (Beccaria, c. 14). Circumstantial proof of a civil contract is little favoured, as the party can, and therefore ought, to provide direct evidence. But in civil questions arising from delict, it is freely admissible; as in such cases it is not usually in the party's power to provide direct evidence. Ersk. B. iv. t. 2, § 34; Starkie on Evidence; Taylor on Evidence; Greenleaf on Evidence; Dickson on Evidence; Willes on Circumstantial Evidence; Alison, 78; Hume, ii. 383; Burnett, 524; Tait, 439; Steele, 52-63; Shaw's Digest, Hutch. Justice of Peace, i. 271; Taylor on Evidence. See Evidence.

Circumvention; deceit or fraud. All bargains, in which an intention to take undue advantage by either of the parties is apparent, may be set aside on the ground of dole or extortion, without proving any special circumstance of fraud or circumvention. But it is not enough that the deed challenged be merely hurtful and irrational; for, unless it be evidently oppressive, it is not reducible without an actual proof of dole, even although the granter of it be of a facile temper, if he be not absolutely an idiot. If, however, there be lesion in the deed and facility in the granter, the most slender circumstances of fraud or circumvention will be sufficient to set it aside. Stair. B. i. tit. 9, § p. 9; More's Notes, lix.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 27; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 455; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 141, 5th edit.

Citation; is the act of calling upon a party to appear in Court to answer to an action; or to give evidence; or to do some other judicial act. It is done by an officer of Court, or by a messenger-at-arms, under a proper warrant. Citations in the Court of Session are given by messengers-at-arms under authority of summonses passing the Signet, or under warrants given by the Court on petitions and complaints; and in inferior courts the citations are generally given by the officers of court, on warrants issuing from their respective courts. In the ordinary case, the citation must be given, and an execution returned, agreeably to the rules laid down for regulating charges. See Charge on Letters of Horning. Execution.

The copies of citation delivered to the party must bear at length, and not in figures, the day and date of the delivery thereof, as also the names and designation of the witness; 1693, c. 12; A. S. 8th July 1831, schedule V.; 9 and 10 Vict., c. 67. They must be signed by the messenger. In general full copies of summonses, down to the bill, require to be served on the defender; but there are certain summonses which may be executed by short copies. See Shand's Prac. p. 231; M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Prac. p. 180, both of which authorities are very full on the subject of citation and execution. Wherever a special form of citation is provided for by statute, it must be closely followed, and any deviation therefrom is, as a general rule, and especially in cases of a criminal or penal character, fatal.

Parties may also be cited edictally; that is, by a citation, formerly published at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and the pier and shore of Leith; but now, under 6 Geo. IV., c. 120; § 51, and A. S. 24th December 1838, by copies left at the office of the keeper of Edictal Citations; and lists of such citations are printed and published. See Edictal Citation. This form of citation is competent and necessary where the party cited, although amenable to the courts of this country, is resident out of Scotland; and it is enacted by 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 53, that a person, not having a dwelling-house in Scotland occupied by his servants and family, who has been absent from his usual residence forty days without leaving notice where he is to be found, is to be held as absent from Scotland, and cited edictally. A foreigner, having a landed estate in Scotland may be cited in this manner in any action relating to such estate; but the Court of Session, as being the commune forum of all who reside abroad, is the only court to which he can be competently cited. A native Scotchman, having no property in Scotland, cannot be cited edictally ratione originis; Pedie v. Grant, as reversed in House of Lords, 1 W. and S. 716. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 27, tit. 38, § 2; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 18 and 19, Ivory's edit. note 28; Kames' Stat. Law abridg. App. note 7; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 284-6; Brown's Syn. h. t.; Shaw's Digest. h. t.; Hume, ii. 50, 84, 242, et seq.; Ross's Lect. i. 237, 292; Dickson on Evidence, p. 609, et seq. See also Jurisdiction. Foreigners. Forum. Inducia. Edictal citation is necessary in several other instances: Thus, when a minor is called as a defender, his tutors and curators were formerly cited, not by name, but edictally at the market-cross of the head burgh of the county where the minor resided; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 8; and in the case of choosing curators, there was a similar edictal citation of all having interest, 1555, c. 35; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. pp. 5, 970. Now, by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 22, the forms of edictal citation, charge, publication, citation, and service at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, in processes of ranking and sale, and all other processes; and also the edictal citation of the minor's next of kin at the market-cross of the head burgh, and the similar edictal citation of the minor's tutors and curators, are abolished; and in lieu thereof such edictal citations, &c., are performed by the delivery of a copy thereof at the office of the keeper of Edictal Citations.

Where a party is not found personally, but is cited at his principal dwelling-place in terms of 1540, c. 75 (see Charge on Letters of Horning), care must be taken that it is truly the party's dwelling-place. Citation at an inn, or of a merchant at his counting-house, is inept. When a party has both a town and a country house, the one at which he is residing at the time ought to be preferred, though the execution of citation or charge at the other seems to have been sustained. A mercantile company is properly cited at its place of business; but whenever it is necessary to cite the individual partners, this must be done personally, or at their respective dwelling-places, or edictally, as the case may require. An incorporation may be cited when its office-bearers are met together, by delivery of a copy of citation to the preses, or by citing each of the representatives personally at his dwelling-place, or edictally in common form. See Menzies on Conveyancing, p. 285; Shand's Prac. 239.

In the inferior courts, the authority for citing defenders who are within the territory of the judge, is the warrant contained in the note of the summons, according to the schedule annexed to 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80. But it may be necessary to cite parties not to be found within the judge's territory, but amenable to his jurisdiction ratione rei sitæ, or on some other ground. This may be done either by obtaining letters of supplement (see Supplement) from the Court of Session, or by using the Sheriff's own warrant or precept after it has been first indorsed by the Sheriff-clerk of the sheriffdom wherein the parties to be cited reside. The same holds in the citation of witnesses and havers; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 24; A. S. 10th July 1839, § 16. Short forms of citations and execution in civil causes in the Sheriff-courts are provided for by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80.

Citation on a reference to Oath of Party.—Where a party is cited upon a reference of the matter in dispute to his oath, under certification that, if he do not appear and depone, he shall be held as confessed, he must be cited either personally by a messenger, or apud acta; that is, the day of appearance must have been notified to him in Court by the Judge. But if the party be furth of Scotland, or have no fixed or known residence, an edictal citation will be sufficient. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2. § 17.

Citation in Criminal Cases.—In criminal cases it is not sufficient that the party appear voluntarily. He must be brought into Court in regular form, and can plead any omission of form, the want of which cannot be obviated of consent. Citation in criminal cases is regulated by Sir William Rae's Act, 9 Geo. IV., c. 29. There must be served on the panel a full and correct copy of the libel, with the list of witnesses and the assize, to which there formerly was subjoined a short copy of citation, subscribed by the messenger. Instead thereof, the copy of the libel must have marked on it a notice (intimating the day of compearance), subscribed by the officer and a witness, in the form contained in schedule A. It is not necessary for the officer to subscribe any other part of the copy of the libel. The citation must proceed on a regular warrant issuing from the court before which the panel is to be tried, but the party executing the service need not have such warrant in his possession. Criminal writs and warrants may be executed either by a macer or a messenger-at-arms, or by any sheriff-officer of the county within which the service is to be made; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 6. Where the panel can be found personally, the citation must be delivered to him. Failing his personal apprehension, the copy must be left at his dwelling-place with his wife or servants; or, if access cannot be obtained, the officer must affix a copy to the principal door of the house; 1555, c. 33. In all cases where the panel is not cited personally, an edictal citation is also required by the act 1555, i. e., by open proclamation at the market-cross of the head burgh of the shire where the pannel dwells, and by affixing the necessary copies there. If no domicile can be found for the party, he may be cited edictally at the head burgh of the shire where he last chiefly resorted, by special authority from the court. If he be abroad, he must be cited by open proclamation at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith. An execution is of course returned by the officer. See Hume, ii. p. 242, et seq.; Bell's Notes, p. 222, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 312, et seq. See also Criminal Prosecution.

Citation for interrupting prescription.—The currency of either the positive or the negative prescription may be interrupted by a citation in a process. Thus, the positive prescription may be interrupted by a citation in a process at the instance of the party in right of the property, against the party in possession, for recovery of possession; or the negative prescription may be interrupted by a citation in a process at the creditor's instance against the debtor for payment of the debt. By 1669, c. 10, all citations for interrupting prescription are directed to be executed by messengers-at-arms against the defenders personally, or at their dwelling-places, and at the parish church, during, or immediately after, divine service; or if the defenders be furth of Scotland, then, at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, upon sixty days: but in practice this rule is disregarded. The same statute enacts, that all citations used for interrupting prescription, whether in real or personal rights, shall be renewed every seven years, otherwise to prescribe, unless the parties be minors; in which case the act is not to extend to them during the years of their minority. As this statute is limited to citations, if it should happen that the citation is followed by the appearance of the parties in court, or any other judicial step, it is no longer to be accounted a bare citation, but becomes a depending action, which will subsist for forty years without being renewed, unless it be an action limited by statute to a shorter period; e.g., an action on arrestment, which prescribes in five years. For the security of purchasers and other singular successors, the act 1696, c. 19, ordains that all summonses used for interrupting the prescription of real rights shall pass upon a bill under the signet, and specify all the grounds on which they proceed; and that the summons and execution shall be registered within sixty days, in a particular register to be kept at Edinburgh for the purpose; otherwise that they shall be of no effect in interrupting prescription against singular successors. See Ersk. B. iv. tit. 7, § 38, et seq.; Bell's Princ., § 615, et seq. 2007. See Prescription.

Citation; in English law, a summons to appear, applied particularly to process in the spiritual courts. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Civil Law; from Civitas, is, properly speaking, the law of a state. In this sense it is synonymous with positive or municipal law. But the term civil law is generally applied to the Roman law. The Roman law consists of the Pandects, and an abridgment thereof called the Institute; and of the Code, containing the constitutions of the Emperors, from Adrian to Justinian; and the Novels, consisting of the later constitutions of the Emperors. This law, which was the law at one time of all Europe, has materially influenced the jurisprudence of this, as well as of every other European state. But, besides this general influence on what may be termed the common or traditionary law of those countries, the Roman law is directly received as legal authority in all of them, to a certain extent at least. In this country, the establishment of the Court of Session, and the bias towards the civil law which the judges of that Court (who were principally ecclesiastics) had received, produced a very remarkable effect on the municipal law of Scotland. From that time our ancient common law gave place to the civil law, except in those cases where the principles of feudality were opposed to it. But, gradually, the statutory law, the feudal law, the mercantile law, and the principles recognised and established by the decisions of the Court of Session, have formed a system of wise and equitable rules, which leave to the civil or Roman law nothing more of its former influence than what naturally and necessarily arises from the equity of its principles, and the force of the reasoning on which its decisions are established. Stair, B. i. tit. i. §§ 12 and 16; Gibbon's Rome, cap. 44; Butler's Horæ Subsecivæ; Halifax's Analysis; Taylor's Elements of Civil Law; Irving's Introduction; Cumin's Manual; 1 Black. Com. 392; 1 Stephen's Com. 8, 11, 15; Colquhoun's Summary; Bowyer's Commentaries; Sanders on the Institutes. See Roman Law.

Civil List. This term is derived from the distinction which was, at the Restoration, made between the military and extraordinary expenses of government, and those incurred in the maintenance of the ordinary establishments of the country; the revenues appropriated to the latter being called the hereditary or civil list revenues. The term came afterwards to be much restricted; and by 1 Will. IV., c. 25, the civil list charges were confined to expenses proper for the maintenance of the Sovereign's household. See Tomlins, voce King, § 5; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

At the commencement of the present reign a Civil List was settled upon Her Majesty for life, to the amount of £385,000 per annum, of which £60,000 is assigned for the privy purse. In return for this grant, it was provided that the hereditary revenue should be carried to the Consolidated Fund.

By the Civil List Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 2, Her Majesty is empowered to grant pensions to the amount of £1200 per annum, chargeable on the Civil List revenues, and intended for the remuneration of those who have just claims on the royal beneficence, or by their services or discoveries have earned the gratitude of their country. 2 Stephens' Com. 591.

Claim. To claim is used synonymously with to demand what is due. Where a proprietor insists for what belongs to him against the person withholding it, he is said to make a claim. But the term has also a technical meaning in Scotch law, as applicable to the claim in a service, the claim of enrolment, or the claim by a creditor on a bankrupt estate.

Claim in a service; was the petition addressed by the heir to the inquest, in which he stated his relationship to the deceased, and prayed to be served heir to him, either in general or in special, or of provision, as the case might happen. In the general service, the claim stated simply that the heir was nearest and lawful heir in general to the deceased. In the special service, the claim enumerated the lands in which the ancestor died infest, with the particular tenure by which they were held, the new and old extent, &c., and stated the claimant to be heir to the deceased in these lands, and prayed the jury to find so. The claim in the service of an heir of provision specified the particular deed containing the destination under which the claimant prayed to be served heir. See forms of these claims, Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 32; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 780; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 337, et seq. The service of heirs is now regulated by 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, 1847. See also Service of an Heir.

Claim of enrolment as a freeholder; was the application made to the freeholders of a county, under the old election law, by a person who wished to be put upon the roll. This claim was addressed to the freeholders assembled at the meeting at which the claim was made. It stated the names of the lands, the titles thereto, and their dates, with the old extent or valuation on which the claimant desired to be enrolled, and required the freeholders to admit him, as being duly qualified. Before a freeholder could present such a claim, he must have been year and day infest; and the only meetings at which enrolments could be made were the Michaelmas head-court, and the meeting for election of a member of Parliament. In order to entitle the claimant to be enrolled at the Michaelmas head-court, his claim must have been lodged with the sheriff-clerk at least two calendar months before the meeting. But at the meeting for election, the production of the claim and titles mentioned in it, on the very day of the meeting, was sufficient. Wight on Elections, B. iii. c. 1, and App. of Cases, p. 13; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. p. 153. See Election Laws. For the mode of making claims for registration under the Reform Act, see Reform Act.

Claim on a bankrupt estate. A creditor claiming to be ranked on a sequestrated estate must describe distinctly the ground of his debt, and accompany his claim with an oath of verity, which shall specify every security which the claimant holds for the debt, whether over the estate of the bankrupt or otherwise; and where he holds no other person than the bankrupt bound, and no security, the oath must contain a deposition to that effect. See 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, 1856. See also Bankrupt. See Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 355 and 413, et seq. 5th edit.

Claim, under an English commission of bankruptcy. In order to enable a Scotch creditor to prove under a fiat issued against an English trader, he must forward to his agent in England an affidavit, setting forth fully the nature of his debt, accompanied by the securities, if any, held by the creditor, and a copy of the account, if any, between the parties. See Archbold's Law and Practice of Bankruptcy. See English Debt.

Clan Acts; a name applied to certain statutes passed in the reign of George I. providing for the bestowal of forfeited estates. See Semi. Abridg. voce Forfeited Estates; and for decisions upon the point, see Brown's Syn. pp. 732, 2357.

Clan-Macduff; the law of clan Macduff was a barbarous privilege, anciently enjoyed by any homicide who could claim kindred, as near as in the ninth degree, to the blood of Macduff, Earl of Fife. If such a person came to Macduff's cross, at the line of march between Fife and Strathern, above Newburgh, and near Lindores, and gave nine kye and a colpindach (a young cow), he was free of the slaughter committed by him. Skene, h. t.

Clandestine Marriage; is a marriage contracted without the due observance of the ceremonies which the law has prescribed, viz., the regular proclamation of banns, and the nuptial benediction pronounced by a clergyman properly qualified. By the law of Scotland, clandestine marriages are as valid and effectual as regular marriages; but the parties, celebrator and witnesses, are liable to certain penalties. By 1661, c. 34, the parties are liable to imprisonment for three months, and to certain fines according to their rank. The act 1672, c. 9, also provides a forfeiture of the legal rights of jus mariti and jus relicte; but this act falls under the general repealing statute, 1690, c. 27. See Carruthers v. Johnston, 11th Dec. 1705, Dict. 2252; Brown's Synop. 367. The witnesses to such irregular marriages are liable, by 1698, c. 6, to a fine of L.100 Scots each. The celebrator, by 1661, c. 34, is punishable with banishment from Scotland, under pain of death in case of his return; and by 1698, c. 6, which ratifies the former act, he is liable "to such pecuniary or corporal pain as the Lords of the Privy Council shall think fit to inflict." But this discretionary power has never been exercised by the Court of Justiciary. The celebrator formerly incurred the penalties of the statutes, if he was not a regularly ordained clergyman of the Church of Scotland, or an episcopalian clergyman admitted to orders by an English or Irish bishop, or if he had omitted to produce and record his orders, or to take the oaths to Government, as required by 10 Anne, c. 7, and 19 Geo. II., c. 34. So also a Roman Catholic priest was liable to the penalties if he celebrated a marriage. But by 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 28, it is enacted, that after the passing of that act, (25th July 1834), it shall be lawful for all persons in Scotland, after due proclamation of banns, to be married by Roman Catholic priests, or ministers not of the established church, and also for such priests or ministers to celebrate marriages, without being subject to any punishment, pains, or penalty whatever, anything in the above-mentioned acts of Parliament, or in any other act or acts of Parliament, notwithstanding. The penalties, however, are still incurred by the celebrator, if banns have not been duly proclaimed; but a magistrate, before whom the parties appear to declare themselves married persons, so as to complete the civil contract, is not accounted a celebrator in the sense of the statutes, unless he takes upon him to pronounce the nuptial benediction; the statutes having in view merely the religious part of the ceremony. The penalties are recovered before justices of the peace on complaint by the fiscal; and the parties appearing and conferring are fined; and the conviction is received as evidence of the marriage. In prosecutions before the civil judge for the recovery of penalties, the procurator for the church is made joint prosecutor along with the Lord Advocate. By 7 Anne, c. 6, the right of action is limited to two months after the transgression; but it is doubtful whether this limitation relates to anything but the pecuniary fines, and at any rate, it is for the benefit of the clergy of the episcopal communion only. Clare Constat, Precept of; is a deed executed by a subject-superior, for the purpose of completing the title of his vassal's heir to the lands held by the deceased vassal, under the granter of the precept. The deed was formerly addressed to the superior's bailies in that part, whose names were left blank, so that the office of bailie might be exercised by any one, but is now addressed to any notary public. It then sets forth, that, from documents shown to him, the superior is satisfied that his late vassal died infeft in the lands, which are described, and that the heir in whose favour the precept is granted is the nearest and lawful heir of the deceased. The holding and reddendo are then mentioned, and the deed concludes with a precept of sasine, directing sasine to be given to the heir. Where the investiture of the lands contains a destination in favour of heirs, different from heirs-general, the precept ought to be granted to the heir in his proper character; for although a reference to the particular investiture, with a general description of the heir as nearest and lawful heir to the ancestor in the lands described, may be construed to mean the precise character of heir called by the destination, yet it is better to avoid a question of construction, by describing the heir with the same accuracy which would be required in a service. The precept of clare constat may proceed on any evidence, whether judicial or not, which satisfies the superior that the person claiming the entry is heir of the last vassal. Where, however, extrajudicial evidence to the satisfaction of the superior cannot be obtained, a service of the heir in the proper character must be produced before the superior can be required to grant the precept. Where the title is at all doubtful, it is for the advantage of the heir to have a service; for although a precept of clare constat and infestment form a good title of prescription, yet the title thus completed may be challenged at any time within the period of the long prescription of forty years; whereas a special service cannot be challenged after the lapse of twenty years, and a precept of clare constat, when proceeding on a service, has the benefit of this shorter prescription. The superior's title to grant a precept of clare constat is limited by the terms of the investiture. He can renew the right in the person of the heir called to the succession by the investiture, or, where there is no special destination, he may give an entry in this form to the heir-at-law; but he cannot give it to a general donee, nor even to the heir of investiture in liferent, and to his son in fee. In order to authorize any such variation, the heir must first complete his own title; after which, if the destination does not prevent him, he may transmit the property in any line he thinks proper. It follows, from the nature of the precept of clare constat, that the heir cannot assign the unexecuted precept of sasine contained in it, so as to be the warrant of infestment in favour of any other person than himself. Precepts of clare constat are also excepted from the act 1693, c. 35, so that they became void by the death of the granters or receivers. This, however, has been altered by the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 48, 1847, which enacts that precepts of clare constat shall remain in full force during the life of the granter. See Precept of Sasine. The heir, by taking infestment on the precept of clare constat, becomes liable passive for his ancestor's debts, and at the same time he acquires an active title as to the subject contained in the precept, in questions with the superior; but it gives no active title as to any other subjects belonging to the deceased. Erskine seems to think that, upon principle, this mode of entry by private consent ought to have conferred no active title whatsoever. An entry by precept of clare constat can be given only where the last proprietor stood publicly infest; but where the infestment of the ancestor was base, a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat may be combined in the same deed, the superior, in the first place, confirming the ancestor's base infestment, and closing the deed by a precept of clare constat for infesting his heir. Stair, B. ii. tit. iii. § 14; B. iii. tit. 5, § 26; More's Notes, pp. clx. and ccvi.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 71; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 697, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. § 777, et seq., 1818, et seq., 1916; Ross's Lect. ii. 533; *Jurid. Claremethen. The law of claremethen was an ancient regulation concerning the warrantice of stolen cattle or goods, as to which see Skene, h. t.

Clarificatio; the clearance given by the verdict of an assize. Clarificatio debiti was synonymous, apparently, with the constitution of the debt by legal evidence. The word is used in the Regiam Majestatem. Skene, h. t.

Clause of a Deed; is one of the subdivisions of a deed. The ordinary clauses inserted in deeds are expressed according to certain technical forms which have been sanctioned by practice, and the legal import and effect of many of which have been settled by adjudged cases; so that it is at all times unsafe to vary the usual form of expression of such clauses. Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 276, 4th edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 289, et seq.; Brown's Synop. h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 141; Shaw's Digest, h. t.; *S. Clause of Union. See Union.

Clause of Warrantice. See Warrantice.

Clause of Pre-Emption; is a clause sometimes inserted in a feu-right, stipulating, that if the vassal shall be inclined to sell the lands he shall give the superior the first offer, or that the superior shall have the lands at a certain price fixed in the clause. It is settled that a clause of this kind is not struck at by the act 20 Geo. II., c. 50, by which clauses de non alienando are prohibited; but Erskine holds that, without a clause of irritancy, the clause of pre-emption will be unavailing against singular successors. This, however, does not seem to be well-founded. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 28, and Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 26, 5th edit. It is quite clear, however, that a clause of pre-emption can have no operation against singular successors, unless it appear in the sasine. Bell's Com. ib.; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 864.

Clause de non Alienando. This was a clause formerly in use to be inserted in feurights, by which the vassal was taken bound not to alienate the feu without the superior's consent. But by the statute 20 Geo. II., c. 50, § 10, all such clauses, restraining the power of alienation, are prohibited and declared of no force, even although inserted in deeds before the date of the statute; the Court of Session being empowered to modify an additional feu-duty to those superiors who suffer by the retrospective operation of the statute. And by Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1756, the indemnification is fixed at a feu-duty equal to a fourth of one per cent. of the valued rent of the lands, where the lands are valued, and where the lands are not valued, a sixth part of one per cent. of the real rent; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 28. It is settled that a clause of pre-emption does not fall under the statute. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 58; More's Notes, p. clxxxiii.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 26, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 3d edit. § 1720. See Clause of Pre-emption.

Clause of Devolution. A clause of devolution may be defined generally to be a clause devolving some office, obligation, or duty, on a party in a certain event, e.g., on the failure of another to perform. It is unnecessary to specify the various deeds in which such a clause may occur. By much the most important instance of it, however, in our practice, is to be found in the articles of roup in a judicial sale, and in other articles of roup, in which a clause is inserted, binding the highest offerer to find caution for the price within thirty days, and, on his failure to do so, devolving the purchase on the next highest offerer, under a similar obligation, and so on downwards; intimation of the devolution being made within ten days of the offerer's failure to find caution, and the offerer so failing being bound to make good the difference between his offer and the offer taken. This clause, which has been introduced solely for the benefit of the exposers, is attended with evident hardship to the bidders at a sale; for even the second highest may be kept in a state of suspense for forty days after the sale, and the remaining bidders for a much longer time. In construing the clause, it seems to be understood, 1st, That on the failure of the highest offerer to find caution, it is optional to the exposers either to re-expose the lands or to claim against the second offerer, although the soundness of this construction has been doubted. 2d, That where the exposers, on the highest offerer's failure to find caution, have made their election to abide by the sale, without re-exposing, and have made a demand upon the second offerer, the second offerer has full right to the purchase, and cannot be deprived of it by any subsequent attempt on the part of the highest offerer to implement his bargain. 3d, It is now settled that the exposers' claim against the highest offerer for the difference between the amount of the first and second offer is not of the nature of a penalty, but properly a debt arising ex contractu. Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 274, 5th edit.

Clause of Return; is a clause by which the granter of a right makes a particular destination of it, and provides that, in a certain event, it shall return to himself. A clause of this kind, where not protected by prohibitory, or by irritant and resolute clauses, has been held to be of the nature of a simple substitution, which may be defeated by the gratuitous act of the grantee or any of the substitutes. A distinction, however, has been attempted to be drawn between a substitution and a clause of return, in a gratuitous deed in favour of a stranger, the former of which, it is said, vests the right absolutely in the donee, subject to his power of disposal, whereas a clause of return creates a conditional right, which is not defeasible, at least by any gratuitous act, on the part of the donee or substitutes. This distinction, however, does not seem to be well-founded. See, however, the case of Mackay v. Campbell's Trustees, 13 S. 246. See also Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 45; Duke of Hamilton v. Douglas, 9th Dec. 1762; Mor. p. 4353, and Mor. Dict. title Fiar absolute, limited; Bell's Princ. art. 1705, 4th edit.; See also Substitution. Prohibitions.

Clauses Irritant and Resolute. These two clauses were devised for limiting the right of an absolute proprietor, and making effectual the conditions imposed on him, which otherwise would have inferred no more than a personal obligation, ineffectual against creditors or singular successors. By the irritant clause, the deeds done by the proprietor, contrary to the conditions of the right, are declared to be void and null; and, by the resolute clause, the right of the person contravening is resolved and extinguished. It was the union of the two clauses which accomplished what neither of them singly could attain; and by which, in practice, the conditions of an heritable right, whether an entail or other conveyance, were rendered real and effectual against the singular successors and creditors of the disponent, as well as against himself and his heirs. Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 14, et seq.; B. ii. tit. 10, § 6, et seq.; B. iv. tit. 5, § 7, and tit. 18; More's Notes, p. lxxx. et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 25; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 46, 4th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit., art. 720. Clergy. Before the Reformation, the clergy of Scotland were divided into regular and secular. The regular clergy had no charge of any congregation, but were bound to close residence in their monasteries: they were called regular, because they were bound to obey certain rules: These were the monks, under the direction of the abbots or priors; which order of clergy was abolished at the Reformation. The secular clergy were those who discharged the pastoral office over a certain district, as the bishops, presbyters, and deacons. But the introduction of presbyterian church government has reduced this order to presbyters alone. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 3, et seq.; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 50. Clergy. No person ordained a priest or deacon, or a member of the Church of Scotland, is capable of being elected member of Parliament; 41 Geo. III., c. 63. Clerical Error. A clerical error is an error accidentally committed in the transcription of a deed or other written instrument; and where such an error is obviously accidental, not in substantialibus of the instrument, it will not be fatal to its validity or efficacy. In judicial proceedings in the Court of Session, e. g., in interlocutors of Court, the general rule is, that after an interlocutor has been signed it cannot be varied or altered except by the Inner-House on a reclaiming-note, when it is the interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary, or by appeal to the House of Lords, where the judgment has been pronounced in the Inner-House. But where a clerical error has been committed, even although the interlocutor has been signed, the Court will authorize the error to be corrected. The principle seems to be, that the erroneous interlocutor does not express and embody the true intent and meaning of the Court. Such corrections, however, cannot be made on a motion from the bar, but must be prayed for by incidental petition. Kerr, 17th Dec. 1835, 14 S. & D. 180.

Clerk of Session; is the title given to the clerks of the Court of Session. There were formerly six principal clerks, six depute-clerks, and six assistant-clerks or closet-keepers, as they were sometimes called. But by the statute abolishing the Jury Court as a separate establishment, and uniting jury trial in civil causes with the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Session, the number of the principal clerks is reduced to four, who, in addition to their former duties, perform the duties connected with trials by jury and Bill-Chamber proceedings in the Inner-House. 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 13; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, §§ 5, 6, 7; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 37. By the first of these acts, the appointment of the depute and assistant clerks of Session is vested in the Crown; and in case of the necessary absence of any principal clerk, his duties may be discharged by any of the remaining principal clerks, or by any person appointed by his Division of the Court from among the assistant clerks in the Inner-House, or the depute-clerks in the Outer-House; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 18, § 8. The appointment of the principal clerks was always in the Crown; and by act of regulations, 1695, to qualify them for the office, they must be either advocates or writers to the signet of three years' standing. Their appointment, however, disqualifies them from practising as advocates or agents before the Court of Session; 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 9. Their duty is to attend the Judges in the Inner-House, and, under their direction, to write out the judgments or interlocutors, or other orders pronounced by the Court, to keep the books of Sederunt, and to receive bonds of caution ordered by the Inner-House, not in the Bill-Chamber. Two of the principal clerks attend each division of the Court. The depute-clerks are five in number, one, with his assistant, being attached to the bar of each of the Lords Ordinary. They officiate in the Outer-House before the Lords Ordinary, whose judgments or interlocutors they write out; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 12. Each principal clerk and each depute-clerk has a distinct apartment, or closet as it is called, in the Register Office, in which he keeps the processes to which he is clerk. The duty of taking charge of the Outer-House processes, of transmitting them to the judges to be considered, and of attending at the closets of the depute-clerks to lend out the processes, is discharged by the assistant-clerks or closetkeepers, who also attend in the Outer-House while the Court is sitting. The principal clerks have also assistants, who officiate at their apartments in the Register Office, and take charge of the processes depending before the Inner-House; and, by the act 50 Geo. III., c. 112, § 13, the duty of preparing the extracts of the decrees of the Court was entrusted to the assistants of the principal clerks; but that part of the 50 Geo. III. is repealed, and all such extracts are now prepared by the extractor of Court (1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 17; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, §§ 19, 20), who is placed under the superintendence of the junior principal clerk of Session for the time being. (See Extractor). The principal clerks and depute-clerks of Session are entitled to no fees, but have fixed salaries, the former L.1000 per annum each, and the latter L.400; 50 Geo. III., c. 112; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118. The emoluments of the assistants were formerly derived from fees which they exacted for lending out and receiving back processes, &c.; now each assistant-clerk has a salary of L.350 per annum. 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, §§ 10, 13, 30. See Shand's Prac., p. 102.

Clerk of the Bills. By 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 14, the charge of the Bill-Chamber department of the Court of Session was entrusted to two Clerks of the Bills, under the principal clerks of Session, and appointed by the Crown. Their duty was to receive and to present to the Lord Ordinary all notes of advocacy and suspension, and all bills which required to be laid before him; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 14; and receive bonds of caution, when such are required in the Bill-Chamber. By Act of Sederunt, 18th Feb. 1686, the Clerks of the Bills are made liable for the damage arising either from the accepting of an insufficient cautioner, or for refusing a sufficient one; but by the Act of Sederunt 14th June 1799, this act is repealed, and it is declared that, in time coming, the Clerks of the Bills shall be responsible for the due performance of their duty in "receiving or rejecting cautioners, according to the rules of common law and justice, applicable to the cases that may hereafter occur." Formerly, the Clerks of the Bills had also to present to the Lord Ordinary all bills for summonses or diligences, &c.; but, by 53 Geo. III., c. 64, § 17, the fiat of the Clerk of the Bills officiating for the time is declared to be a sufficient warrant for passing such bills. See Bill-Chamber. They write the fiat for personal execution under 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114. See also Act of Sederunt regulating Bill-Chamber proceedings, 14th December 1838, Beveridge on the Bill-Chamber; Shand's Prac. p. 109.

By 20 and 21 Vict., c. 18, the office of one of the Clerks of the Bills is abolished; and it is provided that there shall be in future only one Clerk of the Bills, who shall be responsible for the reputed solvency of cautioners, and for consigned money, and shall discharge in person all the duties attached to the office. § 2. There are an Assistant-clerk of the Bills, and two ordinary clerks, also authorized (§ 2) to be appointed, the former being empowered to subscribe and authenticate writs and documents in the necessary absence of the principal clerk. All these clerks are paid wholly by salary; and the fees charged and collected in the Bill-Chamber Office are accounted for to the Treasury; §§ 3, 4. The clerks in the Bill-Chamber are clerks in sequestrations (19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 43), and prepare extracts of decrees in sequestration cases; A. S., 20th July 1842.

Clerk to the Court of Teinds. There was formerly one principal clerk in the Teind Court appointed by the Crown. His duty was to attend the Court, and write out, under its direction, the whole acts, orders, and decrees. There were also a depute Teind-clerk and extractor for that Court.

By 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 26, the office of principal Teind-clerk is abolished, and it is declared, that the business formerly performed by the Teind-clerks shall in future be discharged by the first and second Depute-clerks of Teinds, the former being styled Clerk of Teinds, and having a salary of L.300 per annum, and the latter being styled Depute-clerk of Teinds, with a salary of L.250. Power is reserved to the Crown to appoint a person to be keeper of the records in the Teind-office, whose chief duty is to arrange and index the records and processes. The Depute-clerk of Teinds is to continue to discharge the duty of extracting acts and decrees pronounced by the Commissioners of Teinds. § 27. See Teind Court.

Clerk of Justiciary; is the clerk of the Court of Justiciary. There are a principal and two assistant clerks, whose duty it is to attend the sittings of the Justiciary Court in Edinburgh, to keep the books of Adjournal, and to write out the interlocutors and sentences of the Court. They have also an apartment in the Register Office, where they transact the business connected with the Justiciary and Circuit Courts. Besides the principal and assistant clerks of Justiciary, there are three circuit-clerks, one of whom attends the judges on each of the circuits as clerk of court. The clerks of Justiciary and the circuit-clerks were formerly appointed by the Lord Justice-Clerk, but are now appointed by the Crown.

Clerk of the Peace; is the clerk to the justices of the peace for the county. His duty is to attend the Justice of Peace Court, and to keep the books of record, &c. He must not practise in the court of which he is clerk; A. S. 6th March 1783. A principal clerk can only be removed or suspended by the Court of Session; the clerks of the peace in Scotland are appointed by the Secretary of State (1685, c. 16; 1686, c. 20; 1690, c. 28); and the principal clerk of the county appoints the depute and district clerks. Tait's Just. of Peace, h. t.; Blair's Just. of Peace, h. t.; Barclay's Digest, h. t. By 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 83, clerks of the peace and others are compelled to take the custody of documents directed to be deposited with them under the standing orders of either Houses of Parliament. May's Parl. Prac., 599. In England, the Custos Rotulorum of the county has the appointment of the clerk of the peace, who may execute his office by deputy, to be approved of by the Custos Rotulorum, and to hold the office during good behaviour. Tomlins' Dict., h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Clerk of the Pipe. The office of Recorder of the Great Roll, or Clerk of the Pipe, was an office in the Scotch Court of Exchequer, established by 6 Anne, c. 26; but as, by 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 103 and 112, a great part of the duties of the office was transferred to offices in England, it was, by 4 Will. IV., c. 16, abolished, and its powers and authorities transferred to the Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer of the Exchequer of Scotland. Tomlins' Dict., h. t.

Clerk of the Crown; an officer in Chancery, whose function it is constantly to attend the Lord Chancellor. Under warrant of the Lord Chancellor (in case of a new Parliament), or of the Speaker on casual vacancies, he makes out writs for the election of Members of Parliament. All returns are made to the Clerk of the Crown, which he cannot alter, except by order of the House, under a penalty of £500, toties quoties. The returns are entered in a book kept by him, accessible to all, on payment of a reasonable fee. True copies and the book are evidence. Tomlins' Dict., h. t.; Chambers' Election Law, h. t.; May's Parliamentary Prac.

Clerk of the Parliament Rolls; an officer who records all things done in the High Court of Parliament, and engrosses them in parchment rolls. Tomlins' Dict., h. t.

Clerks of Jury Causes. The duties of clerks of Jury Causes are now performed by the clerks of Session; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 32, § 37. See Issues. Jury Trial.

Clerks of Court. It would exceed the proper limits of this work to enumerate the different clerks of inferior courts. Every court has necessarily a clerk, whose duty it is to write out the judgments, and extract the decrees of the court. In like manner, each royal burgh has a clerk chosen by the magistrates, whose duty it is to keep a record of their proceedings, and to act as notary in giving sasine in burgage property. See Sheriff-Clerk.

Clerks to the Signet. The clerks or writers to the Signet are said to have been anciently clerks in the office of the Secretary of State, by whom writs passing the King's Signet were prepared. These writs were summonses ordering attendance on the King's court, or charging the party to obtemper the decree pronounced against him, or authorizing execution against his person or estate. When the College of Justice was established, the writers to the Signet were in the exercise of nearly the same duties in which they are engaged at the present day; and they are recognised as members of that college; 1537, c. 59. The duty of the clerks, or writers to the Signet, now is, to prepare the warrants of charters of land flowing from the Crown; to sign all summonses for citing parties to appear in the Court of Session; and almost all diligences of the law for affecting the person or estate of a debtor, or for compelling implement of the decrees of the Supreme Court. The writers to the Signet have further the privilege of acting as agents or attorneys in conducting causes before the Court of Session. Writers to the Signet, after ten years' practice, and certain probationary examinations on civil law, may be appointed Judges of the Court of Session. They are also eligible to several other important offices connected with the Court of Session. The Society is now under the Keeper of the Signet, who usually acts by a deputy-keeper; and the affairs of the body are conducted by this deputy and certain commissioners named by the keeper, from the members, with power to them to make by-laws for the admission of members, and the regulation of their conduct. By the existing rules, a person applying to be admitted to enter into indenture as an apprentice must be at least sixteen years of age, and must produce certificates of his having attended two full winter courses at one or other of the universities; one of these certificates being from a professor of humanity; and it being understood that these two courses are exclusive of medical, divinity, or law classes. The apprenticeship is for five years; and immediately on expiration of the indenture, the apprentice (having attained the age of twenty-one years complete) may apply to be admitted to trial, with a view to become a member. Every candidate for admission must have attended four courses of the law classes, viz., one of civil law, one of Scotch law, and one of conveyancing, with a second course of any one of these. And when admitted on trial, the candidate is first examined by three private examiners on his knowledge of Scotch law; and three months afterwards is examined by the public examiners in the hall of the society, and in presence of the commissioners, as to his knowledge of conveyancing. The apprentice-fee to the master is L.200. The payment by the apprentice to the widows' fund, L.50, 1s. 6d.; to the general fund of the society, L.81. 2s. 6d.; the total of indenture fees being L.331, 4s. At passing, the fees are, for the commission, L.25; passing fees, L.51, 6s.; perquisites to officers, L.3, 5s. 6d. Total expense of entering as a member of this body, L.410, 15s. 6d. Minute of Society, 9th March 1825; Shand's Prac. 83, et seq. See College of Justice.

Coal-Mine. A coal mine is legally a part of the lands within which it is situated, and passes with a conveyance of the lands. It may nevertheless form a separate estate. Thus, a proprietor may sell or feu the surface, reserving the coals and minerals, or dispose of them, reserving the lands; and the two thus separated become distinct feudal estates. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 5. When a superior feus lands under a reservation of a right to coals, it is usual for him to come under an obligation to pay the vassal surface damage for the injury which may be done to the lands by working the coal-mines, an obligation which, in case of a sale of the coals by the superior, will attach to the purchaser of the coal, in virtue of the principle by which every obligation affecting an heritable subject is transferred from the former to the present proprietor. A liferenter, whose right extends merely to the fruits, salva rei substantia, has no title to coal-mines without a special grant, even although they are open, and in course of being worked; nor will he be entitled to the rents of coal-mines unless the grantor of the liferent shows that it was plainly his intention to include these rents in the liferent. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 74; tit. 9, § 43; Moré's Notes, pp. cc, and cclxxi.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 62, 5th edit.; Bell on Leases, vol. ii. pp. 43, 120, 261, 4th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. arts. 1043, 1051, 1069, 740; *Hutch. Cocket; a seal belonging to the Custom-house; or rather a scroll of parchment sealed and delivered from the Custom-house to merchants, as a voucher that their goods are customed. The word also signifies the custom-house or office where goods to be transported were first entered and paid custom, and had a cocket or certificate of discharge. Tomlins' Dict.; Fleta, l. 2. c. g.

Code; a collection of the laws and constitutions of the Roman emperors made by order of Justinian. The code is the second volume of the Corpus Juris Civilis, and contains twelve books. Before the time of Justinian similar collections had been made, such as the Gregorian and Hermogenian, which are collections of the imperial constitutions from Hadrian to Diocletian and Maximinus; and the Theodosian, from Constantine the Great to Theodosius the Younger. There are several modern systematic collections of laws called codes, the most celebrated of which is the Code Napoleon. See Roman Law. Civil Law.

Codicil; is a writing by which the grantor bequeathes legacies out of his moveable estate, and which does not contain the nomination of an executor, or clauses which refer to anything but moveables, or which take effect till the grantor's death. The same form of authentication is required in a codicil as in any other formal deed. Codicils are usually executed in reference to a previous testament. See Testament. The same name is frequently given to those writings which alter the terms of settlements mortis causa of any description, whether they be in the form of testament or not. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 16 and 23; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1870; Jurid. Styles, 3d edit. vol. ii. p. 434.

Cofferer; a principal officer of the king's household, who has a special charge and oversight of other officers of the household, to all of whom he pays their wages. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Cognate. A cognate is a relation connected by the mother's side; and as there is no succession through the mother, a cognate cannot succeed as heir to the father's property. But where there is room for a tutor-at-law, who is chosen from the relations on the father's side, or agnates, as they are called, the custody of the child is given to the mother, or, failing her, to the nearest cognate. In the Roman law, a cognate is a relation through a female, and an agnate a relation through a male. Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 8 and 34; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 4; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 87, 386; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 2079.

Cognition. This term was anciently applied to an action for ascertaining disputed marches. The Court of Session was in use to remit the matter in dispute to the Sheriff, to be tried by a jury; but this form is now in disuse, and in place of a remit to the Sheriff, the present practice is to have the proof taken by commission, and reported to the Court of Session, who decide upon it. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 28; B. ii. tit. 3, § 73; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 48. As to the cognition, or cognoscing, of idiots and insane persons, see Breve. Idiot. Furiosity. Curatory.

Cognition and Sale; is the name given to a process before the Court of Session, at the instance of a pupil and his tutors, for obtaining a warrant to sell the whole or a part of the pupil's estate. In this action, the next heirs and creditors are called as parties; the summons must contain a statement of the nature and amount of the pupil's heritable estate; and, either in the summons or in the course of the action, a full state of the pupil's affairs must be exhibited, so as to enable the Court to judge of the necessity of the sale. When the action comes into Court, a proof of the value of the property is led, and a memorial and abstract prepared, as in the case of a judicial ranking and sale; upon advising which, the Court authorizes a sale either of the whole or of a part of the property, as it may think proper, by public roup, and at an upset price, not under the value proved in the course of the process. When this warrant is obtained, the tutors may proceed to sell extrajudicially, at such time and place as they think best. In this process, of course, there is no ranking of the creditors. It may also be observed, that a summary application to the Court for warrant to sell is not competent; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 17, note. In granting such warrants, the Court of Session acts as a court of equity; but it will not interpose unless in a case of great necessity, and where the estate is so burdened as to afford no reasonable prospect of beneficial management for the pupil without a sale. The Court at one time was in use to exercise a discretionary power in authorizing such sales, as appeared evidently advantageous to the pupil; but more recently, a different rule has been followed, and now the Court will not interpose on any views of expediency, however clear; Finlayson, 22d Dec. 1810, Fac. Coll. It was once the practice, in the case of sales by minors puberes, for the purchaser to insist on an action of cognition and sale at the instance of the minor and his curators, as a protection against a reduction on the head of minority and lesion; but the Court lately, "on the ground that a minor and his curators could sell without judicial authority, and that no decree of the Court could prevent a reduction by the minor, refused to interpose their authority as unnecessary;" Wallace, 8th March 1817, Fac. Coll. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 17; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 257, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 2084; Shand's Prac. p. 757, 940, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2 edit. vol. iii. p. 437; Menzies' Lect. p. 31. See Judicial Factor.

Cognition and Sasine; is a form of entering an heir in burgage property. Where the ancestor died infest, one of the bailies of the burgh, at the request of the heir, examines two or more witnesses as to his propinquity; upon whose evidence the bailie cognosces, and declares him heir to the ancestor, and infests him by hasp and staple, the symbols used in burgh tenements. The ceremony is performed by the heir's taking hold of the hasp and staple of the door, and entering the house and bolting the door; and, on his coming out, he takes instruments in the hands of the town-clerk, who always acts as notary on the occasion. An instrument of cognition and sasine is then extended, stating the res gesta, and closed by the notary's doquet. The instrument of sasine, by 1681, c. 11, must be recorded within sixty days of its date, in a particular register kept by the town-clerk. Where the heir, before infestment, makes over the subject to another, the cognition of the heir's propinquity, and the purchaser's infestment, may be inserted in the same instrument; and where the ancestor's right was merely personal, the cognition of the heir, the resignation by the ancestor's author, and the new infestment in favour of the heir, may all be inserted in the instrument of cognition and sasine, which is then called resignation, cognition, and sasine; Jurid. Styles, 3d edit. vol. i. p. 693; 4th edit. 571. The form just explained seems to be the regular method of completing an entry by cognition and sasine. By the practice of the city of Edinburgh, however, no witnesses are examined as to the heir's propinquity; but on the simple application of the party, and production of the last sasine, an instrument is returned, stating the cognition and infestment of the heir under the usual salvo jure cujuslibet. The same form of entry may be used by the heir of the creditor in an heritable bond over burgage subjects. The title of the heir in a burgage tenement may also be completed by precept of clare constat and infestment, or by special service and infestment; but the cognition and sasine is the simpler and more usual form. See Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 845; Jurid. Styles, vol. i.; Menzies' Lect. See also Burgage Holding. The act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 47, 1847, enacts, by § 26, that the service and entry of heirs more burgi in burghs, in tenements holden in burgage, shall not be affected by the act. By section 5 of c. 49, the forms of sasines in lands holden in relation to lands holden by the other tenures, in the case of infestments upon a disposition or other deed of conveyance, or upon a decree of adjudication or of sale, but no change is introduced in regard to sasines upon the entry of heirs.

Cognitionis Causa. Where the creditor of a deceased heritable proprietor pursues the heir, with a view to constitute the debt against him, and attach the defunct's heritage, and the heir appears and renounces, the Court will pronounce a decree for the amount of the debt, which is called a decree cognitionis causa. And in virtue of this decree ascertaining the debt, the creditor may proceed to adjudge the heritage of his deceased debtor. See Adjudication. So also in the case of moveable succession, the creditor of a deceased person whose debt is not constituted, may charge the defunct's nearest of kin to confirm executor to him within twenty days after the charge; which charge shall be a passive title against the person charged, unless he renounce; and then the creditor may proceed to have his debt constituted, and the hereditas jacens of moveables declared liable by a decree cognitionis causa; upon obtaining which, he may be confirmed executor-creditor. 1695, c. 41; Stair, B. iv. tit. 19; Morr's Notes, p. cclxxx.; *Ersk. Cognovit Actionem; in English law, is where a defendant acknowledges or confesses the plaintiff's cause against him to be just and true; and, before or after issue, suffers judgment to be entered against him without trial. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lec. h. t.

Cohabitation. The living together at bed and board; that is, living as husband and wife, and being reputed as such, will constitute a marriage. See Marriage.

Coif; in England, the badge of a sergeant-at-law, who is called sergeant of the coif, from the lawn coif which he wears under his cap when he is created. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Coin; is the current money of the realm. The coining of money is part of the king's prerogative; and he may, by proclamation, make any foreign coin lawful British money at his pleasure. The current coin of Great Britain is composed of gold, or silver, or copper. The denomination, or value of the coin, is also fixed by the king's proclamation. Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1334, et seq.; Thomson on Bills, p. 414, et seq.; Shaw's Digest; Tait's Justice of Peace, h. t.; Swint. Abridg. voce Money; Ross' Lect. ii. 235; Tomlins' Dict.; Wharton's Lec. h. t. See Coining.

By 16 and 17 Vict., c. 102, it is enacted, that any person defacing the current coin by stamping words thereon, or bending the same, shall be guilty of an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both; and that a tender of coin so defaced shall not be a legal tender; and the party tendering such defaced coin shall be liable, on summary conviction, in a penalty not exceeding 40s.; but the prosecution for such penalty must be with consent of the Lord Advocate.

Coining. By our earlier practice, all offences against the current coin of the realm, e.g., counterfeiting, vending, disguising, or importing it, seem to have been considered treasonable, and were punished capitally, whether the coin was gold, silver, or brass. By the treason laws of England, counterfeiting the king's money, or bringing false money into the kingdom, counterfeiting foreign gold or silver coin current in the kingdom by consent of the Crown, or wasting, clipping, or otherwise impairing or falsifying, the current coin, or possessing instruments proper for coinage, or conveying them out of the Mint, or marking, colouring, or gilding any coin or base metal, to resemble the current coin, &c., is treason; and the English treason laws having been extended to Scotland at the Union, offences of this kind must now be tried according to the forms prescribed in trials for treason; Hume, vol. i. p. 532. But there are several offences against the coin not treasonable by the law of England, which of course remain on the same footing in this country as before the Union, and may be prosecuted under the Scottish statutes. 1. The coining of counterfeit brass or copper money is not treason by the law of England; and although it was an offence punishable capitally by our old law, the punishment by the present practice seems to be arbitrary. To constitute this crime, it is not necessary to utter, or attempt to utter, the base coin, if the piece be formed so as to resemble the coin, and be likely to pass as such. The crime, however, is not committed if the piece or medal struck have some private and peculiar device, such as must distinguish it from the current coin, and show that it was not intended for deception. 2. The knowingly uttering of false British coin, counterfeited within the realm, is not treason; and, by our practice, the punishment is arbitrary, provided the person guilty of the offence has had no concern in the fabrication; for, in that case, or if he share the profit of the adventure with the coiner, he is art and part in the crime of coining. 3. The uttering of false British coin, counterfeited in a foreign country, and imported, is not treasonable, except on the part of him who imports it, with intent to utter it. The punishment of this offence is also arbitrary. 4. The same holds with regard to the uttering of imported false foreign coin, current in this country by proclamation. 5. Coining within Britain, or lightening there, foreign money, not current by act of Parliament, but by consent of parties merely, is a misdemeanour, punishable arbitrarily. See Hume, vol. i. p. 561, et seq.

By 2 Will. IV., c. 34, by which the former enactments relative to coining and uttering are repealed, and their provisions amended and consolidated, it is enacted—(1.) That if any one shall falsely fabricate a coin, in imitation of any of the king's current gold or silver coin, or shall gild silver, or colour any counterfeit gold or silver coin, or any piece of metal whatever of a fit size and figure to be coined, and with intent that the same shall be coined into counterfeit gold or silver coin, or shall alter silver coin, with intent to make it pass for gold coin; or copper coin, to make it pass for gold or silver coin; he shall be punishable with transportation for life, or for a term not less than seven years, or with imprisonment for a term not exceeding four years; and the offence of making or fabricating shall be held complete, although the coin so made or counterfeited shall not be in a fit state to be uttered, or the counterfeiting thereof shall not be finished or perfected; §§ 3, 4. (2.) If any one shall impair, diminish, or lighten current gold or silver coin, with intent to make it pass for current coin, he shall be punishable with transportation for a term not exceeding fourteen, nor less than seven years, or with imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years; § 5. (3.) If any person shall buy, sell, receive, pay, or put off, or shall offer to do so, any counterfeit gold or silver coin, for a lower value than its denomination, or if any person shall import into the United Kingdom any counterfeit gold or silver coin, knowing it to be counterfeit, he shall be punishable with transportation for life, or for a term not less than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than four years; § 6. (4.) The uttering of base coin is punishable with imprisonment for not more than one year; and the possessing at the time of the said uttering, or the uttering within ten days thereof, other counterfeit coin or coins, is punishable with imprisonment for two years; second convictions to make the culprit liable to transportation for life, or not less than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than four years; § 7. (5.) If any person shall have in his possession three or more pieces of counterfeit gold or silver coin, knowing the same to be counterfeit, and with intent to utter the same, he shall be punishable, for the first offence, with imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years; and for the second with transportation for life, or not less than seven years, or with imprisonment for a term not exceeding four years; § 8. (6.) Making, mending, buying, selling, or possessing, without lawful authority, any instruments used in fabricating current coin, with the knowledge that such instrument or instruments is to be used, or has been used in counterfeiting current gold or silver coin, shall be punishable with transportation for life, or not less than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than four years; § 10. (7.) Conveying instruments or engines for coining out of any of his Majesty's Mints, without lawful authority, is punishable with transportation for life, or for not less than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than four years; § 11. (8.) Counterfeiting copper coin, making, mending, buying, selling, or possessing instruments for counterfeiting it, or buying, selling, or putting off counterfeit copper coin for a lower value than its denomination, is punishable with transportation for not more than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than two years; and uttering copper coin, knowing it to be counterfeit, or possessing three or more pieces of such coin, knowing it to be counterfeit, and with intent to utter it, is punishable with imprisonment for not more than one year; § 12. Current coin altered, so as to pass for current coin of a higher denomination, is held to be "counterfeit coin," within the meaning of the act. The fact of the coin being counterfeit may be competently proved without the evidence of scientific witnesses. All that is necessary, is that the jury be satisfied by personal inspection, coupled with the evidence of credible witnesses, that the coin is bad; 2 Brown's Rep. 291. A party may still be indicted at common law as well as on this statute. Where a coin, intended to represent and pass as the current coin, bears the royal effigy and arms, it is not necessary that they be in every respect identical with those upon good coin; but where there is so little resemblance as not to deceive a person of ordinary comprehension, the offence is fraud, and not uttering counterfeit coin. See Steele, p. 151; Alison's Princ. p. 451; Bell's Notes to Hume, p. 130, et seq.

The act 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 69, passed to fix the standard qualities of gold and silver plate in Scotland, and to provide for the assaying and marking thereof, imposes the punishment of transportation for life, or for any term not less than seven years, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding four, nor less than two, years, for offences with reference to the stamping or marking of gold or silver plate. See also the following statutes, 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 9, as to the punishment of imprisonment being accompanied with hard labour or solitary confinement; 5 and 6 Vict., c. 47, as to the stamping of foreign plate admitted into this realm; and 56 Geo. III., c. 68, and 12 and 13 Vict., c. 41, which regulate the coinage of silver.

Collateral Security; is an additional and separate security for the due performance of an obligation. Such securities, of course, can never be made available to any greater extent than that of securing implement of the principal obligation; but in ranking on the bankrupt estates of principal and collateral obligants, the rule is, that while the whole debt remains unpaid, the creditor is entitled to rank for the whole upon the estate of each obligant, whether principal or collateral, whose obligation extends to the whole, to the effect of drawing full payment of the debt. Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 523, 5th edit.; Jurid. Styles, vol. i.

Collateral Succession; is the succession of the brothers and sisters of the deceased. In heritable succession, the brother-german next youngest to the deceased succeeds; or where the deceased is himself the youngest brother of three or more, his immediate elder, and not the eldest, brother-german, succeeds; and so on through all the brothers in the order of their seniority. Failing brothers-german, the sisters-german succeed equally as heirs-portioners, though there should be brothers-consanguinean; and failing them, brothers-consanguinean (that is, brothers by the same father) succeed, according to the same rules with brothers-german; and failing brothers-consanguinean, sisters-consanguinean succeed as heirs-portioners. Brothers and sisters uterine (that is, by the same mother, but by different fathers,) formerly had no right to succeed by the law of Scotland in any case. Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 6, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 8; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 385; Bell's Princ. art. 1661, et seq. See Succession. Conquest.

In moveable succession there was formerly no representation allowed. But by the act 18 Vict. cap. 23 (1855), the issue of a predeceasing next of kin come in the place of their parent in the succession to an intestate, and take the share to which the parent would have been entitled. It is provided, however, that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals of the brothers' and sisters' descendants. It is also provided, that the surviving next of kin of the intestate claiming the office of executor, shall have exclusive right to the office in preference to the children or other descendants of any predeceasing next of kin. If, however, no next of kin shall compete for the office, then such children or descendants are entitled to confirm. By the same act it is enacted, that, where an intestate dies without leaving issue, whose father and mother have both predeceased him, and shall not leave any brother or sister-german or consanguinean, nor any descendant of such brother or sister, but shall leave brothers and sisters uterine, or any descendant of such brother or sister, such brothers and sisters, or such descendants, in place of their predeceasing parent, shall have right to one-half of his moveable estate.

Collation; is a provision of the law of Scotland, by which the heritable and moveable succession of a deceased person may, in certain circumstances, be accumulated into one mass, and distributed in equal shares amongst his next of kin. Collation may take place either between the heir in heritage and the executors, or amongst the younger children.

1. Collation between the heir and executor.—Where the estate of the deceased consists partly of heritage and partly of moveables, the heir in heritage has no share of the moveable estate, if there be others as near in degree to the deceased as himself. But although this be the provision of the law where the heir chooses to accept the heritage, yet, if he considers it for his interest, he has the privilege of claiming a share of the moveables as one of the next of kin, provided he collates the heritage with the executors, who are bound to collate the executry with him; so that the whole estate, heritable and moveable of the deceased may be thrown into one mass, and distributed by equal portions amongst all the next of kin. The same rule holds in collateral succession: Thus, a brother who succeeds as heir, may collate with his younger brothers and sisters, and claim an equal share of the whole succession. Erskine seems to hold that the heir is entitled to this privilege, even although he be not one of the next of kin (Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 3); but the contrary has been found by an unanimous decision of the Court. McCaw, 28th Nov. 1787, Fac. Col., Mor. p. 2383. It is only the heir of line, or the heir ab intestato, who can be required to collate, in order to have a share of the moveable succession. The eldest heir-portioner who succeeds to an heritable estate by an entail, or by her father's destination, is entitled, on her father's death, to a share of the moveables without collating; Ricart, 19th Nov. 1720, Mor. p. 2378; for, although the decision, Balfour v. Scott, 15th Nov. 1787, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 2379, is of a contrary tendency, it does not seem reconcilable to principle, and has been disapproved of. See report of Lord Meadowbank's speech in the case of Little Gilmour, 13th Dec. 1809, Fac. Coll. It is settled that an heir of entail who is one of the next of kin, and not heir aliouqui successurus, is entitled to a share of the moveables without collating the entailed estate, although he has succeeded to it through the deceased; Rae Crawford v. Stewart, &c. 3d Dec. 1794, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 2384. But an heir of entail aliouqui successurus is not on-titled to receive a share of the moveable estate without collating the rents of the entailed estate; Little Gilmour, 13th Dec. 1809, Fac. Coll.; see also Anstruther v. Anstruther, 16th August 1836; 2 S. & M., House of Lords, 369; also 1 S. & M. 463. Where lands have been purchased and taken to a father in life-rent, and to his heir alioqui successurus in fee, with a power of disposal in the father, the heir must collate before he can claim any share of his father's moveable succession; Baillie, 23d Feb. 1809, Fac. Coll.; and it would also appear, that where a father has, during his own lifetime, put forward his heritage to his eldest son præceptione hæreditatis, the son, on his father's death, cannot claim a share of the moveables without collating the heritage so put forward; Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, § 28. It has likewise been held, that an heir cannot claim a share of his father's moveables from the executors without collating the heritage to which he has succeeded as heir to his father, although that heritage lies in a foreign country; Robertson, 18th Feb. 1817, Fac. Coll. Where a father has possessed heritage on apparençy, without completing any feudal title, and his son has made up his titles by serving to the person last infeft, the son can claim a share of his father's moveable succession without collating the heritage possessed by his father on apparençy. See the case of Spalding v. Spalding, Nov. 18, 1821, Hume's Decisions, p. 119. See also on the subject of collation, Fisher's Trustees v. Fisher, Nov. 19, 1844, 7 D. 129.

2. Collation amongst younger children.—The object of this collation is to preserve equality in the distribution of the legitim, and it is confined exclusively to the children entitled to legitim. Under this provision of the law, every child claiming legitim, who has already got a provision from the father, is bound to collate that provision with the other children, and impute it in part of the legitim. Every provision given by the father falls under this collation; e.g., tocher, provisions granted to the child on his or her marriage, bonds of provision, and all sums advanced for behoof of the child, except the expense of education, or inconsiderable presents made by the father. But this collation is not required where it appears to have been the granter's intention that the child should have the provision as a præcipuum over and above the share of the legitim. Neither is a child bound to collate a bond of provision granted to him by the father on death-bed, in so far as such provision does not exceed the dead's part; for, although a father cannot diminish the legitim by a death-bed deed, yet he may dispose of the dead's part in articulo mortis, even to a stranger, and much more to his own child. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 25. Where an heritable estate is provided to a younger child, he is not bound to collate it, for such provision does not diminish the fund from which legitim is taken. This kind of collation cannot affect the rights of third parties: Thus the widow cannot be required to collate legacies or donations made to her by the husband so as to increase the legitim, nor, on the other hand, are the children obliged to collate their provisions with the widow, in order to increase her jus relicte. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, §§ 26 and 46; More's Notes, pp. clxxxviii. and cclxliii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, §§ 24 and 25; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 431; *Bank. Collatio Bonorum; in the Roman law, was somewhat different from collation in our law. Any one of the sui hæredes who wished to participate in the succession, was obliged to collate or bring into the common stock, to be divided among the several heirs, or imputed as part of his own share, whatever he had received by gift out of the estate, during the defunct's lifetime.

Collatio bonorum, in English law, is where a portion, or money advanced by the father to a son or daughter, is brought into hotch-pot, in order to have an equal distributory share of his personal estate at his death. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Collation of Benefices. Collation was a form of introducing a parochial minister to his church, during the times of Episcopacy. It was done by writing under the hand of the bishop, approving of the person presented, and conferring on him the vacant benefice, and requiring the inferior clergy to induct him to the church. For the form of admitting a parochial minister, see Minister, Ersk. Princ. 54, 12th edit.

Collections in Churches. By proclamation, 29th August 1693, it is ordained that one-half of the sums collected at parish churches, and of the dues received by the kirk-session, shall be paid over into the general fund for the support of the poor. The other half has generally been applied for the temporary relief of sudden distress. Collections at dissenting meeting-houses are entirely at the disposal of the congregation.

By the Poor-Law Act, 8 and 9 Vict., c. 83, § 54, in all parishes in which it has been agreed that an assessment should be levied for the relief of the poor, the whole ordinary church collections are declared to belong to, and to be at the disposal of, the kirk-session of each parish, but to be applied, however, to no other purposes than those to which they were before the date of the act in whole or in part legally applicable. See Dunlop's Parochial Law, p. 82.

College of Justice. The term college, which, in general, is applied to a society of learned men associated for scientific purposes, has been applied to the Supreme Civil Court, composed of the Lords of Council and Session, and of the members and officers of court. This court receives the title of College of Justice in the act 1537, c. 36, and the judges of it that of Senators, 1540, c. 93. The judges consisted originally of seven churchmen and seven laymen, with a president, the Abbot of Cambuskenneth being the first president; and, from the act 1579, c. 93, it appears that, at the institution of the court, the president must have been a clergyman. By the Treaty of Union, art. 19, no person can be appointed a judge of this court who has not served as an advocate or principal clerk of session for five years, or as a writer to the Signet for ten; and in the case of a writer to the Signet, he must undergo the ordinary trials on the Roman law, and be found qualified two years before he can be named. The judge must be at the least twenty-five years of age. The admission is made by the judges, in virtue of a letter directed to them by the Sovereign, requiring them to try the qualifications of the nominee, and to admit him. The form of trial is laid down by an Act of Sederunt, July 31, 1674. It consists in the presentee, or Lord Probationer as he is called, hearing, and reporting, and delivering an opinion on, certain of the causes depending in court. And although this injunction to make trial of his qualifications seems to imply a power of rejecting him, yet the court are deprived of the power of rejecting the presentee, by the act 10 Geo. I., c. 19. It was anciently the practice to name extraordinary Lords, whose number was increased to no fewer than seven or eight. But James VI., by a letter recorded in the books of Sederunt, March 28, 1617, promised to restrict himself to the nomination of only three or four, in terms of the act 1537; and it is not till the 10 Geo. I., c. 19, that the power of naming these extraordinary Lords was renounced. The proper number of judges, until the stat. 1 Will. IV., c. 69, was fifteen, and is now thirteen; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 12, et seq. See Session. In addition to the judges, the College of Justice, by Act of Sederunt, 23d Feb. 1687, includes the advocates, clerks of session, clerks of the bills, writers to the signet, deputies of the clerks of session who serve in the Outer-House, their substitutes, one in each clerk's office, the depute-clerks of the bills, the clerks of Exchequer, the directors of Chancery, their depute and two clerks, the writer to the privy seal and his depute, the clerks to the general registers of sasines and hornings, the macers of the Court of Session, the keeper of the minute-book, the keeper of the rolls of the Inner and Outer House, one clerk to each of the judges, one clerk to each advocate, the extractors in the Register Office, and the keeper of the Advocates' Library. The barons and members of the Scotch Court of Exchequer were members of the College of Justice by 6 Anne, c. 26, § 11; the Lords Commissioners and officers of the Jury Court by 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 36; and the keeper of the judicial records of the Court of Session, the assistants to the principal clerks of session, the auditor of the Court of Session, and the collector of the fee fund, are, by 1 and 2 Geo. IV., ex officio members of the College of Justice. The privileges of the College of Justice, according to several acts of the Scotch Parliament, consisted in a general immunity from taxation. No such general immunity, however, is now claimed; and the privileges now consist of an exemption from watching and warding; from payment of the annuity for ministers' stipends; from all the city imposts on goods carried to or from the city; and, lastly, from the civil jurisdiction of the magistrates. The privilege of suing in the Court of Session was abolished by the Court of Session Act, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 17, 1850; and the privilege of exemption from the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court was abolished by the Sheriff Court Act, 16 and 17 Vict., cap. 80, § 48, 1853. In so far as the privileges of the College of Justice entitle the members to exemption from police assessments for watching, cleaning, and lighting the city of Edinburgh, they have been renounced by the members; and, by the police statute, the assessment is levied from them in the same manner as from the rest of the inhabitants. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 3; B. iv. tit. 1, § 21; *Ersk. Collegiate Church; was a church founded by a person of property, at his private expense, in which certain canons or prebendaries officiated under a head præpositus or provost. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 3.

Colliers and Salters. The workmen at coal-pits and salt-works in Scotland were formerly in a state of servitude, similar to that of the adscripti of the Romans, and the ancient nativi, or bondmen of this country. Colliers and salters were bound by the law itself, independent of paction, merely by entering to a coal-work or salt-work, to perpetual service there; and in case of sale or alienation of the ground on which such works were situated, the right to the service of these workmen passed to the purchaser as fundo annexum, without any express grant. But by the statute 15 Geo. III., c. 28, it was declared, that after the 1st July 1775, they should be no otherwise bound than as other workmen, and the benefit of the act 1701 was extended to them. The object of this statute, however, having been in a great measure defeated, partly by the nature of its provisions, and partly by transactions between the workmen and their masters, by which their bondage was continued, it was provided by the act 39 Geo. III., c. 56, that all the colliers in Scotland who were bound colliers at the time of the act 15 Geo. III., should be free from their servitude; and all action is denied to coalmasters for money advanced to colliers prior to, or during their service, with a view to their engagement at the works, except only sums advanced during their service for the support of their families in case of sickness, for which advances the coalmaster may retain from their weekly wages one-twelfth of the sums so advanced, till the principal and interest be repaid; and the master has action for the balance in case the term of service end before the advance is repaid. Persons seducing, or attempting to seduce colliers from Great Britain, are to be punished in the same manner as persons seducing manufacturers. In questions under the act no coalmaster or lessee of coals can act as a justice. *Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 61; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 114; Jurid. Styles, 3d edit. vol. ii. p. 160; Watson's Stat. Collision of Ships; is the collision of one vessel against another, whereby the ship or cargo suffers damage. The question, whether the collision has been caused by accident, or by design, or through negligence, must necessarily depend upon the circumstances under which it happens; but where it is clear that a fault has been committed, it is settled that the owners of the vessel in fault must answer for the damage resulting from it, at least to the value of the ship. Where the loss or damage arises from pure accident, or the act of God, as it is termed, the rule is, that the loss falls where it lights. Where there may have been a fault, but it is impossible to say to whom the blame attaches, the case seems to be considered as one of average loss, or contribution, in which both ships are to be taken into account, so as to divide the loss equally; although there is some difference amongst authorities as to whether the ships are to contribute equally, or in proportion to their respective values. But however that question may be determined, it rather appears to be fixed that the contribution is confined exclusively to the ships, and that no share either of the benefit or of the loss arising from the contribution falls upon the cargo. In questions between the owners of the ship and the owners of the cargo, if the damage has arisen from the fault of the master or mariners, the shippers are entitled to claim indemnification from the master and owners. On the other hand, if the loss be accidental, it is a mere peril of the sea, which forms an exception in the charter party, and must fall where it lights. In like manner, if the injury to the cargo has arisen from an inscrutable accident, which, as between the ships, gives rise to a claim for contribution, it is settled, in so far as the cargo is concerned, that this also is a mere peril of the sea within the exception of the charter party. See, on this subject, Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 579, et seq., fifth edit.

Collistridium; the "joughs" or collar round the neck, with which a delinquent is bound to the pillory or stocks. Skene, h. t.

Collusion; is a deceitful or fraudulent agreement between two or more persons to defraud a third party of his right. When proved, it has the effect, at common law, of voiding any transaction in which it occurs. Arrangements between bankrupts and their creditors, on the eve of bankruptcy, present the most frequent instances of collusion; and as the proof in such cases is necessarily difficult, our bankrupt statutes have created certain legal presumptions of collusion. Such are the provisions of the act 1621, c. 18, as to alienations to conjunct and confident persons, and of the act 1696, c. 5, regarding securities granted within sixty days of bankruptcy, by which presumptions of collusion and fraud are established. Independently, however, of those statutes, wherever collusion can be proved, or where the transaction is of such a nature as to imply fraud or collusion, it is reducible at common law: such are conveyances omnium bonorum to the prejudice of creditors, or such conveyances as necessarily render the debtor insolvent; payment by anticipation to a favoured creditor on the approach of bankruptcy; securities given on the approach of bankruptcy, accompanied with concealment or false appearances; arrangements for granting preferences by circuitous transactions or otherwise; these, and all similar transactions in which there is either direct evidence of collusion, or conclusive real evidence in the nature of the transaction itself, are reducible at common law, although they should not fall within the letter of any of the bankrupt statutes. Combat. Single combat was anciently admitted as a legal mode of proof, both in criminal and civil actions; and this kind of evidence appears to have been received as far down as the reign of Robert III. in questions regarding capital crimes. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 2; Ross's Lect. ii. 136. See Duelling.

Combination. A combination amongst workmen to raise their wages, when attended with tumultuary assemblages or violence, is a crime at common law; and by 39 and 40 Geo. III., c. 106, justices of peace were vested with power to punish summarily, by fine and imprisonment, combinations, whether on the part of workmen against their masters, or of masters against their workmen. It was always doubtful, however, whether that statute extended to Scotland; and at any rate, by 6 Geo. IV., c. 129, the previously existing statutes relative to combinations were repealed; and amongst other provisions, it is thereby declared, that a peaceable meeting, for the sole purpose of determining the wages to be given or asked, shall not subject those attending it to the punishments awarded by this act; but that violence, threats, intimidation, molestation, or the like, exercised towards workmen or others, to make them join an association, or to prevent them from hiring themselves out, is punishable with imprisonment for not more than three months, with or without hard labour. Comedian; an actor or actress. The salary of a comedian is held to be alimentary, and cannot be attached, except in so far as it exceeds what is necessary for subsistence; although the debtor may be incarcerated for the debt, and thus forced to bargain with his creditors; Bell's Com., vol. i. p. 131, 5th edit. It is not hamesucken to assault a comedian in a play-house; Hume, vol. i. p. 313. A copy of every new play, or addition to an old play, must be sent to the Lord Chamberlain seven days before it is acted, by whom it may be prohibited; 6 and 7 Vict., c. 68, § 12. The same statute repeals the Act 10 Geo. II., c. 28, under which players had been exposed to be treated as rogues and vagabonds.

Comes; or Earl, was an ancient officer with territorial jurisdiction; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 1.

Comitas; as used in international law, signifies the courtesy of nations, by which effect is given in one country to the laws and institutions of another, in questions arising between the natives of both. In consequence of the intimate connections and relations of small states with each other on the Continent, such questions are there frequent; and many treaties have been written on the Confictus Legum, and the Comitas, by which they are reconciled. See Foreign.

Commendator. During Popery the Commendator was the person by whom the fruits of a benefice were levied during a vacancy. He was properly a steward or trustee; but the Pope, who was entitled to grant the higher benefices in commendam, abused the power, and gave them to commendators for their lives. This abuse led to a prohibition of all commendams, excepting those granted by bishops for a term not exceeding six months. 1466, c. 3; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 4.

Commissaries. The commissaries or officials were anciently the delegates of the clergy, for judging in those questions which fell within the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. By the acts 1560 and 1567, c. 2, all jurisdiction depending on Papal authority was abolished. But the Commissary Court of Edinburgh, consisting of four commissaries, was erected by Queen Mary, under a grant dated Feb. 8, 1563. The Commissary Court of Edinburgh had a double jurisdiction; one diocesan, which it exercised over the special territory contained in the grant, viz., the counties of Edinburgh, Haddington, Linlithgow, Peebles, and a part of Stirlingshire (although, in practice, this jurisdiction was confined to the three Lothians); another universal, by which it confirmed the testaments of all who died in foreign countries, or who died in Scotland without a fixed domicile, and reviewed the decrees of inferior commissaries. There was but one commissary in each diocese until the erection of the Commissary Court of Edinburgh, after which inferior commissaries were established, under a commission from James VI., in most of the principal towns in Scotland. The Commissary Court of Edinburgh is now abolished (see infra); but, while it existed, it had, as regarded inferior commissaries, a privative jurisdiction in declarators of marriages, actions of adherence or divorce, executions of testaments, and declarators of bastardy during the bastard's life; and a cumulative jurisdiction in actions of aliment against husbands, and of slander and defamation,—actions for sealing up repositories,—actions for verbal injuries arising from hasty words,—the authenticating of tutorial and curatorial inventories,—and civil actions in absence to the extent of £40 Scots, and to a greater amount, if the jurisdiction was prorogated by consent of parties. The judgments of the Commissary Court of Edinburgh were subject to the review of the Court of Session. By 49 Geo. III., c. 42, § 2, the registration of probative writs, and of protests on bills, was taken from the commissaries. The number of inferior commissariots was formerly twenty-three; but by 4 Geo. IV., c. 97, they were all abolished, and their jurisdiction vested in the sheriffs. The following are the principal provisions of that act: Compositions in respect of confirmation and fees, termed consignment fees and sentence money, are abolished. 2. Abridged extracts of decrees and testaments-testamentar are substituted for full extracts, unless a party shall require a full extract. 3. The inferior commissariots are abolished, and every sheriffdom and stewartry is declared to constitute a commissariat, except Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow, which continue the commissariat of Edinburgh. (See infra.) 4. The small-debt jurisdiction of the commissaries of Edinburgh is abolished, and it is provided that no inferior commissary, as established by the act, shall exercise jurisdiction in such actions, or in any cases to which the sheriffs' jurisdiction was then competent. 5. The inferior commissaries cease to hold office, and the sheriffs or stewarts-depute become commissaries, each over the commissariat comprehending his respective county or stewartry. 6. The proceedings of sheriffs or stewarts, as commissaries, are reviewable by the Court of Session only. 7. Sheriff-substitutes may be appointed commissary-deputes.

By the act 1 Will. IV., c. 69, the provisions of 4 Geo. IV., c. 97, that the sheriffdoms of Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow shall be the commissariat of Edinburgh, are repealed; and it is declared that each of these shall constitute a separate commissariat, under the provisions of the said act. The Commissary Court of Edinburgh is declared to possess the same jurisdiction in the sheriffdom of Edinburgh as the sheriffs, being commissaries, in other sheriffdoms of Scotland, and any more extensive jurisdiction was declared to cease, except such as regards the confirmation of testaments of persons dying furth of Scotland, having personal property in Scotland. 2. Actions of aliment are competent before any sheriff-court of Scotland. 3. All actions of declarator of marriage, of nullity of marriage, legitimacy and bastardy, and all actions of divorce and of separation a mensa et thoro, are competent only before the Court of Session. To these are now added actions of adherence, and all other consistorial actions, though not specially mentioned in the act of 1 Will. IV.; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 16; and see A. v. B. 1848, 11 D. 101. 4. In actions of divorce, the Lord Ordinary is required to administer the usual oath of calumny to the pursuer, and no judgment can be pronounced in the pursuer's favour till the grounds of action have been substantiated. 5. Such cases are not appropriated to trial by jury; but either Division, or a Lord Ordinary, after advising with his Division, may direct any such cause, or issues of fact connected therewith, to be tried by jury; and the same oath shall be administered to witnesses in consistorial causes as in the other courts of justice. 6. The incorporated solicitors of Edinburgh may conduct before the Court of Session, such causes as were formerly carried on before the Commissary Court. 7. Summonses in maritime and consistorial causes, instituted in the Court of Session, do not require concurrence or to pass the Signet, but must be signed by a clerk of Session. But by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 118, § 29, it is enacted that summonses in Admiralty causes may be raised and pass the Signet, like other summonses before the Court of Session; and, by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 15, it is declared that all summonses in consistorial or other causes may be signed either by a clerk of Session, or by a writer to the Signet, whose signature shall be equivalent to that of a clerk of Session. See 14 S. p. 187, 7 D. 1063. See also 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 21. 8. Directions are given for agency fees, &c., which are not to exceed what they were in the Commissary Court, nor is any thing to be exigible on account of fee-fund.

By 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 41, the Commissary Court of Edinburgh was abolished, and the duties of the commissaries transferred to the sheriff, who now confirms to the succession of parties dying furth of Scotland. The provisions of the act 4 Geo. IV., c. 97, apply to the sheriffdom of Edinburgh, and to the clerks and officers of the said Commissary Court, in the same way as such provisions apply to the other sheriffdoms of Scotland. Certain of the sheriffs are named in a commission for taking proofs in consistorial causes;—and all agents qualified to practise before the Court of Session are authorized to practise in the Sheriff-court of Edinburgh, in proceedings transferred to the sheriff as coming in place of the commissaries. Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 36; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 80, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1888;

Commission in the Army. The acceptance of a commission in the army by a member of Parliament, not then holding one, vacates his seat, and that although he had formerly held a commission which he resigned. But acceptance of a new commission in the army or navy by a member already holding one (e.g. on promotion), does not disqualify from being elected, sitting, or voting. The acceptance of a commission in the militia by one not previously in the service does not disqualify. Chambers' Election Law, h. t.; May's Parl. Prac. 458.

Commission for Taking Proof. In the Court of Session, as well as in inferior courts, parole proof may be taken under a commission granted by the court. The commissioner is delegated by the court to take the oaths, and to report to the court the depositions of the witnesses; and the judicial warrant, whereby the power is conferred on the commissioner, is called a commission. The commission is invariably accompanied by a diligence, which is in like manner a judicial warrant, under which the witnesses are cited, and may be compelled to attend the commissioner for examination. Formerly letters of diligence were taken out, commanding the witnesses to attend, which were signed by the extractor; but it is now provided by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 25, that a copy of the interlocutor granting the diligence, certified by the clerk, shall have the same effect as the extract, according to the former practice. The circumstances under which such commissions may be granted, as well as the duties of the commissioner in taking down the depositions of the witnesses, are explained voce Evidence. In the commissions granted by the Court of Session or Lords Ordinary, for taking proofs, the commissioner must be a member of the Faculty of Advocates, resident in Edinburgh, and attending the court, and of more than five years' standing at the bar, or a sheriff, or steward-depute, or substitute, or any other inferior magistrate, or the clerk, or assistant-clerk of any court; A.S. 11th March 1800. The parties, or their agents, are not allowed to name their own commissioner; although in practice it frequently happens that the court adopts the suggestion of the parties, where they are agreed as to the particular commissioner to be named. When the witnesses to be examined reside furth of Scotland, the commission may be granted to any competent person, in the discretion of the court. Commissions may also be granted for the recovery of writings; the commissioner in that case being any competent person named by the court, or by the Lord Ordinary. See Haver. To prevent the danger of loss of evidence, when witnesses are above 70 years of age, or suffering under severe indisposition, or are intending to go abroad, and to remain there for a considerable period, such witnesses may be examined by commission, upon application to the Court or the Lord Ordinary during session, or to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation. The examinations are sealed up by the commissioner, and lie in reletis, subject to the orders of the Court. The regulations as to this are contained in A. S., 11th July 1828, § 117; and they apply to all causes in the Court of Session, whether the proof is ultimately taken on commission, or before a jury, provided issues have not been ordered. If issues have been ordered, the examination must take place on adjusted interrogatories, and according to the regulations of the Act of Sederunt, 16th Feb. 1841, §§ 17, 21. By 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 49, either division of the Court may allow proof on commission in any of the causes appropriated by 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 28, to jury trial, where the action is not one for libel or nuisance, or properly and in substance an action of damages. In consistorial causes, it is enacted by 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 41, that when it is necessary to take proofs in such causes, the proofs shall be taken by certain of the sheriffs of Scotland named in a commission to be issued for the purpose; under which statute, six sheriffs resident in Edinburgh have been named, by one or other of whom the depositions of the witnesses in consistorial causes must be taken and reported to the Court of Session or Lord Ordinary. See article Commissaries. When, however, the witnesses in consistorial causes are furth of the kingdom, they may be examined before any Commissioner appointed by the Lord Ordinary or the Court; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 26. The Court has a discretionary power to send a consistorial cause, or any issue of fact connected therewith, to a jury. 1 Will. IV., c. 69, § 41.

Formerly, the depositions of witnesses in civil causes in the sheriff-courts (except small debt cases) were taken in writing before the sheriff or his substitute, to be proofs on commission; and remits to a commissioner were discouraged unless the sheriff could not personally perform the duty. A. S., 10th July 1839, § 68; A. S., 10th March 1849 (as to prorogations and proofs in sheriff courts), II. § 2; A. S., 23d June 1852; 26th Jan. 1853. This matter is now regulated by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 10, which enacts that the sheriff shall, with his own hand, take a note of the evidence, setting forth the witnesses examined, and the testimony of each, not by question and answer, but in the form of a narrative, and the documents adduced, and any evidence, whether oral or written, allowed to be received. The note of the evidence of each witness must be read over to him by the sheriff, and signed by the witness before his dismissal. The notes of evidence ought also to be signed by the sheriff himself, and to have the partibus marked thereon. If the sheriff is unavoidably prevented from taking the note of evidence in his own handwriting, he may dictate it. But, where any witness or haver is resident beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, or, by reason of age, infirmity, or sickness, is unable to attend the diet of proof, the sheriff is empowered to grant commission to any competent person to take and report in writing the evidence of such witness or haver. He may also remit to persons of skill, and other persons, to report on any matter of fact; and, where such remit is made by consent of both parties, the report is final and conclusive. Section 11 provides, that a certified copy of the sheriff's interlocutor, fixing the diet of proof, shall be a sufficient warrant for citing witnesses and havers; which warrant may be made operative in any other county by being indorsed by the sheriff-clerk of that county. A form of citation and execution is appended to the act. Where the aid of a commissioner is still required, he must be either the clerk of Court or his depute, or a practitioner before any court of at least three years' standing, or a justice of peace, or any other magistrate. The commissioner ought to follow the rules prescribed by the Court of Session for the guidance of commissioners acting under its authority; A. S., 11th March 1800. A. S., 22d June 1809. The agents of the parties are personally liable for the commissioner's fees; 6 D. 95.

The act 6 and 7 Vict., c. 82, makes it compulsory on witnesses and havers in England and Ireland to attend before a commissioner appointed by any of the courts of law in Scotland; and it contains reciprocal provisions as to commissions issued from the courts of law and equity in England and Ireland, to be executed in Scotland. Commission of Trustee. A trustee, under the bankrupt statute, is remunerated for his trouble by a commission upon the amount of the sums recovered. This commission is ascertained by the commissioners, who, previously to each dividend, audit the accounts, and strike the allowance to the trustee, by a minute under the hands in the book of sederunt. The commission usually allowed is 5 per cent., although a much higher commission is sometimes sanctioned by the creditors. It is competent to the bankrupt, creditors, or trustee to bring the amount allowed under review of the Lord Ordinary or the sheriff; but the opinion of the creditors should in all cases be expressed in the first place. The emoluments of a trustee under a private trust-deed, or of judicial factors, are frequently arranged on a similar principle. 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 141; Bell's Com. i. 380. See Trustee. Judicial Factor.

Commissioner. The Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland represents the Sovereign in that Assembly. The Church of Scotland claims the right of meeting in a General Assembly, as well as in inferior courts, by its own appointment; but it also recognises the right of the Sovereign to call synods, and to be present at them. According to Erskine, the royal sanction seems to be necessary to the meeting of the Assembly, and the commissioner asserts the right of dissolving it. But during the last century and a-half no conflict in the exercise of those rights has occurred. In the years 1638 and 1692, however, the commissioner having dissolved the Assembly against their wish, and without fixing a day for the meeting of another, the Assembly continued its sittings, and appointed the day when the next Assembly should be held. In the years 1746 and 1760, when, by accident, the King's commissioner had not arrived, the Assembly met on the day appointed, and elected a moderator, but did not proceed to business until the commissioner arrived. In 1798 the commission was sent down, and laid on the table on the first session of the Assembly; but the commissioner did not make his appearance until the fourth session. When, from temporary indisposition, or any other cause, the commissioner is unable to attend, the business of the Assembly proceeds without him; the former practice of resolving into a committee of the whole house, on these occasions, being now considered unnecessary. *Ersk. Commissioners; private factors. A commissioner or factor is a person who holds a power from his constituent to manage his affairs, either generally or in a particular department, with full authority to act as he himself might do if present. Extensive land estates are generally placed under the management of a commissioner or commissioners. See Factor.

Commissioners of Justiciary. The Justiciary Court consists of the Lord Justice-General, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and five Judges of the Court of Session, who are commissioned by the Crown in place of the assessors formerly given to the Justice-General. In this court the Lord Justice-General is president, or, in his absence, the Lord Justice-Clerk; 1 Will. IV., c. 69, §§ 18 and 19. See Circuit. Justiciary.

Commissioners of Supply. The Commissioners of Supply are named in the acts imposing the land-tax, and are authorized to act within their respective counties. They had, till lately, in order to qualify them to act, to be possessed of L.100 Scots of yearly valued rent, in property, superiority, or life-rent. Every person acting without that qualification, though named in the act as a commissioner, incurred a penalty of L.20 sterling, and his vote was not reckoned in any division of the commissioners. The exceptions in regard to qualifications were two; one in favour of the eldest sons, or apparent heirs, of those possessed of a legal qualification, under the old election law, to vote in the election of a member of Parliament; the other of the bailies and magistrates of royal burghs. See infra. Before proceeding to act, the commissioners are required, under a penalty of L.20 sterling, to take the oath of allegiance and abjuration, and to subscribe the assurance appointed to be taken by persons holding offices and public trust in Scotland. They are entitled to name a convener, who acts as preses of the meeting. See 17 and 18 Vict., c. 91, § 14. They are also entitled to appoint a clerk, with a reasonable salary. Their chief duty is to assess the land-tax and to apportion the valuation according to the provisions of the Valuation of Lands Act, 17 and 18 Vict., c. 91.

By this act a new qualification is introduced for commissioners of supply, and any person acting without that qualification is declared to be liable to the penalties presently attached by law to such acting. The qualification, it is enacted by § 19, shall be the being named as an ex officio commissioner of supply in any act of supply, or the being proprietor or husband of any proprietor infest in liferent, or in fee not burdened with a liferent, in lands and heritages within the county, of the yearly rent or value, in terms of the act, of at least L.100, or the being the eldest son and heir-apparent of a proprietor infest in fee, not burdened with a liferent, in lands and heritages within the county of the yearly rent or value, in terms of the act, of L.400; and the factor of any proprietor infest, either in liferent or fee, unburdened as aforesaid, in lands and heritages within the county of the yearly rent or value of L.800, shall be qualified to act as a commissioner in the absence of such proprietor. It is provided that, with reference to the qualification of commissioners of supply, the yearly rent or value of houses and other buildings, not being farm-houses or offices, or other agricultural buildings, is to be estimated at only one-half of their actual yearly rent or value in terms of the act. Persons who, at the date of the passing of this act (10th August 1854), were in actual possession of the former qualification, are, so long as they continue to possess it, to be deemed to be in possession of the requisite qualification for a commissioner. By "the Commissioners of Supply Act, 1856," 19 and 20 Vict., c. 93, all persons, being males and of full age, and possessed of the above qualification, otherwise than by nomination ex officio, for acting as commissioners, are declared, without being named in any act of supply, to be commissioners of supply while so qualified, and as such to be qualified, and have power to vote and act as freely, and to the like effect, as if they had been so named. Any one desirous of being put on the list of commissioners must give in a claim in writing before the 10th December in each year. Within seven days thereafter any objections to said claim must be lodged with the clerk of supply, and the lodging thereof, must be intimated forthwith by him to the party objected to. Ten free days' notice of the time and place of disposing of claims and objections must be given by the clerk in meeting (ibid. § 3). The commissioners, at their annual meeting on 30th April, will then appoint a committee of their number, three being a quorum, to meet and dispose of the claims and objections. They must be disposed of before 20th December in each year (§ 4). In accordance with their determination, the clerk must make up a list of the commissioners on or before 31st December in each year, and authenticate it by his subscription, and retain it in his custody. This list is, till the completion and authentication of the next list, conclusive as to the right of acting and voting as commissioners, except as regards such sheriffs and magistrates of burghs and towns as may, in any subsisting act of supply, be constituted ex officio commissioners, without being required to possess any property qualification, who and whose successors in office are entitled to act and vote as commissioners virtute officii, without being inserted in the list (§ 5). There is an appeal from the determination of the commissioners on claims and objections to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills within ten days after the determination is pronounced. The Lord Ordinary's judgment is not subject to any review.

The commissioners of supply of every county, and the magistrates of every burgh, must cause a valuation-roll to be annually made up, showing the yearly rent or value of the whole lands and heritages in the county or burgh, specifying the nature thereof, and the names of the proprietors and tenants, or occupiers; 17 and 18 Vict., c. 91, § 1. For making up this roll they are entitled to appoint an assessor or assessors, whose duty it is to ascertain and assess the yearly rent or value of the lands, &c., and to make up the roll before the 15th day of August in each year (§§ 3, 4). The mode of estimating the yearly rent or value, according to which it is the object of the act that all public assessments leviable according to the real rent shall be assessed, is fixed by § 8. For the purpose of making up the list of commissioners, the last completed valuation-roll of the county is prima facie evidence that every person entered therein as a proprietor of any lands, &c., is the proprietor thereof; and is conclusive evidence that the lands, &c., are of the yearly value set forth in the roll; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 93, § 2. The commissioners must, on or before the 15th, and not earlier than the 10th September, annually hold a court for hearing appeals against the valuations made by their assessors; 17 and 18 Vict., c. 91, § 8. The procedure at such courts is regulated by § 10. Three commissioners of supply, and two magistrates of a burgh, are to form a quorum of such commissioners and magistrates, the preses having a casting vote where the votes are equal (§ 14). The election of a preses is regulated by § 15. See Valuation of Lands. See also 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 64, § 10; Wight on Elections, pp. 184, 194, and App. 28; More's Notes on Stair, p. cccxxi.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, B. v. c. 4; Dunlop's Parochial Law.

Commissioners on a Sequestrated Estate. By the Bankrupt Act, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 75, 1856, it is enacted that at the meeting for election of a trustee, the creditors present, or their mandatories, shall, after the election of the trustee, elect three commissioners (if there be so many creditors who have claimed), who shall be either creditors or mandatories of creditors, and the like proceedings are declared to take place in regard to their election as are provided in regard to the election of a trustee, except that they shall not be bound to find security. No person is eligible as a commissioner who is disqualified to be a trustee. A majority of the creditors, assembled at any meeting duly called for the purpose, may remove a commissioner, and may elect another in his place in the manner directed by the act. It is the duty of the commissioners to superintend the proceedings of the trustee, concur with him in submissions and transactions, give their advice and assistance relative to the management of the estate, and decide as to paying or postponing payment of a dividend. They may also assemble at any time to ascertain the situation of the bankrupt estate, and any one of them may make such report as he may think proper to a general meeting of the creditors.

Commissioners are disqualified, in the same manner as the trustee, from purchasing any part of the estate or effects of the bankrupt; M'Kellar, 8th March 1817, Fac. Coll., and are entitled to no salary, commission, or allowance of any kind from the bankrupt estate. See Ball's Com. vol. ii. p. 383, et seq. 5th edit.

Commitment for Trial. After the declaration of an accused person, and the precognition have been taken, if there be reasonable grounds against him, the magistrate grants warrant to commit him to prison, to abide the result of his trial for the crime charged against him. This warrant, by 1701, c. 6, must be in writing, and duly signed. It must specify distinctly the particular offence charged; and it must proceed on a signed information. This information is generally in the form of a petition or complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, by whom it is signed, although it would seem that a less formal application is a sufficient compliance with the statute; such, for example, as an affidavit or signed declaration, or even a letter by the party concerned, or having cause of knowledge, provided it properly describe the fact, and be duly referred to in the warrant of commitment. But, in whatever shape the information is, it must contain a direct charge of facts, not a vague statement of suspicions. The officer executing the warrant, before imprisonment, must serve the accused party personally with a copy of the warrant. The ordinary practice is, to subjoin the warrant to the information, and to serve the prisoner with a full copy of both. Commitment for trial, on a warrant defective in the statutory requisites, exposes the granter, the officer executing it, and the keeper of the prison, to the pains of wrongful imprisonment; 1701, c. 6. See Wrongous Imprisonment. There is an exception in the statute in favour of inferior magistrates, justices of the peace, &c., empowering them to take security for good behaviour, and to keep the peace, as they were in use to do before the passing of the act 1701; and also to commit for trial for indignities done to themselves, or to imprison vagabonds, &c.; or for riots, batteries, pickeries, &c.; the persons so committed, however, having the benefit of the statute, in so far as concerns bail and the expediting of the trial. It is also provided by the statute, that the Privy Council, or any five of them, in case of imminent or actual invasion, rebellion, or insurrection, may commit, upon suspicion or accession thereto, without being liable to the penalties of the statute; the person so committed having his relief for trial or liberation under this act; stat. 1701, c. 6. Committee; are those to whom the consideration or management of any matter is referred by some court or assembly to whom it belongs. The powers of a committee must, of course, depend upon the particular authority given to them by their constituents. In the House of Commons there are certain standing committees appointed by each new Parliament, viz., the Committee of Privileges, of Religion, of Grievances, and of Trade. The House is also in use, when it thinks proper, to appoint Select Committees, as they are termed, for particular purposes. Both the House of Lords and the House of Commons may resolve themselves into a committee of the whole House, which is, in fact, the House itself presided over by a chairman, instead of by the speaker. Tomlin's Dict.; May's Parl. Prac. p. 299.

One of the most important committees of the House of Commons is that for deciding upon disputed elections. The election and proceedings of this committee are regulated by 11 and 12 Vict., c. 98, "to amend the law for the trial of election petitions." See Cox's Law and Prac. of Registration and Elections, p. 290; Clerk's Election Laws; May's Parl. Prac.

Commixtion; is a species of specification, including under it commixtio properly so called, which is the mingling of solids; and confusio, which is the mixing of liquids. It may be proper to distinguish between that commixtion which produces a new subject, and that which mingles without altering the nature of the subjects, as in the case of two parcels of grain, or the mixing of two quantities of wine. 1. Where, from the commixtion of two or more substances of different kinds a new substance is produced, which does not admit of the materials being restored to their original state, the person by whom the new property has been made becomes the sole proprietor, and he must consequently be liable to the owners of the materials, for their value. 2. Where it is a mixture of the same substances, and no new one is formed, the original right of property remains; and whether the mixture has happened through accident, or has been made by design, the right of property in the materials will render the subject a common property, divisible amongst the parties according to the value of their respective shares. Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 37; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 17; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1298.

Commodate; is a species of loan, gratuitous on the part of the lender, by which the borrower is obliged to restore the same individual subject which was lent, in the same condition in which he received it. Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 8, et seq.; More's Notes, p. lxxxi.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 225, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 195, et seq. See Loan. Mutuum. Borrowing.

Common Law. The term common law is used by many of the writers on the law of Scotland, and in some of the acts of the Scotch Parliament, to signify the Roman law; but in its proper acceptation, it means our consuetudinary law, whether founded on the Roman law, the feudal customs, or the ancient unwritten law of the country from whatever other source derived. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 28; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825).

Common Pasturage. See Pasturage.

Common Agent; is an agent or solicitor before the Court of Session, employed to conduct a cause in which several parties have a common interest. The two most important occasions for this appointment are in the process of ranking and sale, and in the process of augmentation and locality. But a common agent is also sometimes appointed in a process of multiplepointing. In the process of ranking and sale, immediately after the first term assigned for lodging claims, the process is enrolled, and an interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, appointing the creditors to meet to choose a common agent, to carry on the process. This interlocutor is intimated in the minute-book, and in the Edinburgh Gazette, fourteen days before the meeting. At the meeting for election no one can vote unless his grounds of debt, with an oath of verity by the creditor, if in Britain, or an oath of credulity by his agent or attorney, if the creditor be out of Britain, have been lodged with the clerk of process, at least twenty-four hours previous to the meeting. The majority in value elect. A regular mandate should be produced to entitle any one to vote for an absent creditor. No one can be elected who is a creditor, or conjunct and confident with the common debtor; and after his election, the common agent cannot act directly or indirectly as the private agent of any particular creditor or class of creditors, or of the common debtor, in any matter relative to the ranking, or the division of the price; nor can he purchase the property he brings to sale; York Buildings Co., Mor. p. 1336. The clerk to the process draws up a minute of the election; and the case being enrolled, and the election reported, the Lord Ordinary approves of the appointment, and administers the oath de fidei to the common agent. If the election be disputed, the agent approved of by the Lord Ordinary acts until the point is decided; and the competition is decided by the Lord Ordinary, whose decision, however, may be reviewed by the Inner House, on a reclaiming note by either of the candidates. The successful candidate receives his whole expenses from his opponent, or at least is not entitled to charge any part of the expense against the common fund. The common agent must keep a minute-book of his proceedings and official correspondence open to the inspection of all concerned, and is answerable to the court for his conduct, by summary complaint. It is his duty to take effectual steps for ascertaining the subjects belonging to the common debtor, and the encumbrances affecting them; and immediately on his appointment he ought carefully to examine the whole proceedings, to see that the proof of the rental, &c., are correct, and to hear the value of the lands and lots deponed to before the Lord Ordinary. A. S. 17th Jan. 1756, 11th July 1794; Shand's Practice, pp. 881-938. See Ranking and Sale.

In the process of augmentation and locality, after the augmentation has been granted, and the case enrolled before the junior Lord Ordinary, in order to proceed with the locality, he pronounces an interlocutor, ordering the heritors or their agents to meet, to name a person to be suggested to him as common agent for conducting the locality. A notice of this interlocutor is inserted in certain of the Edinburgh newspapers; and the name of the person chosen is then reported to, and approved of by, the Lord Ordinary; A. S. 9th July 1809. No one who is agent for the minister, titular, or for any heritor in the parish, can be common agent; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, § 13. It is the duty of this common agent to prepare a state of the teinds, according to the rules elsewhere explained. See Teinds. Locality.

Where a common agent is elected in the process of multiplepointing, the same general rules as to his appointment are observed; A. S. 11th July 1828, § 48; Shand's Prac. 596; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 266, 5th edit. See Multiplepointing.

Common Pleas. The Court of Common Pleas is one of the three Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster. The Court consists of a chief justice and four puisne judges. Its jurisdiction is general over England, in all civil causes at common law between subject and subject. By the act 3 and 4 Gul. IV., c. 27, § 36, 1833; all real and mixed actions are abolished except for Dower Quare Impedit and Ejectment, and in the two first, the Court of Common Pleas continues to have exclusive jurisdiction, but it has no cognisance of pleas of the Crown. The judges of the Common Pleas and of Queen's Bench constitute the Court of Error in error from the Exchequer. The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and barons of Exchequer, constitute the Court of Error in error from the Court of Common Pleas; and the judges of the Common Pleas and the barons of Exchequer constitute the Court of Error in error from the Queen's Bench.

Common Prayer; the liturgy or prayers used in the English church. It is the particular duty of clergymen, every Sunday, &c., to use the public form of prayer prescribed by the book of common prayer; and if any incumbent be resident upon his living, and keep a curate, he is obliged, by the act of uniformity, once every month at least, to read the common prayers of the church in his parish-church, in his own person, under a penalty. The book of common prayer must be provided in every parish, and the common prayer must be read before every lecture, the whole appointed for the day, with all the circumstances and ceremonies, &c.

Common Debtor. Where the effects of a debtor have been arrested, and there are several creditors claiming a share of them, the debtor, as being debtor to all the claimants, is distinguished by the name of the common debtor in the proceedings which take place in the competition. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 2. See Arrestment.

Common Good. This term, in its widest acceptation, includes all the property of a corporation, over which the magistrates have a power of administration, solely for behoof of the corporation. By 3 Geo. IV., c. 91, § 5, it is enacted, that all leases for more than one year, of the heritable property or common good, shall, after certain notices, be let by public roup or auction, under the sanction of nullity. Common lands feued by the magistrates to a private purchaser hold not of the Crown in burgage, but of the burgh in feu-farm. Neither are lands purchased by a burgh tanquam quilibet, out of their common stock, to be accounted burghal tenements. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 9; Brown's Syn. 398; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. See Burgh Royal. Community.

Common Property; is property, whether heritable or moveable, belonging to two or more proprietors pro indiviso. The common proprietors are mutually bound to communicate the profit, or to share the loss arising from their common property, according to their respective shares in it; and the consent of all the common proprietors is requisite in the management or disposal of the subject. Each joint owner may sell his pro indiviso right, the purchaser coming into his place; and the right may be in like manner adjudged by the creditors of the common proprietors, or any of them. As to the management, the maxim, In re communi melior est conditio prohibentis, applies; and hence, one coproprietor may prevent the others from removing tenants, unless better rents or better security is offered. He may also prevent any extraordinary use of the subject; e.g., a lease of the privilege of shooting over the property. Or he may prevent operations on the common subject, whereby its condition is to be altered; e.g., striking out a door in a common stair or passage. But necessary operations in rebuilding, repairing, &c., cannot be stopped by the opposition of any of the joint owners; and in general, the court seems disinclined to countenance wanton and emulous opposition. Where anything is built or planted on the common subject, it accretes to the common right. Where the parties cannot agree, either the will of the majority rules, or matters remain in statu quo. The expense of erecting or repairing a common wall between conterminous proprietors must be borne in proportion to the value of the share which each has in the subject; and in urban subjects, a division-wall has been held to be common property, although built at the expense of one of the parties. Where the common property is heritable, and the proprietors wish a division, this may be done either extrajudicially, or on a brief of division directed to the Sheriff. See Brieves. Heirs Portioners. Where the subject is not divisible, e.g., a brewhouse, or other indivisible heritable subject, any one of the common proprietors seems to be entitled to require the others, either to purchase his share at a certain price, or to sell him their shares at the same rate, or to concur with him in exposing the subject to sale by public roup. Moveable subjects, again, held in common, may be divided, when divisible, in an action before the Judge Ordinary; or, when indivisible, as in the case of a ship, a majority of the joint owners may sell by public roup; or any one of them may oblige the others to take his share at a fixed price, or to sell him theirs at the same rate, by means of an action of sett. Stair, B. i. tit. 16, § 4, and tit. 7, § 15; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 56; Bank. B. i. tit. 8, § 40; Milligan, 8th Feb. 1782, M. 2486, Hailes, 897; Bell's Princ. 289, and cases there cited. See Sett.

Common Interest; as contradistinguished from common property, is applied to that right arising from mutual interest in a subject which, although not amounting to common property, vests the parties interested with certain rights which they may legally vindicate. The most familiar example of a right or interest of this class is afforded by those large tenements or buildings in Edinburgh, and other towns in Scotland, called lands; consisting of several storeys or floors, each of which is the separate property of an individual proprietor; and although there is no common property amongst the several owners of those floors, yet all the proprietors in the land have a common interest in the preservation of the walls and roof of the entire tenement. This common interest differs from servitude, in as far as each proprietor is bound to maintain his own portion of the walls. It differs from property, in so far as no one having merely a common interest, is entitled to break or to touch the wall or space which belongs to the upper or under proprietor. He can merely prevent injury, and insist on support. And it differs from common property, in so far as each of the several proprietors may make what alteration he pleases in suo proprio, provided he does not endanger the common interest, or expose those who hold it to reasonable alarm. The extraordinary alterations and transformations which have taken place in the older part of the New Town of Edinburgh, in the process of converting dwelling-houses into shops, have contributed to settle the law on this subject; and a series of instructive cases are cited below. As to the burden of supporting the roof of the tenement, it is generally made matter of special stipulation; but failing that, this burden lies on the proprietor of the garret-floor. In Edinburgh, and in other royal burghs, in every case of projected alterations on tenements within burgh, application for a warrant must be made to the Dean-of-Guild Court; those interested being called as parties. Ersk. ii. t. 9, § 11; Bell's Princ. § 292, and cases cited; Sir J. Marjoribanks, 12th Nov. 1816, F. C.; Pirnie, 5th June 1819, F. C.; Gray, 13th June Commons, House of. The House of Commons under the reform acts, consists in all of 658 members, viz., 159 for counties in England and Wales, 64 for counties in Ireland, and 30 for counties in Scotland, 333 for English, 39 for Irish, and 23 for Scotch burghs, with 4 for the English universities, and 2 for the university of Dublin; Chambers voce House of Commons. Vacancies occur by the general dissolution of Parliament by act of law which takes place at the end of seven years from the return of the writ whereby it was summoned, or at the end of six months after the sovereign's death; or by act of the sovereign in exercise of the prerogative. They also occur by the secession or disqualification of a particular member. After a general dissolution, the Crown has theoretically three years before a new Parliament need be summoned; but the practical necessity for summoning it is immediate. A warrant goes accordingly from the Queen in Council to the Lord Chancellor to issue writs. In cases of particular vacancies, if during session, a motion is made in the House, and the Speaker makes his warrant for the issuing of a new writ; if during recess, the Speaker receives notice of the vacancy, certified by two members, he forthwith causes notice to be inserted in the Gazette, and fourteen days afterwards issues a new writ. See Election-Law. Reform Act. Parliament. Member of Parliament.

Commonty. A common or commonty is a piece of ground belonging in property to one or more persons, and in general burdened with sundry inferior rights of servitude, such as pasturage, feal and divot, and the like, in which last respect a commonty differs from common property held pro indiviso. There being no regular method at common law of ascertaining the rights of parties in a commonty, and dividing it among them, the act 1695, c. 38, makes all commonities, except those belonging to the king and to royal burghs, divisible at the instance of any having interest, by an action in the Court of Session. The Court is empowered by this statute to discuss the relevancy, and to determine on the rights and interests of the parties to grant commission for perambulating and taking all necessary proof, and to divide the common amongst the parties concerned. It is also declared, that the interest of the heritors having right to the common shall be estimated according to the valuation of their respective lands and properties, and that the portion of the common adjacent to the property of each heritor be adjudged to him; with power to the Court also to divide the mosses in the common, or, in case they cannot be conveniently divided, that they shall remain common, with free ish and entry, whether divided or not. Where there is only one proprietor burdened with rights of servitude competent to other heritors, it has been settled, after considerable fluctuation of opinion, that this is not a commonty within the meaning of the statute. But if there be two co-proprietors, the statutory division may be made; and the device of a conveyance by the sole proprietor, of a small portion of the lands proposed to be divided, to an adjoining proprietor, made even pendente processu, has been held sufficient to warrant the Court in proceeding with the division. A right of servitude over the common is not a sufficient title to pursue an action of division; Bell's Princ., § 1093. In Gordon v. Grant, 12th, Nov. 1850, 13 D. 1, relating to the division of the commonty of Benachie, it was held that a party who had not a right of common property in a part of the lands was not entitled to insist on a division of that part of the lands in respect of a right of servitude which he claimed over it, and that his claim of servitude could only be made effectual under a separate action of declarator of servitude. The same party was also found not entitled to object to the claim of another party to have the same lands found to be his exclusive property, there being no other party claiming them as common property.

It is not at all times easy to ascertain whether the right be a right of common property, or a right of servitude merely. If the proprietor's title-deeds convey his lands to him, "with parts, pendicles, and pertinents," or with "mosses, commonities, parts, pendicles, and pertinents," with "the commonty," or the like expression, the right is a right of property in the common. If, on the other hand, the expression be, "with parts, pertinents, and common pasturage," or "with pasturage of cattle and privilege of commonty," a servitude merely is held to have been conveyed, although, in both cases, the possession may have been identical. And an infeftment "with parts and pertinents," followed by prescriptive possession of the adjoining common, will amount to a right of common property; although, where the charter is a bounding charter, the clause "with pertinents," will found no more than a right of servitude. See Bounding Charter. Where the expressions are more ambiguous, they will be construed or explained by usage. The statute expressly exempts from division commonities the property of the Crown or of royal burghs; and it has been decided that, if the property be vested in the Crown, although the benefit is conferred by grant, or a subject, such a common cannot be divided. Shand's Prac. ii. 520, and authorities there cited.

In the action of division, all parties having interests, whether of common property or servitude, must be called; but tenants need not be cited. The summons is executed, called, and enrolled, in the usual manner. It is framed in terms of the Court of Session Act, 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 1; and the annexed condescendence must set forth, in reference to a plan or sketch to be produced along with it, the descriptions of the boundaries of the common, according to natural or other objects, or the names of hills, mosses, and other localities occurring along or near the line of the boundaries. The condescendence must set forth the nature and extent of the right and interest the pursuer claims in the common, his titles, and the claim he proposes to advance, which claim may be subject to any alteration which the evidence and the pleas of parties may render necessary; A. S. 18th June 1852, §§ 1, 2. The parties who intend to appear must lodge defences, stating the extent of the right and interest they mean to advance in the process; the extent and boundaries of the common, if they do not admit those stated by the pursuer; the lands, if any, within the pursuer's boundaries which they claim as private property, and as not forming part of the common; their titles and claim; Ib. § 4. After these papers are lodged the Lord Ordinary shall consider them, both in reference to the requirements of the Court of Session Act, and also in order to consider whether any questions of law should be determined before proof, or to what points the proof should, in the first instance, be directed; and whether it should be by commission or before a jury, and whether there are any separate and distinct points which should be so tried before the general boundaries are remitted to proof, and between what parties; Ib. § 5. When a proof by commission is determined upon, the Lord Ordinary grants commission to perambulate the common, to ascertain its boundaries, and the possession of the several heritors, to get the ground measured and a plan made, and to divide the common among the parties interested. See Beveridge's Forms of Process, 565. Diligence is at the same time granted against witnesses and havers; and the proof is in general ordered to be reported to the Court, or sometimes to the Lord Ordinary. The statutory rule of division is the valued rent of the properties to which the right to the common belongs; and where, as in Shetland, there is no valuation, the division is regulated by the number of merks belonging to each proprietor, according to which the taxes are paid; Bruce,

11th Dec. 1823, 2 S. 573. The other rules are—1st, To allocate to the parties the shares most adjacent to their own property, looking to the quality as well as the quantity; especially where the adjacent heritor has improved the border of the common nearest his lands. In that case, however, the land is allocated to the heritor at its improved value, the presumption being, that he has been reimbursed for the expense of the improvement by the possession,—a presumption which doubtless would yield to the fact in cases where it was otherwise. 2d, To preserve the servitudes over the undivided portions, or to commute them if those in right of the servitudes will consent, and to give them a portion of land in lieu. 3d, To allocate to the proprietor of a barony his share, according to the state of his possession. But where the proprietor of a barony, to which a common was attached, had feued out the whole barony, and given the feuars rights of servitude over the common, it was decided that he was still to be held as possessing by means of his feuars, and that he was entitled, accordingly, to have a share of the common set apart for him, corresponding to the aggregate valuation of the feuars, and subject to their servitudes; Duke of Buccleuch, 16th June 1812, Fac. Coll. 4th, To continue as common such mosses as are indivisible, with free ish and entry to the moss, whether divided or not. In the case of mosses the rule is not the valued rent, but the extent of the respective lands lying along the edge of the moss. In making the division, the common is first subdivided amongst the joint proprietors, as above. Then each proprietor divides his share with those whose servitudes are derived from him or his authors; although this seems to be an arrangement which can only be made of consent of parties; and in questions between the common proprietors and those having rights of servitude, the division is regulated not by the valued rent, but by the number of cattle the parties in right of the servitudes have been in use to pasture on the common, or according to the value of their interests in the common, whatever they may be; Maitland, 11th August 1772, Mor. 2485. Formerly the proprietor, in such cases, got a præcipuum of a fourth, over and above his share in the division; but no such rule is now acted on: all that the proprietor gets is the residue, after deducting the value of the servitudes. The proprietor has also a right to the coals and minerals, the parties in right of servitudes having right merely to the surface. When the proof is concluded and reported, circumduction will be pronounced, and great avizandum made. A prepared state was then framed by the Inner-House clerk, and a memorial and ab-

abstract, as in the process of ranking and sale; but prepared states have fallen into disuse. Instead of the memorial and abstract, when all parties acquiesce in the division, a short printed petition is boxed, praying the Court to approve of the proceedings, and to pronounce decree; and if there be no objections, decree of division will be pronounced by the Inner-House in terms of the report of the commissioner. If there be objections, they will either be disposed of at once, or a remit will be made by the Inner-House to the Lord Ordinary to prepare the cause, and decide on the objections in the usual way, and subject of course to the review of the Court. The expense of the division is paid proportionally to the benefit each heritor has derived from the division, as proved by the value of the portion allocated to him. Tenants, however, are not liable in any part of the expense, nor even for the interest of the expense so disbursed by their landlords. This action is not competent in an inferior court. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 56, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1092, et seq.; Kames' Stat. Law, h. t.; Jurid. Styles, iii. 149; Shand's Prac. p. 845, et seq.

Communi Dividundo Actio; in the Roman law, was an action for the division of what was possessed in common by more than one; Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 15. The principles of the Roman law on this subject are adopted in the law of Scotland; and where subjects possessed by pro indiviso proprietors are in their nature indivisible, an action of division and sale is competent at the instance of one of the proprietors; Brock v. Hamilton, 19 D. 701, in note.

Communion-Elements. The Teind Court, in modifying a stipend to a minister, make an allowance for communion-elements, payable out of the tiends of the parish; but do not consider themselves to be at liberty to encroach on the stock where the tiends are exhausted. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 50; Dunlop's Parochial Law. See Augmentation.

Communion of Goods. See Goods in communion.

Communis Error. Where, through oversight or negligence, an erroneous practice has prevailed, and has become inveterate, and especially where parties in their transactions have relied on the prevailing practice as correct; or where there is danger of disturbing judicial procedure in past cases; the Court of Session is in use, instead of correcting the error by a decision in a particular case, to overrule the objection when so stated, but to pass an Act of Sederunt, enjoining the observance of the correct practice in future; and certifying all concerned that they will hereafter decide accordingly. Such are the Acts of Sederunt, 26th Feb. 1634, 17th July 1741, and 17th Jan. 1756; in some of which cases the erroneous practice had been directly in the face of statutory enactments. See also the more recent cases of Beattie, 22d May 1830, 8 S. 84, where the communis error was in the will of a summons; and of Russel, 7th July 1837, where the error was in the ordinary form of the prayer of bills of suspension. See Acts of Sederunt. Suspension.

Community or Corporation. A corporation is composed of a number of persons erected by proper authority into a body politic, with certain rights and privileges. Cities, burghs, hospitals, scientific or professional associations, and the like, may be thus incorporated. Corporations cannot be legally constituted except by patent or by act of Parliament. Voluntary associations have no persona standi in judicio. But by special statute it is made lawful to establish societies for raising funds for the mutual relief and maintenance of the members or their families in old age, widowhood, sickness, or other contingency. The regulations of such societies are directed to be exhibited to the quarter-sessions of the justices of the peace, by whom they are to be confirmed; 10 Geo. IV., c. 56; 2 Will. IV., c. 37. See Friendly Societies. The stat. 7, Geo. IV., c. 67, authorizes joint-stock banks to sue and be sued, in name of their manager or principal officer, on certain conditions prescribed in the statute. See Bank. A corporation is held in law to be one person, and being in general established for a perpetuity, the legal person never dies; for although the individuals composing it die out, yet those who come in their places, either by succession or by election, or by the nomination of the founder, according as the charter is conceived, preserve the corporation entire. In general, by the charter of erection, a corporation may sue or be sued in its corporate name; and it may hold heritable property, and contract debt, which will be effectual against the property and funds of the corporation. A superior, however, is not bound to give an entry to a corporation, as to an ordinary purchaser, on payment of a year's rent; Hill, 17th Jan. 1815, Fac. Coll. See Composition. Communities have also, in the ordinary case, authority under their charter to elect magistrates, directors, or other office-bearers, to represent the whole community, and to bind it in the matters which the charter of incorporation allows to be entrusted to their management. Independent of an express clause in the charter, there are certain naturalia of a corporation which are implied in its erection. Thus, the corporation may acquire moveable property, and be sued for the price of it; it may have a common seal; may assemble to deliberate on its affairs; and has a power to make bye-laws for the administration of the affairs of the community, provided such bye-laws are not inconsistent with the laws of the realm. Communities are dissolved,—1. By the expiration of the time to which their constitution limits them; 2. By act of Parliament; 3. By forfeiture, when they abuse their powers; in which last case, although the members necessarily suffer in their political capacity, yet no prosecution lies against such of the individual members as have had no accession to the crime. After a community is dissolved, the individuals are not, in the general case, bound even subsidiarie for sums borrowed by the incorporation. The estate of the corporate body, as being the fund on the faith of which the creditor contracted, is the only one to which he can look for repayment. Public trading companies, incorporated by a royal grant or by an act of Parliament, are also proper corporations, which endure in continual succession during the time appointed by their charter. But private copartnerships do not fall under this description; and being intended merely for the private interests of the copartners, they may be constituted without the authority of the King or Parliament. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 28, et seq.; More's Notes, pp. clxxvi. et seq., cciii.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 64; Bank, B. i. p. tit. 2, § 18, et seq.; Bell's Com p. 240, 6th edition; Brown's Synop. h. t., and pp. 170, 597, 403; Shaw's Digest, tit. Burgh; *Jurid. Comparatio Literarum. The comparison of handwritings. This is one of the means of proving the truth or falsehood of an allegation of forgery; and where genuine subscriptions or writings are brought to prove that a subscription or writing is truly not of the handwriting of the person whose it is said to be, much weight is given to this species of evidence. But when the comparatio literarum is resorted to, to prove that a particular writing has been written by the accused, it is considered as a much more doubtful species of evidence. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 71; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. p. 225; Menzies's Conjecturing; Tait on Evidence, 142, 2d edit.; Dickson on Evidence. See also Hume, vol. i. p. 160; vol. ii. p. 381.

Compearance. This term is applied to the appearance made for a defender in an action. In the Court of Session, if a party appears by counsel, and propones defences, such appearance will have the effect of rendering the decree pronounced in the action what is termed a decree in foro: and the question in dispute between the parties, when decided by a final judgment in which appearance has been made for both parties, is termed a res judicata. Stair, B. iv. tit. 38, § 5, and tit. 40, § 8; Jurid. Styles, vol. iii. p. 973; 1672, c. 16; Skand's Prac. 311. If no defences have been lodged, though appearance have been entered, and the process taken out to see, and counsel have appeared for the defender at the first enrolment, and got the case continued, decree pronounced thereafter, in respect of no defences, is nevertheless a decree in absence; 19 D. p. 474. Compearance in civil causes in the Sheriff-courts is made by notice lodged with the clerk in terms of 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 3. See Decree. Res Judicata. Absence.

Compearer. A party not called as a defender in an action, but who conceives that he has an interest to oppose the action, may compare and claim leave to sist himself. If his claim is sustained, an interlocutor allowing him to sist himself is pronounced, and is designated as Compearer.

Compensation; is a provision of the law of Scotland, by which, where two parties are mutually debtors and creditors, their debts, if equal, extinguish each other; and, if unequal, leave only the balance due. Compensation, except by way of action, was unknown in the law of Scotland until 1592, c. 141, which provides that compensation, de liquido ad liquidum, may be pleaded by way of exception or defence before decree, but not by way of suspension or reduction after decree. Although compensation does not operate ipso jure, but must be pleaded, yet, where it is pleaded and sustained, the mutual debts are held to have been extinguished as at the time of concurrence; and, from that time downwards, the currency of interest on either side is stopped. In order to found compensation, it is necessary,—1. That each party be debtor and creditor in his own right: hence a tutor cannot compensate a debt, properly due to himself, with a sum for which he is creditor tutorio nomine. An executor confirmed, however, is held in this respect to be the same person with the deceased; and therefore, where he owes a debt proprio nomine, he may plead compensation upon a debt due to the deceased; and, on the other hand, a debt due to one who afterwards becomes executor to a person deceased, may be compensated with a debt due by the defunct to the executor's debtor. 2. The parties must be debtors and creditors to each other at the same time: hence, if, before the concurrence, one of them has regularly assigned his debt to a third party, compensation cannot be pleaded against the assignee, on any debt afterwards arising between the original parties, although, where the concurrence has taken place before the assignation, the debtor may effectually plead compensation against the assignee, upon the debt due by the cedent; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 14. 3. The debts to be compensated must be of the same species and quality: hence, a sum of money cannot be compensated with a quantity of corn: because, until the price is fixed at which the corn is to be converted into money, the two debts are incommensurable; yet, in this case, some short time would probably be allowed for ascertaining the conversions, in order to make such a debt a proper subject of compensation; Ersk. ibid. § 15. It would also appear, that where a person is indebted to a bankrupt estate in a specific sum, and has, at the same time, an unascertained claim for damages against the bankrupt for failure to deliver goods, there is room for a plea of compensation on the part of the debtor; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 128, 5th edit. It is proper to observe, however, that the cases referred to by Professor Bell are, as he himself admits, scarcely to be quoted as authorities establishing this point. 4. A debt already due, and payable, cannot be compensated with a conditional debt, or one, the term of payment of which has not arrived; Ersk. ibid. But this holds only where the parties are solvent; for if one of them is bankrupt, the other may plead compensation on a debt which may become due at a future time; Bell's Com. ibid. 5. In strictness, compensation ought not to be admitted where the mutual debts are not clearly ascertained, either by the writ or oath of the adverse party, or by the decree of a judge. But, by invariable practice, if a debtor in a liquid sum pleads compensation upon a debt due to him by his creditor, but not actually constituted, the rule, "quod statim liquidari potest pro jam liquido habetur," is applied, and sentence delayed ex equitate, until the ground of compensation be made effectual. This rule has been applied not only where the counter-claim was offered to be instantly proved by writ or oath, but even where the constitution of the debt required a proof by witnesses (Ersk. ib. § 16); and although a debtor might not, in the ordinary case, be allowed to avoid the payment of what is liquid and payable, during a long litigation on an illiquid counter-claim, yet there is an exception even to this rule in balancing accounts on bankruptcy; for a solvent debtor will not be compelled to pay the liquid debt, and rank for his own illiquid claim, but may plead compensation; Bell's Com. ib. p. 128. 6. From the exuberant trust implied in deposit, compensation is not pleadable by the depositary against the depositor. Nor can it be pleaded against the holder of a note payable to the bearer by the debtor, upon a debt due to the debtor by any former possessor of the note—a doctrine extended to indorsed bills of exchange, which the acceptor cannot compensate against the holder, by debts due to the acceptor by any of the indorsers; Ersk. ib. § 17. Neither is compensation admitted upon a debt extinguished by the long prescription at the time compensation is pleaded, even although at the time of concurrence the prescription had not run; Carmichael, July 1719, Mor. p. 2677. This rule holds also with respect to the shorter prescriptions, where the debtor is dead. But where the debtor is alive, the debt seems not to be in a worse condition than an illiquid debt, which may be instantly liquidated by reference to oath; Bell's Com. ib. p. 128. 7. Where the concurrence is made by the debtor acquiring right to a debt due by his creditor, compensation is not admitted, either where the acquirer is presumed to have had a bad intention, or where the compensation, if sustained, would void the diligence of third parties. Thus, a factor who is sued by his constituent for intromissions cannot plead compensation upon a debt due by the constituent, to which the factor has acquired right, after receiving the rents sued for. Nor can the debtor of a deceased person who, after his creditor's death, has acquired right to a debt due by the deceased, plead compensation on such debt in a question with the creditors of the defunct; Ersk. ib. § 18. Nor, indeed, can compensation be pleaded in any case on a debt which has been acquired mala fide to gain any undue advantage; Bell's Com. ib. p. 130. 8. Compensation may be pleaded not only by the principal debtor, but by any one having an interest, as by a cautioner, or by a competing creditor who has an interest to enlarge the fund for division, by extinguishing the debt of one of the claimants; Bell's Com. ib. p. 131. By the act 1592, c. 141, if compensation has not been pleaded by way of exception in the course of an action, it cannot be pleaded after decree, either by way of suspension or reduction. But if it has been pleaded, and unjustly repelled, it may be again insisted on, either in a suspension or a reduction, where these forms of process are not otherwise incompetent. Decrees in absence, whether of inferior judges or of the Court of Session, are held to be decrees in the sense of the statute; although Erskine seems to think that, as the act of regulations 1672, c. 16, provides, that all defences competent in law may be pleaded against a decree in absence, in the same manner as if there had been no decree; so the defence of compensation ought in no case to be excluded by such a decree; Ersk. ib. § 19. But where the decree in absence has followed upon a summons against one of many debtors included in the same summons, this has been held a sufficient speciality to allow compensation to be pleaded in a suspension; Corbet, 20th March 1707, Mor. p. 2642; A. v. B., 25th Feb. 1747, Mor. p. 2648. So also where the decrees have been set aside on some legal nullity, or the charge has been turned into a libel, compensation is still pleadable; Wright, 25th July 1676, Mor. p. 2640. Neither do baron decrees, nor summary decrees on a clause of registration, exclude compensation; Bent. B. i. tit. 24, § 6, par 27. But it has been found that, after a decree of furthcoming, compensation cannot be pleaded by way of suspension by an arrestee against the arrester on a debt due to the arrestee by the common debtor, although the decree of furthcoming was pronounced in absence of the arrestee; Cunninghame, Stevenson, and Company, 17th Jan. 1809, Fac. Coll. This decision, however, seems to have proceeded chiefly on the ground, that the decree of furthcoming operated as a transfer of the debt to the arrester, who was entitled to trust to his arrestment and furthcoming. When a pursuer is creditor to a defender by a separate debt not included in the libel, he may elide the defender's plea of compensation by pleading recompensation on the separate debt. The rules applicable to recompensation and to compensation are the same; and when recompensation is pleaded, the matter generally resolves into an action of count and reckoning; Ersk. ib.

Where the creditor of a company sues for a company's debt, compensation may be pleaded on a private debt due by the creditor to one of the partners of the company, and this may be done whether the company is solvent or insolvent, in existence or dissolved. The reason for compensation being allowed in such a case is, that the rights of payment and compensation are commensurate, and that, as every partner of a company is liable in the payment of the debts of a company, a debt due by a partner may be pleaded against one due by the company. The leading case on this subject is Bogle's Creditors v. Ballantyne, 8th July 1793, M. 2581. In that case it was observed by a majority of the Court, that in determining the question, there was no occasion to inquire whether the company was solvent or insolvent, dissolved or not dissolved, for that in all these situations the same rule would hold; that when a creditor pursued a company for payment, he could not prevent any one partner from standing forward and discharging the debt, although out of his own private funds; that, on the other hand, a creditor had it in his power to demand payment in solidum from any individual partner without discussing the company; and that, as every partner, therefore, might not only make an ultroneous offer, but might even be compelled to pay, so he also was entitled to plead compensation, it being a general rule that the obligation to pay always implied a right to compensate. It is to be observed, however, that compensation on a private debt due to a partner can only be pleaded against a company's debt with consent of the company; but if the company do not object, it is jus tertii of the creditor to do so. See also the cases, Scott v. Hall & Bissett, 13th June 1809; Russell v. McNab, 26th May 1824, 3 S. 63, N. E., 41; Salmon v. Padon, 17th Dec. 1824, 3 S. 406, N. E. 285. See also Thomson v. Stevenson, 10th March 1855, 17 D. 739. In this last case it was observed, "When a pursuer brings an action against a company where the partners are liable in solidum to the creditor for all the sums sued for, each is a debtor individually for the whole sum. The creditor has every partner liable to him in solidum for the whole amount. If any individual partner has a debt owing to himself individually, he is entitled to plead compensation, and the company is entitled, with his consent, that it shall be so applied. Assignment is not necessary, but consent of the individual is necessary; and he must concur in the application of his individual debt. But with his concurrence the company is entitled to say, 'Our partner, who is individually liable, chooses to pay off our debt in this manner, and we apply his debt in that way:' that is the principle upon which the former decisions proceed."

The doctrine above laid down, being that established by the case of Bogle v. Ballantyne, is strongly controverted by Professor Bell in his Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 664. In the fourth edition of his Principles of the Law of Scotland he states the doctrine in a very qualified manner. "It may be doubted," he observes, "whether a company called upon to pay a debt to one who is creditor of a partner may not arrange with that partner to enable them to satisfy the debt, by assigning his debt to the company, so as to make a concourse." He adds, however, "such arrangement cannot be made after bankruptcy." It is thought, however, that no assignment by the partner to a company of a debt due to him by the company's creditor is necessary; and that the true principle is, that the partner, with the company's consent, may stand forward and compensate the debt due by the company by a debt due to himself, on the ground that he

Professor More, too, in his notes on Lord Stair's Institutions, objects to the doctrine above laid down, and observes, "Where a company happens to be solvent and able to pay its debts from its own proper funds, can any of the individual partners who has a debt owing to him by a creditor of the company, step forward, and, by setting off such debt against the claim of the company's creditor, obtain a preference over all the other creditors of his debtor? It is extremely difficult to hold this doctrine, which, in truth, resolves into this—that the partner of a company is entitled to set off a debt due to him against a claim of which he personally and individually has no right to demand payment. The mere circumstance of being a partner of the company would, according to this doctrine, operate as an assignment in his favour of the claims which any of his private debtors may have against the company." In the first portion of the passage here cited, the doctrine in question is clearly stated. There is some confusion, however, in the statement as to what the doctrine resolves itself into, when it is stated "that it resolves into this, that a partner of a company is entitled to set off a debt due to him against a claim of which he has no right to demand payment." No party, however, can have a right to demand payment of a claim against which he pleads compensation. Although, however, he has no right to demand payment of such a claim, he is under an obligation to make payment of it; and this is the principle on which the doctrine in question is based. Neither can it be said that, according to that doctrine, "the mere circumstance of a person being the partner of a company would operate as an assignment in his favour of the claims which any of his private debtors might have against the company." This would be to entitle the partner of a company to compensate a debt due by him to the company with debts due to the company by parties indebted to him. This, however, is by no means the doctrine in question, which is this—that the circumstance of the creditor of a company being a debtor of a partner of a company operates as an assignment in favour of the company of the debt due by its creditor to the partner.

Although, however, a company may plead compensation against a company's debt on a debt due to one of its partners by the company's creditor, the converse does not hold, that a company's debtor can compensate a company's debt by a private debt due to him by a partner of the company. See the cases Morrison v. Hunter, Dec. 5, 1822, 2 S. 68, N. E. 26; Kerr v. Scott, July 3, 1823, 2 S.

447, N. E., 400; Thom v. North British Bank, Nov. 23 1850, 13 D. 134. Professor More thinks that the same principle should regulate both cases. He observes, "It is quite fixed that the debtor of a company when sued for a debt owing by him, cannot set off or compensate any claim which he may have against one of the partners as an individual; and how the converse of this can be supported upon principle is not so clear." The two cases, however, are very different. Where a company pleads compensation on a debt due to a partner, the partner in right of the debt is himself personally liable for the company's debt; and, being so liable, the company's creditor might, if he pleased, proceed at once against the partner and not against the company. Where, again, a company's debtor pleads compensation against a company's debt on a private debt due to him by a partner of the company, compensation is incompetent, because there is no concursum debiti et crediti, on the simple ground, that although each partner of a company is personally liable for a company's debt, a company is not liable for the debts of any of its partners.

Two other cases still require to be considered. Although a company's debtor cannot compensate a company's debt with a debt due by a partner, a company's creditor may compensate a debt due to a partner with a company's debt; and this, on the same principle that a company may compensate a company's debt with a debt due to a partner, the principle in both cases being, that a partner is individually liable for the company's debt. In the case now supposed, of a company's creditor compensating a debt due to a partner with a company's debt, it is clear that the company's creditor might sue the partner who is his creditor for the company's debt. It therefore follows, that the debt due by the company may compensate the debt due to the partner. The case of Hotchkiss v. Royal Bank of Scotland, Feb. 28, 1797, M. 2673, and affirmed in the House of Lords, 28th Nov. 1787, 3 Paton's App., p. 618, may be cited in support of this proposition. In that case the plea sustained was one of retention and not of compensation. But the grounds on which these two pleas are competent to be pleaded are the same. In that case the Royal Bank of Scotland was sued by the trustee for the creditors of a shareholder of the bank for the transference of bank stock belonging to the bankrupt. The bankrupt was a partner of a company which was indebted to the bank, and the bank claimed retention of the stock in satisfaction of the debt due by the company of which the bankrupt was a partner. The plea was sustained both here and in the House of Lords.

Where, again, a company's debtor sues a partner, the partner cannot plead compensation on the debt due by his creditor to the company; and on this principle, that although a partner is personally liable for all the company's debts, he is not, as an individual, in right of the debts due to the company. There is therefore no concursum debiti et crediti. The company, it is true, may assign the company's debt to the partner, who may then plead compensation upon it, but he cannot do so without a transference of the debt in his favour; and such transference could only be effectual for the purpose of enabling the partner to plead compensation if made before the bankruptcy of his creditor. There is no case, it is thought, giving rise to the point last considered, but it appears to be easily resolvable on principle.

There are thus four cases in which the plea of compensation may arise with reference to company debts, and debts due to or by partners. The first case is, where a company's creditor sues a company, and is met with the plea of compensation on a debt due by him to a partner. The second case is, where a company's debtor is sued by a company, and meets the claim by pleading compensation on a debt due to him by a partner. The third case is, where a partner sues a company's creditor for a private debt, and is met by the latter pleading compensation on a debt due to him by the company. The fourth case is, where a company's debtor sues a partner for a private debt, and is met by the latter pleading compensation on a debt due by the former to the company. The result of the foregoing inquiry shows that compensation is competent in the first and third of these cases, and that it is not competent in the second and fourth. See, on the subject of Compensation, Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 6, et seq.; More's Notes, cxxviii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 11; Bank. B. i. tit. 24, § 4; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 124, 664, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 572, et seq.; Thomson on Bills, pp. 334-38, 834-54; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 7, 258. See also Retention.

Compensatio Injuriarum. The plea of compensatio injuriarum is most frequently met with as a defence against actions of damages for slander or defamation. This plea, however, is not properly a bar to the action, but of the nature of a set-off or counter-claim, which extinguishes or modifies the pursuer's claim. The mutual injuries thus to be set off against each other must be, generally speaking, injuries of the same kind. Thus, a claim of damages for defamation could not be successfully met by an outstanding counter-claim of damages for a former assault; the defender's remedy there being obviously a separate action of damages. On the other hand, a claim of damages for a libel in a newspaper, or in judicial pleadings, may be met and extinguished by a counter-claim for cotemporaneous defamation of the same character, conveyed through the same or a similar medium. A good deal of judicial discussion has occurred on the question, whether or not a counter-action at the instance of the defender is necessary, in order effectually to raise this plea; and it is not, perhaps, very easy to reconcile the authorities and judicial dicta on this point. It has been said, that the plea "is allowed without any separate action, where the injuries are of the same kind" (per Lord Gillies, in Gilchrist v. Dempster, infra); but more recently, the leaning of judicial authority has been in favour of a separate action. This much, however, seems certain, that without a separate action, a defender, in his defences, and at the trial, may found on concomitant injuries of the same kind inflicted on him by the pursuer, and this not only as part of the res gestæ, but as justifying the injury complained of, and extinguishing the claim of damages on that account. Recompensation, however, cannot be proved, since that plea, if well founded, ought to have formed part of the pursuer's direct claim. And in one case, where the defence of compensatio injuriarum had been sustained, and one shilling only of damages given, the Court refused to give the pursuer his costs, holding that the jury must be presumed to have balanced accounts between the parties, and found them equally wrong. Gilchrist v. Dempster, 10th Sept. 1823, 3 Murray, 368; and Borthwick's Law of Libel, App. 433. See also Godard, 4th Nov. 1816, 1 Murray, 156; Edwards, 23d Dec. 1823, and 6th Feb. and 24th June 1824, 3 Murray, 369, et seq.; Borthwick on Libel, 279, et seq., and authorities there cited; Shaw's Digest, Macfarlane's Practice, pp. 223, 288. Competent and Omitted. Those pleas which might have been maintained in the course of a suit, but which have not been stated, are said technically to be competent and omitted. By the stat. 1672, c. 16, § 19, it is enacted, "that decreets in foro contradictorio before the Lords of Session be not again suspended upon reasons competent to have been proponed, or which were repelled in the former decreet." But a final decree in foro of the Court of Session may be suspended or reduced when it labours under essential nullities; e.g., where it is ultra petita, or disconform to its warrants, or where there is an error calculi, &c. And, in the opinion of our greatest law authorities, the Court of Session may also reduce their own decrees upon the emerging of any new fact, or written voucher, not formerly pleaded upon, provided it appears that such fact or document was not known to the party before decree, and wilfully omitted, in order to protract the litigation; Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 44, 50, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 3. The rule as to pleas competent and omitted is not effectual against a minor, although, if the plea has been proposed for the minor, and repelled, he cannot open up the decree; preliminary objections to the form of action and citation must be taken in limine, otherwise they cannot be heard afterwards. After a record has been once closed, new facts will be allowed to be brought forward before decree, provided they have occurred since the closing, or, if they existed before, provided they had only just reached the knowledge of the party, res noviter venientes ad notitiam.

The plea of competent and omitted has no place against a pursuer. If he sue on the same media concludendi, he will be met with the plea of res judicata. If the media concludendi are different, the plea of competent is inadmissible. See Stair, iv. 40, 16; Bankton, i. 10, 217. See also Macdonald v. Macdonald, 26th May 1840, 2 D. 889, 1 Bell's Appeals, 819. See on the subject of the article Stair, iv. 1, 44, 50, et seq.; also Stair, ut supra, § 44; *Ersk. Competition. A competition, generally speaking, takes place wherever two or more persons are claimants for the same right, or on the same fund; but, in the technical language of the Scotch law, the term is most frequently applied to those contests which arise on bankruptcy between creditors, claiming in virtue of their respective securities or diligences. In all competitions of real rights or of real diligences, the preference depends in general upon priority of registration; and, in personal rights, the general rule is, that priority of diligence, not of obligation, determines the preference. But these general rules have been considerably modified by the various bankrupt statutes, one object of which has been to equalize diligences used, or securities granted, within a certain period of bankruptcy. The rules according to which the preference of rights and diligences is determined will be explained in the separate articles in which those rights and diligences are treated of. The chief processes of competition—that is, those processes in which the competing rights or claims are usually determined—are the processes of multiplepoining, ranking and sale, and mercantile sequestration under the bankrupt statute. *Ersk. Completing an Adjudication. An adjudication may be completed for different purposes. It may be completed in order to enable it to compete with other heritable rights, in which case it must be completed by charter of adjudication and sasine; or it may be completed, to the effect of rendering it the first effectual adjudication, under the statute 19 and 20 Vic. c. 91, § 6, 1816. See Effectual Adjudication.

Composition by a Bankrupt. The creditors of an insolvent person are said to accept of a composition when they agree to give him a discharge in full, on his paying them a part, instead of the whole, of the debt he owes them. Extrajudicial agreements of this kind may be entered into, either with a single creditor, or with the whole creditors. In the former case, the agreement will be valid, whatever may be the consideration agreed upon between the creditor and the debtor. Where the agreement is entered into with the whole creditors, it is a mutual contract proceeding on two implied conditions; the one that all the creditors are dealt with equally; the other, that all shall concur, and that no one shall be bound, unless all are bound. The proper evidence of an agreement of this kind is a regular deed on stamped paper, although less formal evidence, particularly where followed by payments, or rei interventus, may bind the parties. It would seem, indeed, that such contracts are within the privileges conceded to writings in re mercatoria, and do not require to be either holograph or tested; Bell's Com. vol. ii. pp. 466, 504, 5th edit.; Tait on Evidence, 120; Dickson on Evidence. In extrajudicial arrangements for settling by composition, no creditor can be required to accept the composition offered unless he pleases.

By the bankrupt statute, 19 & 20 Vict., c. 79, § 137, an offer of composition may be made by a bankrupt or his friends, or, in case of his decease, by his successors, and in case of a company by one or more of the partners thereof, on the whole of his debts, with security for payment of the same, at the meeting for the election of a trustee. If a majority of the creditors in number, and nine-tenths in value, present at the meeting, shall resolve that the offer and security should be entertained for consideration, a meeting must be called by the trustee, to be held after the examination of the bankrupt, to consider the offer; and if the same majority of the creditors present shall resolve to accept the offer, a bond of caution must be lodged with the trustee, and a report of the resolution, along with the bond, is transmitted to the Bill-Chamber clerk, or Sheriff-clerk, in order that the approval of the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff may be obtained, and if approved of by him after hearing opposing creditors, a deliverance to that effect is pronounced by him. An offer of composition may also be made at the meeting held after the examination of the bankrupt, or any subsequent meeting. On a deliverance approving of the composition being pronounced, and on the bankrupt making a declaration, or, if required by the trustee or any creditor, an oath before the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff, that he has made a full and fair surrender of his estate, and has not granted or promised any preference or security, or made or promised any payment, or entered into any secret or collusive agreement or transaction to obtain the concurrence of any creditor to this offer and security, the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff pronounces a deliverance discharging the bankrupt of all debts and obligations for which he was liable at the date of his sequestration. All preferences, payments, and collusive agreements for concurring in a discharge are void, and a colluding creditor who has obtained any preference or payment is liable in the loss of double the value or amount of the preference or payment obtained, and also in the loss of the amount of the debt due to him by the bankrupt; these amounts to be divided among the other creditors of the bankrupt.

If the bankrupt and his cautioners fail to pay the composition, the auctioners will be entitled to rank upon the bankrupt for the whole original debt, and on the cautioners, for the amount of the composition. But the sequestration will not be held to revive on such failure; although, in competition with new creditors, the old creditors will be entitled to rank for their whole debt, deducting only what they have received from the bankrupt or his cautioners, as if it had been a mere payment to account. It would appear, however, that, in the event of a second bankruptcy, where payment of the composition to the creditors under the first has been delayed only for a short time, the cautioners or the new creditors may tender the stipulated composition, and so exclude the first set of creditors from farther competition. Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 472, et seq. 5th edit. See in general, on the subject of Compositions, Bell's Com. ibid. p. 454, et seq.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit., art. 2439; Thomson on Bills, p. 575-80.

Composition to a Superior; is the name given to the entry-money paid to the superior

by a singular successor. The amount of this composition is sometimes fixed, or taxed, as it is termed, in the original charter; but where that is not the case, the superior is legally entitled to demand a year's rent of the subject. The superior's right to this exaction is founded on the acts 1469, c. 37, 1669, c. 18, and 1681, c. 17, by which superiors are bound to enter appraisers, adjudgers, and purchasers at judicial sales, on payment of a year's rent. There was formerly no direct mode of compelling a superior to enter a voluntary purchaser; but as this might always have been accomplished indirectly, under those statutes, by means of adjudication on a trust-bond or bill, the practice prevailed of entering purchasers by private consent, for the same composition which was legally exigible from adjudgers; and the stat. 20 Geo. II., c. 50, by providing, that heirs or purchasers may force an entry from the superior on payment to him of such fees or casualties "as he is by law entitled to receive upon the entry of such heir or purchaser," is held to have placed purchasers and adjudgers in the same situation with respect to entry-money. By the present practice, in settling the composition for a singular successor, the following rules seem to be fixed:—1. In the case of a land estate, the superior is entitled to a year's rent, as the lands are let to tenants, under deduction of feu-duties, public burdens, and annual burdens imposed with the superior's consent. 2. In the case of houses built in a village on ground feued, the same rule applies, with the additional deduction of a reasonable sum for repairs of houses, or other perishable subjects; Aitchison, 14th Feb. 1775, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 15,060; Hailes, ii. 612. 3. Where the vassal has granted a sub-feu, at a fair feu-duty, and not for an elusory payment, or with the view merely of defeating the superior's right, it is now settled that the purchaser or adjudger of the vassal's right is entitled to an entry on payment of one year's sub-feu-duty. This last point was very deliberately decided in a late case between the superior and a vassal who had sub-feued ground on which part of the New Town of Edinburgh is built. The superior demanded a full year's rent of the houses built by the sub-feuars; but the Court held that the vassal's singular successors were entitled to an entry on paying one year's sub-feu duty, that being a year's rent of the subject to which the singular successors were to acquire right; Cockburn Ross v. Heriot's Hospital, 6th June 1815, Fac. Coll.; affirmed on appeal. See Ross, L. C. vol. ii. p. 193. In strict law, the composition by an adjudger is due to the full extent, without regard to the amount of the debt on which the diligence is led; but, ex æquitate, it is frequently modified below its true value; Baird, 18th July 1633, Mor. p. 15,054; and where the adjudger is excluded by a liferenter, he is not bound to pay the composition while the liferent subsists. If the right adjudged be a bare superiority, it was decided long ago that a year's feu-duty is all to which the superior is entitled as composition, because the feu-duty is the only rent to which the adjudger acquires right by his diligence; Monkton, 15th Feb. 1634, Mor. p. 15,020. Where several adjudgers charge the superior to enter them, he is not entitled to more than one year's rent for the whole, for all of their rights make but one right to the land adjudged. In lands holden by the Crown, the composition payable by an adjudger is regulated, not according to the rent of the lands, but by a percentage on the amount of the principal sum adjudged for; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 24. Where the subject adjudged is an annualrent holden base of the debtor, he is bound to receive the adjudger gratis. In like manner, magistrates of royal burghs, being merely the Crown's officer's, are bound to enter adjudgers, and even voluntary purchasers, without exacting any composition; Bank. B. ii. tit. 4, § 32. It was once found, that where a corporation had adjudged, the superior was bound either to enter the corporation as his vassal, on payment of the usual composition of a year's rent, or to pay the value of the lands adjudged; Church and Bridge work of Aberdeen, 11th Dec. 1712, Mor. p. 15,034; University of Glasgow, 24th July 1713, Mor. p. 9296 and 15,075. But the decision in the last of these cases was reversed on appeal; and it has been lately held that the superior is not bound to receive a corporation as his vassal; Hill, 17th Jan. 1815, Fac. Coll. In the last case, the Court did not dictate any particular arrangement for the parties, and doubts were expressed by the highest authority on the bench, as to whether the Court had the power to compel the superior to receive a corporation on any terms. The expedients suggested by some of the judges were, either the entry of a trustee for behoof of the corporation, on payment of the usual composition, or an entry of the corporation itself, with a provision for a duplication of the feu-duty every twenty-five years. The superior is bound to enter an heir of entail, who is likewise heir of the former investiture, for a mere duplicando of the feu-duty; and he is also bound to enter the institute, when not heir of line, on payment of the usual composition due by a singular successor; but it is not held to be settled whether, when the heirs of entail are not also the heirs of the former investiture, the superior is entitled to a year's rent. In two cases in which superiors insisted on having a clause inserted, declaring their right to a composition of a year's rent whenever the heir of entail was not also heir of line to the last vassal, the Court held that the superior is not entitled to insert such a clause, but that he may insert a reservation of his right to make the claim when the separation takes place. M'Kenzie, 4th July 1777, Mor. p. 15,053, and App. Superior and Vassal, No. 2; Duke of Argyll, 19th Nov. 1795, Mor. p. 15,068.

Where the institute or any heir of entail has once paid a composition to the superior, no second composition can be demanded from a subsequent heir of entail, on the ground either that he is not the heir of line of the last vassal, or that he is not the heir of the former investiture. The principle of this is, that on payment of a single composition, a superior is bound to grant a charter in favour of whatever persons the party paying the composition may please to name, and to embody in the charter, if required, the fetters of a strict entail; and the whole persons named in the charter, although strangers in blood to the party paying the composition, or to each other, are entitled, as the heirs of the investiture, to obtain an entry on payment of the casualty of relief. See the cases of Mackenzie v. Duke of Argyll, as above; also Lockhart v. Denham, 10th July 1760, M. 15,047; and Stirling v. Ewart, 14th Feb. 1842, 4 D. 684; and affirmed in the House of Lords, 4th Sep. 1844. See also Ross, L. C., vol. ii. p. 329, et seq.

Where the institute of an entail is also the heir of the last investiture, but the entail comprehends various substitutes who do not possess that character, the institute, it is thought, is entitled to be entered as an heir, on payment merely of the casualty of relief; but it is also thought that the superior is entitled to the insertion of a clause in the charter feudalizing the entail, reserving his right to claim payment of a composition from a party claiming an entry who is not the heir of the former investiture; but on such composition being once paid by such party, no subsequent composition, it is thought, would be due. This appears to be the result of the combined cases of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, and Stirling v. Ewart. See on the subject of this article, Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 41, and B. ii. tit. 4, § 32; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 11, and B. ii. tit. 12, § 24; Bank. B. ii. tit. 4, § 11, and B. iii. tit. 10, § 15; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 23; Bell's Princ. art. 715, et seq. See Entry of Heirs.

Compound Interest; is never allowed on the sum in the original obligation or agreement; but it is common, by posterior contracts, to accumulate interest, and make it a principal bearing interest: and interest due in terms of the act 1621, c. 20, if decreet and horning follow thereupon, will bear interest. Annualrent paid by a cautioner bears interest against the principal debtor, since, quoad him, it is a disbursement, and truly a principal sum. In some cases of peculiar hardship, though not coming under these rules, compound interest has been allowed; and, by 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 19, the House of Lords is empowered, upon hearing appeals from Scotland, to adjudge the payment of compound interest upon the sums found due, if the said House shall, in its sound discretion think meet so to do. Stair, B. i. t. 15, § 8; More's Notes, p. lxxix. See the cases, Jolly v. McNeill, 28th May 1829, 7 S. 656; McNeill v. McNeill, 26th May 1826, 4 S. 455; in the House of Lords, 22d Dec. 1830; 4 W. & S. 455.

Where payment of a debt is improperly withheld, and the creditor is obliged to have recourse to an action to enforce payment, interest on the arrears of interest appears to be due from the date of the citation in the action. The principle of this is, that at the date of the action the pursuer claims two sums—the amount of the principal sum, and also the amount of the arrears of interest due on that sum. The debtor, by refusing payment of the two sums claimed, when cited in the summons to do so, renders himself liable for interest on both the sums. See on this subject the case of Napier v. Gordon, 1st Dec. 1829, 8 S. 149, and 21st Jan. 1830; 8 S. 357, and in the House of Lords, 3d Oct. 1831; 4 W. & S. 745. See also the case of Maclean v. Campbell, 15th Feb. 1856, 18 D. 609. See Interest. Accumulate Sum.

Compounding Felony, or Theft-bote; in English law, is where a party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon agreement not to prosecute. It is a misdemeanour punished with fine and imprisonment. Tomlin's Dict. h. t. See Theft-bote.

Comprising, or Apprising; was the ancient form of diligence used for attaching land for debt. See Adjudication. Diligence. Apprising.

Compromise; in English law, is understood to be a mutual promise of parties to submit matters in dispute to arbitration. In Scotland, the terms submit or refer are generally used; and a power to compromise is understood to be a power to adjust and settle a difference. Doubtful claims connected with a sequestrated estate may be compromised by the trustee and a majority of the commissioners. More's Notes on Stair, p. 1; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 415, 5th edit. See Commissioners. Arbitration.

Compulsion. Acts done or rights granted on compulsion, or under the influence of force and fear, such as would shake a man of ordinary firmness and resolution, are reducible; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 26. See Force and Fear. In like manner, crimes perpetrated under constraint, where vis major and imminent personal danger are distinctly proved; as, for example, where a person has been found in arms against government during a rebellion,—or acting with a mob, or with pirates,—or even engaged in some minor outrage,—where the continued influence of superior force can be proved, it will be a sufficient defence against the criminal charge. Bell's Princ. § 12; Illust. ib.; Hume, vol. i. p. 50.

Compurgator; one who bears testimony to the credibility of another. Of old, a man's credit, in courts of law, depended on the opinion which his neighbours had of his veracity; and a party swearing was accompanied with a certain number of his neighbours to attest his credibility. Tomlin's, h. t.

Computation of Time. The question whether or not a particular period of time has legally expired, may have very important effects on the rights of parties; and it is therefore of importance to attend to the rules by which time is computed. The following points seem to be fixed: 1. Where time is computed by years, as in the prescriptions, the years will be reckoned from the nominal day in one year to the same nominal day in the following year. Thus, if a debt be payable on the 15th May 1800, the 15th May 1840 will be the last day of the long prescription, and an interruption on that day will be effectual. Where a right is made to depend upon the expiration of a single year, a day is generally added in majorem evidentiam; hence the expression “year and day”; and the running of any part of the additional day completes the period. In this case, the brocard, Dies inceptus pro completo habetur, is applicable. Thus, a marriage contracted on the 1st January 1800 will be held to have subsisted year and day, to the effect of giving the husband right to the tocher, if the wife should die on the morning of the 2d January 1801; Waddell, 25th Feb. 1680, Mor. p. 3465. In reckoning the year and day for the pari passu ranking of adjudications, if the first adjudication were dated 1st February 1800, an adjudication dated 2d February 1801 would have the benefit of the pari passu ranking; Bangour, 26th Jan. 1681, Mor. 3467. 2. In computing by days, the days are reckoned from midnight to midnight. Thus, where an imprisoned debtor applies for liberation under the act of grace, the ten days will not be held to have expired until twelve o'clock, p.m., of the tenth day; Blair, 11th Nov. 1704, Mor. p. 3468; Hood, Henderson, & Company, 14th Dec. 1813, Fac. Coll. Where the granter of a deed challenged under the law of deathbed lived for fifty-nine days and three hours, computed de momento in momentum, after executing the deed, the Court held the deed to be reducible, on the ground that the law requires the granter to have lived for sixty days, without counting the day on which the deed was executed; Ogilvie, 10th, Dec. 1793, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 3336. This decision was affirmed on appeal, and in the note of the judgment of the House of Lords, the House is said to have held, that if, exclusive of the day of executing the deed, the granter had lived until the morning of the sixtieth day after, the maxim, Dies inceptus pro completo habetur, would have applied; and, accordingly, it has been so decided; Mitchell, 3d Feb. 1801, Fac. Coll. Mor. App. voce Deathbed, No. 4. On the same principle, the sixty days before bankruptcy, under the act 1696, § 5, and the sequestration statutes, are reckoned backwards, exclusive of the day of the bankruptcy, the first of the sixty days commencing from the midnight preceding the bankruptcy, and being held as concluded the moment the sixtieth day begins; Blakie, 21st Jan. 1809, Fac. Coll.; Anderson, 2d March 1813, Fac. Coll. In citations, and in computing the induciae of diligence, it is also settled that the action cannot be called, or a horning denounced, until after the midnight of the last day of the citation or charge. In computing the sixty days within which an instrument of sasine had to be recorded, the day of taking the infestment, as being the terminus a quo, was not counted, and registration at any time on the sixtieth day after that was effectual. Bell's Com. ii. 178; More's Notes to Stair, pp. cclvii. and cccxv.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, Mackenzie's Obs. on Stat. p. 353.

Concealing Crimes. The protection of a criminal after the commission of a crime, by concealing him from justice, knowing his guilt, is a distinct offence, which may be punished arbitrarily; Hume, 274, 281. Where, however, the protection is given in consequence of an agreement entered into before the commission of the crime, such concealment will be found a charge against the concealer of art and part in the principal crime; Ersk. B. 4, tit. 4, § 13; Alison's Princ. 231. See Accessory. Accomplice. Art and Part.

Concealment of Pregnancy. By the act 1690, c. 21, concealment of pregnancy authorized conviction for the murder of the child, if it was amissing or found dead. But by 49 Geo. III., c. 14, it is enacted, that if a woman "shall conceal her being with child during the whole period of her pregnancy, and shall not call for or make use of help or assistance in the birth; and if the child shall be found dead or be amissing, she shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding two years." By the latter statute, the concealment is not held to be a presumption of the murder, but to be itself a crime. The concealment must continue down to the death of the child; for the mother's keeping and acknowledging the child, for however short a time, will render the statute inapplicable. Premature labour, shown to be the cause of the child's death, is a sufficient defence; but the burden of proving it lies upon the panel. This is the only crime in which, from the nature of the major proposition, there can be no accessions; and the minor consequently need not contain the charge of art and part; 11 Swinton's Rep. 572. Disclosure to the putative father is a sufficient defence; Gall, 1856, 2 Irvine, 367. The punishment usually awarded is from three to six, and, in aggravated cases, from nine to eighteen months' imprisonment. Hume, i. 291, et seq.; Bell's Notes, p. 80; Alison's Princ. 163; Burnett, 572; Steele, 100. See Child-Murder.

Concluded Causes. A cause is said to be a concluded cause where a proof has been allowed, and the term for proving has elapsed; Shand's Prac. 964. In the older practice of the Court of Session, the cause was then called before a Lord Ordinary on the Acts; the proof was declared to be concluded, and a state of the process was prepared by the assistant to the Inner-House clerk, under the authority of the Lord Ordinary on concluded causes. This state was printed and distributed amongst the judges for decision in the Inner-House; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 32. This form, with some rare exceptions, is practically superseded by the introduction of jury trial in civil causes. The prepared state is still sometimes made up in actions of proving the tenor. Shand's Prac. 840; Stair, B. iv. tit. 35, § 5, and tit. 46, § 8, et seq.; 2 Ivory's Forms, 1127. See Jury Trial.

Concourse of Actions. By the Roman law, different actions were competent on the same ground of right; but by the law of Scotland there is no civil action in which the pursuer has this privilege; for although, in some actions partly of a penal nature, the pursuer may insist either for the actual damage, or for violent profits, yet, if he once make his election, and claim simple restitution only, he cannot afterwards sue for violent profits. But our law admits a concourse of actions, in the special case of facts which may be prosecuted either civilly or criminally; for a prosecution to satisfy public justice is entirely different, both in its nature and object, from a mere prosecution ad civilem effectum; and even although in the criminal prosecution, the accused may have been acquitted, yet it is still competent for the private party to institute a civil action against him, founded on the same facts, which, in a civil process, where a debt or damages only are sought, may be referred to the defender's oath; a mode of proof inadmissible in a criminal prosecution. Stair, B. iv. tit. 48, § 9; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1. § 64.

Concourse of the Lord Advocate. Although a private party who has a proper interest may institute a criminal prosecution at his own instance, concluding for the ordinary pains of law against the accused person; yet, by ancient and invariable style, such prosecution at the instance of a private party must be raised with concurrence of the Lord Advocate. This concurrence is necessary to every libel in the Court of Justiciary, whether the full pains of law, or pecuniary reparation only, be concluded for; and also in criminal proceedings before the Court of Session (Shand's Prac. 196); and, even in the ordinary civil action of reduction-improbation, which, fictione juris, is laid upon criminal grounds, but which is pursued ad civilem effectum only, the Lord Advocate's concurrence is necessary; Shand's Prac. 639. It would rather appear that, although the Lord Advocate may no doubt exercise his discretion in refusing his concurrence, where the proposed prosecution is manifestly absurd or illegal, or at the instance of a party whose title to prosecute is evidently defective, yet, in the ordinary case, he is not entitled to exercise any such discretion, but must give his concurrence when required, and that, even if he were formally to recal it in Court, the prosecution might still proceed at the private instance. In mutual libels at the instance of the private parties founded on the same facts, the Lord Advocate must give his concurrence to the action of each party. Hume, vol. ii. pp. 119, 126. See Criminal Prosecution.

Condescendence is the name given to a judicial pleading. Before the recent Court of Session Act, where the parties did not agree to hold the summons and defences as setting forth fully the facts and pleas upon which they respectively founded, or, when the Lord Ordinary thought fit, he ordered the pursuer to give in a condescendence, and the defender answers thereto, which papers altogether superseded the summons and defences. The condescendence was drawn by counsel, and set forth in substantive propositions, and under distinct heads or articles, all facts and circumstances pertinent to the cause of action, which the party alleged and offered to prove. In the answers the defender met the averments in the condescendence by admissions or denials; and if he meant to rely on a series of counter-averments, he subjoined them to his answers also, in an articulate form, under the title of "Defender's Statement of Facts." Annexed to each paper were the pleas in law maintained by the parties. The papers were then revised, and the record closed. See 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, §§ 8, 9, 12; A. S. 11th July 1828. Now, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 36, and A. S. 31st October 1850, the summons only sets forth the name and designation of the pursuer and defender, and the conclusions of the action. The statement of the grounds of action is set forth in an articulate condescendence, having a note of pleas in law subjoined, which is annexed to the summons and constitutes a part of it. The defences must be in the form of articulate answers to the condescendence, with a statement of the defender's allegations in fact, if necessary, and a note of pleas in law appended. The summons is signed by a writer to the Signet, the defences by counsel. If the pursuer do not choose to close the record upon summons and defences, the pursuer then revises his condescendence, and the defender his defences. The record is thereafter adjusted before the Lord Ordinary in chambers, and closed. See Summons. Defences. Record. Prorogation. By § 10 of the said statute, the records are to continue to be made up in the old form in processes of competition, such as rankings and sales, and multiplepointings, and other causes to which the new regulations are not applicable. Strictly speaking, the parties ought, along with their papers, to lodge in process all writings in their custody, or within their power, on which they found. Such writings are, however, admissible productions at any time before closing the record; A. S. 11th July 1828. Where a party has not the papers essential to enable him to aver correctly, he may get a diligence for their recovery. See Diligence. Where, again, the mutual averments and answers can be safely made without the written evidence, it may be recovered in modum probationis, after the record is closed. But, generally speaking, where documents exist, or are supposed to exist, which may be decisive of the cause without the intervention of a jury, or the aid of parole evidence, it seems to be desirable (although in this respect the judicial practice has by no means been uniform), to afford the parties every facility for the recovery of the documentary evidence, prior to the completion of the pleadings and the closing of the record. In processes of suspension, and in certain advocations, the pleading, called Reasons of Suspen- sion or of Advocation, is substantially a condescendence; and the provisions of the recent statute as to making up the record, apply, so far as may be, to processes of suspension and advocacy. See Advocation of Suspension. In the Sheriff-courts, where the record is not closed upon the short minute introduced by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 3, the record is made up under that statute, by articulate condescendence and defences, in a manner similar to that pursued in the Court of Session. Barclay's McGlash. Sher. Court Prac. p. 203, et seq. See on the subject of this article, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, §§ 8, 9, 12; Shand's Prac.; Barclay's Dig. h. t.; A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 105, 55, 49. See also, Pleas in Law. Record. Commonly.

Condescendence and Claim. In a process of multiplepoining, the claimants on the fund in medio must state their respective claims in the form of condescendences, with the conclusions, deduced in the shape of notes of pleas in law. The usual form is, first to aver the facts articulately, as in an ordinary condescendence; then to make the claim thence resulting, and to conclude with pleas in law. Where a competition ensues, the several condescendences and claims are ordered to be revised; and each claimant, in revising his own condescendence, must subjoin answers to the condescendence and claim of every other competitor. The injunction of the Act of Sederunt is, that the competition shall thereafter proceed as nearly as may be like an ordinary action; but practically, the records thus made up are complicated and awkward. A. S. 11th July 1828, § 48. See Condescendence. Multiplepoining. Ranking and Sale. Record.

Condictio Indebiti; was an action in the Roman law for repetition of money paid to a person, under the belief that there was a debt due to him, when there was in reality no debt due. By the law of Scotland, action is also given for recalling a payment made through mistake or ignorance. Writers on the civil law, founding on the maxim, "Ignorantia juris neminem excusat," have made it a question whether a sum paid through a mistake in law is recoverable by this action. The Court of Session, on the ground that this was an equitable relief, formerly held that a mistake, whether in law or in fact, was a sufficient reason for recalling a payment; Carrick, 5th August 1778, Mor. p. 2931; Bank. B. i. tit. 8, § 23, et seq. From this rule there were the following exceptions: 1. Payment made under a natural obligation, though the law would not have enforced it, cannot be recalled. 2. If the person by whom the payment was made knew at the time that no debt was due; for in that case the person must have been presumed to have given the money in a present; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 54. A payment made in consequence of a compromise, and in order to put an end to a law-suit, cannot be recalled, though it may afterwards turn out that the claim so compromised was unfounded; Oliver, 16th May 1798, not reported, but noted; Ersk. ib. A creditor who had obtained a preference in a ranking to which he was not entitled was found liable to repetition, although he had got no more than payment of his debt. Keith, 14th Nov. 1792, Mor. p. 2933; Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 9; More's Notes, p. xlix.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 531; Bell's Illust. art. 534; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 200.

In the case of Wilson v. Sinclair, 7th Dec. 1830, 4 W. & S. 398, however, it was laid down in the House of Lords, that when a person pays money under a mistake, he has no right to recover the money so paid, unless it was paid under a mistake in point of fact; and that if he pays by mistake in point of law, he has no right to recover it. It was further laid down, in the same case, by the House of Lords, that in the case of a payment by mistake in point of fact, the party can only recover if the mistake was unavoidable, and no fault of the party making the payment; but that if he had himself to blame, being ignorant of the fact which rendered the payment unnecessary, but having the means of knowledge of the fact within his power, and did not use those means, no action to recover would lie. The law on this point was again laid down to the same effect in the House of Lords in the case of Dixon v. Monkland Canal Company, 17th Sept. 1831, 5 W. & S. 445. In neither the case of Wilson nor of Dixon was it necessary to decide the point of law adverted to in these cases. In the former of the two cases the point was not pleaded, and the judgment was rested on the ground that the party claiming repetition had in his possession the document which contained the error founded on. In the latter case of Dixon, the decision was not necessary for the judgment, which was an affirmance of the judgment of the Court of Session refusing the claim of repetition, and proceeding on the special circumstances of the case. See on the subject the case of Dickson v. Halbert, 19th Feb. 1854, 16 D. 586.

Condictio causa data, causa non secuta; was a Roman law action, by which things given with the view to a certain event might be reclaimed if that event did not take place. The example of this commonly given, is that of presents made in contemplation of a marriage which did not take place. But if the expected event had been prevented by a cause not imputable to the receiver, no action lay, unless he unduly delayed, when he might have performed. Stair, B. i. tit. 7, § 7; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 10; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 131.

Condition si sine Liberis Deceaserit. By the Roman law, if one made a donation of all, or the greater part of his estate, when he had no children, and came afterwards to have children, the gift became void, upon the presumption that, if the donor had anticipated having children of his own, he would not have made it. There is no example of this implied condition in our law, where the donation was inter vivos, and perfected by delivery; but, in testamentary settlements, or donations mortis causa, the doctrine is recognised with us, if the testator leaves a child, of whose existence in utero he is not presumed to have known. But if the children have been actually born during the testator's life, and if, notwithstanding, he allows the settlement to remain for a reasonable time unrevoked, it would rather seem that it cannot be set aside, especially if it was not of the whole, or the greater part of his estate, and provided it does not prejudice the child's legal or conventional provisions. The principle on which this doctrine rests has been applied in heritable as well as moveable succession, and has been extended to the case where a testator makes a provision for, or a destination in favour of, his child or children, whom failing, on a stranger. In such a case, where the immediate children of the testator have predeceased him, but leaving children, the grandchildren will exclude the stranger substitute. But as this rule of construction rests on a legal presumption, that presumption may be elided by contrary evidence, or by opposite presumptions, founded on the circumstances of the particular case. The general rule, however, is well settled. See Ersk. B. 3, tit. 8, § 46; Beak, B. i. tit. 9, § 5; Bell's Princ. § 1776, et seq.; and particularly Mowbray v. Scougall, 9th July 1834, 12 S. 910, affirmed on appeal; 2 S. & M'Lean, 305.

The application of the condition si sine liberis is not confined to the case of the children and grandchildren of the maker of the settlement, but it has been extended to the children of legatees to whom the testator is an uncle, or other near collateral relative. In the case of Walker v. Walker, 7th Dec. 1744, M. 10,328, also 14,858, the subject of the bequest was the whole effects of the testator, which were estimated in the deed at a particular sum. The mother of the testator was the institute in the bequest, and his brothers and sisters were substituted to heir nominatim. The sisters predeceased the institute; but it was held that their children, although not expressly called, had right to their parents' shares. In the case of Mackenzie v. Holte, 2d February 1781, M. 660, &c., the bequest was in favour of the children of three persons named, these children being substituted to the institute in the bequest. Some of the children predeceased the institute. It was held that the issue of such children had right to their parents' shares, but that the nearest of kin of those who had predeceased the institute without issue had no right. It does not appear from the report of the case what was the degree of relationship, if any, which existed between the substitute legatees and the testator. In the case of Wallace v. Wallace, 28th Jan. 1807, M. App. Clause No. 6, the children in whose favour the condition si sine liberis was applied, were the grand-nephews of the testator, whose parents had predeceased the liferenter of the bequest. In the case of Christie v. Paterson, 5th July 1822, 1 S. 543, N. E. 498, the children who were favoured were second cousins of the testator. Lord Gillies in that case observed, "that he could not admit that there was any distinction in principle between the parties being first and second cousins, or more distant collaterals." In the case of Dixon v. Brown, 10th June 1836, 14 S. 938; House of Lords, 2 Robinson 1, a father left the residue of his succession, consisting both of heritable and moveable estate, to his eldest son nominatim, who had a family at the date of the settlement, but without mention of the son's heirs. It was held that the possession did not lapse by the son predeceasing his father by one day, but that it transmitted to his children. Where a tenement was directed to be liferented, and, on the death of the liferenter, to be sold, and the price divided among the heirs of the testator then living, it was held that the term heirs was not equivalent to children, and that, therefore, the conditio si sine liberis was inapplicable; Black v. Valentine, 17th Feb. 1844, 6 D. 689. See Menzies's Lectures.

Conditions in Feudal Grants. Where particular conditions or stipulations are inserted in feudal grants, with the view either of more effectually securing, or of modifying in some respect the rights of parties, it is an important inquiry, whether such stipulations are to be considered as mere personal obligations, binding upon the parties and their heirs, or as real qualifications or conditions of the grant, effectual against singular successors. It seems to be settled, that an obligation on the part of the vassal to take infeftment on the charter within a certain time, or not to dispose before he has himself entered, or not to disappoint the superior of an entry by subfeuing, or any similar obligation, although it may serve as the ground of diligence, or of an action against the vassal or his representative, will have no effect against singular successors. But if the stipulation be declared a condition of the grant, it has been thought that it will not only qualify the vassal's right so long as the right remains personal, but that, if the condition be inserted in the instrument of sasine, and so appears in the record, it will operate as a real qualification, effectual against purchasers and creditors, as being, on strict feudal principle, a condition, without compliance with which the superior is not bound to give an entry. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 26, 5th edit.

The stipulations must be neither illegal nor contra bonos mores. Hence, it has been questioned, whether any legal obligation can be created by a stipulation, sometimes inserted in feudal grants, by which it is provided, that the superior's law-agent shall pass the infeftments on the various transmissions of the right. Such a condition has been in general reprobated as a discreditable attempt to infringe the ordinary rules of professional practice. In the case of Campbell v. Dunn, 28th May 1825, 2 S. 341, N. E. 299, where such a condition was inserted under the sanction of nullity, the court, although not without considerable difference of opinion, held the condition lawful. The judgment was appealed, when the case was remitted to obtain the opinion of the whole court; 1 W. & S. 690. The case was afterwards compromised; but not before the opinions of the consulted judges were returned, which are given in 6 S. 679. Of the consulted judges, Lords Justice-Clerk Boyle, Pitmilley, Meadowbank, Medwyn, Glenlee, and Newton, returned opinion in favour of the superior's claim; and Lords Alloway, Cringleton, Mackenzie, and Eldin, returned a contrary opinion, on the ground that the condition was vexatious, and one in which the superior had no interest, and that it was capable of answering no purpose but that of creating an office in favour of his agent, to the direct and manifest annoyance and prejudice of the feuders. See also 3 Ross, L. C. 291. Where a superior inserts such a clause, and insists on its being implemented, he is responsible to his vassal for the negligence or ignorance of the agent, whose services he is thus compelled to take. Bell's Princ. § 861, et seq.; Ross's Lect. ii. 304, 362; Shaw's Digest; Menzies's Lectures.

Where the burden or condition is not contrary to law, it is not essential that any voces signatae, or technical form of words, should be employed. There is no need of a declaration that the obligation is real, that it is debitum fundi, that it shall be inserted in all the future infeftments, or that it shall attach to singular successors. Neither is it necessary that the obligation should be fenced with an irritant clause. On strict feudal principles, a condition in a feudal grant is effectual as a condition of the grant, without a compliance with which the superior is not bound to give an entry to the heir or disponee of his vassal. See the case of Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, 20th Dec. 1834, 13 S. 226; House of Lords, remitted 23d May 1837, 2 S. & M'L. 609; affirmed August 3, 1840, 1 Rob. 296. See also 3 Ross, L. C. 269. See also, on the subject of this article, Burdens. Clause of Pre-emption. Clause de non Alienando.

Conditional Obligation. A conditional obligation is an obligation depending on the existence of a condition. Such an obligation has no force until the condition exist, or be purified, as it is termed, because it is in that event only that the party declares his intention to be bound; hence the condition of an uncertain event suspends not only the execution of the obligation but the obligation itself. An obligation of this kind is held to be but "an obligation in hope till the condition be existent;" Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 7; but the granter is so far bound that he cannot revoke the hope he has given. Creditors may attach conditional debts; and if the obligation does not depend on the life of the particular individual, it is transmitted to heirs, in case the creditor should die before the existence of the condition. All obligations depending on uncertain events are properly conditional; thus, an obligation depending on the arrival of a day which may possibly never arrive is conditional; hence a provision payable to a child on his arrival at a particular age falls if the child die before reaching that age; and the same rule is also extended to legacies, although a contrary doctrine at one time prevailed; Ersk. B. iii. tit. i. § 6 and 7, and note. Conditions adjoined to obligations are divided into possible and impossible; the former are such as may naturally and legally happen; the latter such as either naturally or legally cannot come to pass, for what is contrary to the law, or contra bonos mores, is held to be legally impossible. Possible conditions are distinguished into potential or potestative, i.e., such as are within the power of the party burdened with them; and casual, being such as depend upon an uncertain event over which the party has no control. Contracts are null if illegal or impossible conditions are annexed, it being presumed that the parties are not serious. But such conditions adjoined to legacies are simply held pro non scriptis, and the legacy remains pure; for nemo præsumitur ludere in extremis, and the testator is presumed to have seriously intended to give the legacy. The same rule holds in bonds of provision by parents to children in implement of the natural obligation; illegal or irrational conditions annexed to them being held pro non adjectis; Bank. B. 1, tit. 4, § 17. It was formerly held that this rule was also applicable to unfavourable conditions, such, for example, as a condition that the grantee should not intermarry with a particular person, or without the consent of certain individuals; but the rule at present established seems to be different; for although these and such like conditions are not strictly enforced, if unreasonably insisted on, yet they are to a certain extent held to be effectual. Thus, if consent to a suitable marriage is unreasonably withheld by the parties whose consent is made a condition, the provision will be effectual even although the marriage is contracted without the consent, and this whether the provision comes from a father or from a stranger; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3. § 85. And, in general, all potestative conditions will be held as fulfilled if the grantee has done his utmost to fulfil them: thus, if the condition be that the grantee shall intermarry with a particular person named, the condition will be purified by the grantee's paying his addresses to that person, although he is rejected; provided he has not unduly delayed doing so, or made his addresses in such a manner as to insure their being rejected; Ersk. ibid. Conditions depending merely on accident must be purified before the obligation can be enforced; but if the arrival of the condition has been prevented by the act of the debtor, or of any other person unduly interested in preventing its arrival, it will be held as purified, on the principle that no man can profit by his own wrong; Ersk. ibid. Although an uncertainty annexed to an obligation renders it conditional, it is to be observed, that an uncertain day is not merely a day the arrival of which is uncertain, but the very existence of which is uncertain. Thus, the day on which a person shall arrive at a particular age may never exist, but the day of his death must certainly arrive: the former, therefore, is an uncertain day, which creates a condition; the latter creates no condition; and an obligation to take effect on the day of a person's death is not in law a conditional obligation, although its operation is suspended until that event arrives. This distinction ought to be kept in view in applying the maxim, "Dies incertus pro conditione habetur." Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 7, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 6; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 288, 339; Bank, B. i. tit. 4, § 19; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 236, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 49, et seq., 93, et seq.; Bell's Illust. art. 93; Brown on Sale, pp. 32, 42, et seq.; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 149; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Thomson on Bills, pp. 10, et seq., 375, et seq.

Conditional Legacy. The doctrine explained in the preceding article applies to the case of a conditional legacy. Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1881; Menzies's Lect. See Legacy.

Conditional Institute. Under destinations of heritage, those who are entitled to take up the succession as the immediate disponees of the granter, are called institutes, in contradistinction to the substitutes, who succeed as heirs to such persons. Frequently, however, the institution of a particular person is, by the terms of the deed, made contingent upon certain events. Thus, a person may be instituted conditionally, upon the failure of others prior to the period when the destination will take effect. In such a case the survivance of such person, when the succession opens, vacates the right of the institutes. If the institute does not survive the opening of the succession, the property will descend to the substitutes. Bell's Princ. 4th edit. art. 1745, et seq.; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. i. p. 397; Sandford on Entails, p. 14, et seq. See Tailzie.

Cases of conditional institution in land rights seldom occur in practice. A conveyance to a party, in the event of the granter leaving no heirs of his body, is a proper case of conditional institution; for, if the granter leaves heirs of his body, the conveyance falls. If also the conveyance contains substitutions, these also will fall, because the conveyance being to the conditional institute, if that fail the substitution must fail also. If, however, the conveyance be to a party failing heirs of the granter's body, it is not so clear that in such a case the conveyance would fall in the event of the granter leaving heirs of his body. In such a case there is room for holding that the granter intended the conveyance to take effect after the heirs of his body had failed, although they may have existed at his death. A conveyance by the granter to the heirs of his body, whom failing, to another party, differs very little in its conception from a conveyance to a party, failing heirs of the granter's body; and it might be contended that, in both cases, the conveyance was to take effect, and not to fall if heirs of the granter's body existed at the granter's death. The case of Stevenson v. Barr, 24th June 1784, M. 14862, however, appears to be opposed to this view. In that case a husband, by his contract of marriage, disposed a tenement to the children of the marriage, and, failing children of the marriage, to his spouse, and the precept of sasine was in favour of the wife and her heirs and assignees. A child of the marriage existed, and survived its father, and on its death a competition arose between its mother and its uncle, who claimed the tenement as the heir of the child. The mother pleaded that the declaration of the fee in favour of the child-dren of the marriage could have no other effect, when followed with the expression "failing them," than if it had been succeeded by that of "whom failing." On the part of the uncle it was pleaded that, by the child surviving its father, it became vested in the fee, and that, therefore, its mother could not succeed but as a substitute; but that the terms of the deed, and especially those of the precept of sasine, implied a conditional institution only, for that the mother's infestment under her husband's precept could be of no avail after the fee had devolved upon another. A majority of the court, chiefly influenced by this fact of the precept having been granted directly in favour of the wife, considered her as a conditional institute, and accordingly altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, who had found that the children of the marriage having failed by the death of the only child of the marriage, the mother was entitled to the fee of the subject, it being specially provided to her, failing children of the marriage. Apart from the circumstance that the precept was granted directly in favour of the mother, it could scarcely be doubted that she was a substitute to her children, because the conveyance was in favour of the children, and, failing them, to their mother. The case, therefore, is not an authority for the proposition that a conveyance to a party, failing heirs of the body of the granter, falls by the granter being survived by such heirs.

In practice a substitute is termed and treated as a conditional institute, where the institute predeceases the granter of the deed, and such substitute is therefore entitled to take infestment directly on the precept in the conveyance, without any service either to the granter of the deed or to the institute. A service to the granter would be inept, because the deed of conveyance vests nothing in him. A service to the institute would also be inept, because, by his predeceasing the granter of the deed, nothing either vested in him. If, therefore, the substitute satisfies the notary that the institute and prior institutes are dead, an infestment in his favour would be valid. Such appears to be the sound view of the matter; but much difference of opinion has existed on this subject both at the bar and on the bench. By some it has been thought that, in all cases of substitution, the substitute must serve to the institute, although he may have predeceased the granter of the deed. The opposite view, however, appears to be more in accordance with sound legal principle; and so the majority of the court decided in the case of Fogo v. Fogo, 11th March 1842, 4 D. 1063. In the House of Lords the judgment of the court was affirmed; but it was unnecessary to determine whether a service by a substitute to an institute who had predeceased the granter, was necessary or not, because the party whose deed was challenged had, in point of fact, served to the predeceasing institute; and therefore there was no necessity for the point adverted to being decided. The point, however, may be held to be ruled by the opinions of the majority of the court below. See Menzies's Lectures on Conveyancing.

Condonation; forgiveness; usually applied, in Scotch law language, to the plea of remissio injuriæ, as a defence against an action of divorce on the ground of adultery. See Remissio.

Confarreatio; the most sacred of the three solemn modes of contracting marriage among the Romans. It consisted, as the name imports, in the pontifex maximus and flamen dialis joining and contracting the man and woman, by making them eat of the same cake of salted bread; or, according to Ulpian, in the offering up of some pure wheaten bread, each of the parties eating a portion, and throwing a portion upon the victims sacrificed on the occasion. See Marriage.

Confession; the acknowledgment or avowal of a fact. A confession or declaration of guilt made by a criminal, in presence of a judge, is not admitted of itself as evidence against him; but it affords a presumption: and being proved to the jury on the trial by those present at the time when the confession was made, to have been truly the voluntary confession of the criminal, it will be held to be evidence, in terms of the act 1587, c. 91. The evidence required for establishing the fact of the acknowledgment having been made by the panel, is that of two concurring witnesses. But this declaration is not equivalent to a confession by the panel in presence of the jury, which is conclusive evidence against him; 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 14; nor will it by itself be received as a proof of the crime. It will necessarily affect the minds of the jury in weighing the evidence in the cause, but it ought to do no more; Hume, vol. ii. p. 324; Burnett, 488; Alis. Prac. 578; Bell's Notes, 239; Dickson on Evid. 722, 734. Accordingly, if the only evidence against a panel, besides his declaration confessing the crime, is proof of the corpus delicti, the court will direct the jury to acquit, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient in point of law; and the same course is followed where some slight suspicion only attaches to the panel from other evidence. A confession, before ecclesiastical courts, of adultery, or of any other offence which gives the church scandal, being held as extrajudicial as to prosecutions on the same grounds before other courts, is no proof against the party either as to civil or criminal effects, even although it be followed by public church censure; Bank. B. iv. tit. 32, § 20. In ordinary civil actions, a party may be called upon to confess or deny any relevant matter of fact, and, if he refuse, he will be held as confessed. By A. S. 11th July 1828, § 105, it is declared that where a statement in point of fact, within the opposite party's knowledge, is averred on the one side, and not denied on the other, he shall be held as confessed. The judges in inferior courts are also empowered, either before or after closing the record, to order the parties, either by writing under their hands, or at a judicial examination, to confess or deny such facts as may be thought pertinent; and the party failing to comply with the inferior judge's order will be held as confessed; A. S. 10th July 1839, § 66, 67. As to the older practice, see A. S. 1st Feb. 1715, § 6 and 7; 7th Feb. 1810; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 1, et seq. See also Calumny, Oath of. Condescence. Declaration. Criminal Prosecution.

Confident Person. In the sense of the act 1621, a confident person may be defined generally to be an intimate and confidential friend. The term seems applicable in particular to a partner in trade, a factor or steward, a confidential man of business, or a servant or other dependent. The deeds of an insolvent person in favour of those so connected with him, if granted without a just and necessary cause, and a price bona fide paid, are reducible at the instance of his prior creditors, under the act 1621, c. 18. The proof of the confidential situation of the grantee lies with the challenger of the deed, and that being proved, the person founding on the deed challenged has the burden of proving that it does not fall under the act; for a conveyance to a confident person is not null præsumptione juris et de jure. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 15; More's Notes, p. lxi.; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 187, 5th edit. See also Conjunct Persons. Collusion.

Confidentiality. In order to insure perfect freedom of communication between a law-agent and his client, a bar is generally placed upon the production, in modum probationis, of their communications. Neither can an action of damages be founded upon confidential letters by a law-agent to his client, nor upon statements made by a client to his agent, in reference to a depending or threatened process. But an agent must produce all writings which the party himself would have been bound to produce; and even letters between the client and another party, put into the hands of the agent as legal adviser. It has been decided that a former agent is bound to secrecy. But there are conflicting decisions upon the point, whether the production of communications made without reference to any suit, depending or anticipated, can be enforced. The authorities will be found collected in Dickson on Evidence, p. 930. In England it is settled that the privilege of confidentiality is not qualified by any reference to proceedings pending or in contemplation; and that it extends to attorneys consulted on title, as well as those employed in a cause. An agent concealing that the debt for which he demands and attempts to enforce payment is already paid, is liable to repeat it. The client, by calling his own agent as a witness, waives the privilege of his agent's silence; 15 Vict., c. 27, § 1. The privilege extends only to professional legal advisers, with their clerks; non-professional persons, except in certain special cases, or factors, accountants, &c., are not included under the rule of silence. Communications between several parties engaged on the same side of a suit, and between the counsel and agents of the respective parties to an action, are privileged. There are, however, other relations in which confidentiality is preserved. Thus, public officers are not entitled nor compellable to produce written communications made to them officially, relative to the character and conduct of a party applying for a public office, where the production is demanded, in contemplation of an action of damages against the writer. An agent in a criminal trial has the same privilege in reference to anything he knows as agent. It is not settled whether confessions made by a criminal to a clergyman, to relieve his burdened conscience, are privileged; and distinctions have been attempted to be made between such confessions by a prisoner in custody with a view to trial, and confessions made prior to incarceration by a party conscious of guilt, the latter being thought to form part of the history of the crime, and to be unprivileged; 2 Hume, 335, 350; Alison's Prac. 471, 537, 586. The point is still open in Scotland, though in England such communications have been decided not to be privileged. Professional men, as surgeons, physicians, &c., are not entitled to withhold anything, however confidential. While husband and wife are now admissible as witnesses for and against each other in most civil cases, no husband is competent or compellable to give, against his wife, evidence of any matter communicated by her to him during marriage, nor, vice versa, any wife competent or compellable to give such evidence against her husband; 16 Vict., c. 20, § 3. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, iv. 43, 9; Ersk. Inst. iv. 2, 25; Hume, ii. 350; Bell's Princ. § 2254; Shand's Prac. See Agent. Evidence.

Confirmation, Charter of. The modern form of a disposition to a purchaser, includes the clauses of a charter a me as well as de me, and when the disponee has taken infeftment on the indefinite precept of sasine, contained in a disposition, with this double manner of holding, such infeftment will not only constitute a valid base right in the person of the disponee, from the date of the infeftment; but the superior may, by confirmation, render that infeftment equivalent to infeftment on a precept of sasine granted by himself, and thus render the right public. This is accomplished by a charter of confirmation from the superior; so called, because it ratifies and confirms the right granted to the purchaser, and the sasine following upon it. The charter of confirmation narrates and specially confirms the whole conveyances and infeftments since the last public infeftment, and declares them to be as effectual as if they had been verbatim engrossed in the charter of confirmation, or as if it had been granted before taking the infeftment. The other clauses do not materially differ from those in an original grant, except that, as infeftment has been already taken, the charter of confirmation contains no precept of sasine. The confirmation in the ordinary case operates retro to the date of the infeftment, and renders it as effectual as if it had proceeded from the first on the superior's precept. A charter of confirmation is one of the most ordinary methods of completing a purchaser's title; at the same time, where the progress is intricate, unless particular attention be paid to the state of the titles, serious mistakes may be committed. When the disponee wishes to confirm intermediate base rights, and to resign on the procuratory of his immediate author, so as to complete his own title by a charter of resignation from his superior, care ought to be taken that the confirmation ends with the sasine in favour of the granter of the procuratory on which the resignation is intended to proceed; for, by confirming the disponee's own sasine, his right becomes public, and his author's procuratory useless, as in the case supposed; Jurid. Styles, vol. i. pp. 433, 524. Although the disposition to a purchaser, in its ordinary form, contains a double manner of holding,—that is, a holding either a me de superiore meo, or de me,—yet it may happen that a holding a me only is inserted. In that case, a mere infeftment on the precept will carry nothing until confirmed by the superior; and, in the event of double rights to the same subject being granted by dispositions containing holdings a me only, the preference will depend, not on the date of the registration of the sasine on the rights confirmed, but on the date of the confirmation; because, as such rights are imperfect without confirmation, the right first perfected must be preferable; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 7, § 14. And on the same principle, a charter of resignation, proceeding on the procuratory in a disposition containing such single manner of holding, will carry the property in preference to an unconfirmed sasine on the precept. An improper use of confirmation, or a neglect of due attention to its effect, may give occasion to questions of great nicety and difficulty in the completing of titles. See Consolidation. Base Right. Public Right. Charter. Resignation. Where a disponee dies base infeft, his heir may complete his title by a charter of confirmation and precept of clare constat contained in the same deed, whereby the superior, in the first place, confirms the ancestor's base infeftment, and then grants a precept for infefting the heir. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 28; More's Notes, p. clxvii; Ross's Lect. ii. 149, et seq.; Ross, L. C. vol. 2, p. 127; Menzies's Lectures. See Clare constat.

A disponee who has taken infeftment on the precept in his disposition, and whose infeftment has been confirmed, is not barred from resigning on the procuratory in the disposition, and taking an infeftment in a charter of resignation expedite on the procuratory. The disponee taking this step is held to have two completed titles in his person, and to hold the one without prejudice to the other. See 2 Ross, L. C. 157.

Confirmation of Executor; is the form in which a title is conferred on the executor of a person deceased, to intromit with and administer the defunct's moveable effects, for behoof of the executor himself, or of those interested in the succession. There are, properly speaking, only two cases recognised in the law of Scotland, where the interposition of judicial authority is in this respect dispensed with, viz.,—1st, With regard to those effects of which the next of kin, when not excluded by a preferable title, can obtain actual possession; and, 2d, With regard to those which the deceased has specially conveyed to another, either per expressum, or by reference to an inventory; an exception from the general rule introduced by the act of Parliament, 1690, c. 26. It has also been said, that legitim and jus relictæ are exceptions, since both vest without confirmation; and that the same is the case, where the representative of the defunct gets from the defunct's debtor a bond of corroboration; but legitim and jus relictæ do not vest jure representationis; and in the case of a bond of corroboration, confirmation is obviously rendered unnecessary by the substitution of a new obligation. Hence, the two above specified seem to be the only proper exceptions. Confirmation must be expedite before the commissary of the district in which the deceased has had his principal domicile, or, if he had no fixed domicile, in that where he had lived for the forty days preceding his death. In the case of those to whom this rule will not apply, from the want of a proper domicile; and of those who have died abroad, and who went there animo remanendi, the confirmation proceeds at Edinburgh as the commune forum. In confirming executors, the commissary is bound to follow certain prescribed rules as to the order of preference, which will be found particularly explained, voce Executor. As to the form of procedure; where the executor is an executor-nominate, he lodges with the clerk of court the deed containing his nomination, along with an inventory of the defunct's moveable estate. It was formerly necessary for him to find caution; but, by 4 Geo. IV., c. 98, § 2, this is dispensed with in the case of an executor-nominate; and an extract, containing the inventory and a copy of the deed, with the act of confirmation by the judge, completes his title. This is called a confirmation of a testament-testamentary. In the case of an executor-dative, the party promoting the procedure receives from the court what is called an edict, which is published on inducit of nine days by a messenger-at-arms or officer of court, on a market-day, at the market-cross of the head burgh of the county where the deceased lived, and at the parish-church door, at the dismissal of the congregation on a Sunday. See Edict. This edict is afterwards called in court; and when a competition ensues, the judge is guided by the rules explained voce Executor. The office of executor is conferred by decree-dative; an inventory is lodged; caution is found by the executor; and his title is then in all respects analogous to that of an executor-nominate. This is called a confirmation of a testament-dative. Where the edict has been moved by one of the nearest of kin, or by a creditor, any other equally near in kin, or any other creditor in pari casu, may be conjoined in the office on application. By the existing statutes regulating the duties on moveable succession, it is incumbent on every person who applies to be confirmed executor, whether testamentary or dative, to give up on oath a full inventory of the deceased's moveable estate, so far as known to him; and the whole moveable estate of the deceased known at the time must now be confirmed. But it is lawful to make an oik to such confirmation, also upon oath, of any part of the estate which may be afterwards discovered, special assignments under the act 1690, c. 26, being excepted; as also in the case of confirmations by executors-creditor, the confirmation may be limited to the amount of the debt and sum confirmed, to which the creditor must make oath; every application for confirmation as executor-creditor being notified in the Edinburgh Gazette, at least once, immediately after such application shall be made; which must be proved by production of a copy of the Gazette, before the confirmation can be further proceeded in; 4 Geo. IV., c. 98, §§ 3 and 4. A mere nomination as executor, or a mere decree-dative without a confirmation, vests no right, except a title to pursue. It is the confirmation which confers the right to recover and discharge. As to the transmission of the right to confirm, it is enacted by the above statute, that in all cases of intestate succession, where the person who, at the death of the intestate, was his next of kin, dies before confirmation is expedite, the right of such next of kin shall transmit to his or her representatives, so that confirmation may be granted to such representatives in the same manner as might have been granted to the deceased next of kin, immediately on the death of the intestate; 4 Geo. IV., c. 98, § 1. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 54; More's Notes, ccciv; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 27, et seq.; Bank. vol. 2406; Bell's Com. i. 81; Bell's Princ. § 1888, et seq.; Jurid. Styles ii. 500, 3d edit. See Executor. Executor-creditor. Licence to pursue.

Confirmation; in English law, a conveyance of an estate, or right in esse which one hath in or to lands, &c., to another that hath the possession thereof, or some estate therein.

Confiscation; is a forfeiture of lands or goods to the Crown, being part of the punishment of certain crimes. See Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 1, et seq. See Escheat.

Conform, Decree. See Decree Conform.

Conform, Letters. See Letters Conform.

Confusio; is a kind of specification, and is used to express the mixture of liquids or fluids; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 17; see Commixtion. A debt, again, is said to be lost confusione, where the debtor succeeds to the creditor, or the creditor to the debtor, so that the same person becomes both debtor and creditor. See the following article.

Confusion; is one of the modes by which obligations may be extinguished. It takes effect where the debt and credit meet in the same person, either by succession or by singular titles; for, as one cannot be a creditor or a debtor to himself, the law holds the debt to be extinguished confusione, whenever a person stands in that predicament, whether he has succeeded as heir, or has acquired right by assignation. But, although this be the general rule, there are certain modifications and exceptions which must be kept in view in applying it. 1. Where a cautioner for a debt succeeds to that debt, or acquires right to it, his cautionary obligation is of course extinguished; but the principal obligation remains as effectual as ever. 2. Where a creditor in a moveable debt succeeds to the heritable estate of his debtor, the debt is not extinguished. It is not lost confusione by that succession; for, though the heir in heritage be liable, it is only subsidiarie, and, therefore, he may demand the debt from the executor, who is primarily liable in personal debts. 3. Where an executor acquires right to an heritable debt, the debt, in like manner, is not extinguished, but may be made effectual against the heir in heritage. 4. A debt affecting the ancestor's estate, acquired by an apparent heir after the death of the ancestor, is not extinguished confusione by being vested in the person of the apparent heir; for the heir, while unentered, does not represent the debtor, and, consequently, the debt and credit do not meet in the same person. Upon the same ground, a debt purchased by the debtor's heir, who is liable præceptione hereditatis, is not extinguished in the person of the heir; a præceptio hereditatis not being considered as conferring such an universal active title as renders the heir eadem persona cum defuncto. 5. The conveyance of a debt affecting an entailed estate, in favour of one of the heirs of entail and his heirs whomsoever, may not have the effect of extinguishing the debt confusione. The debt, indeed, is dormant during the life of the heir of entail to whom it was conveyed; but if the next heir of entail is not also heir of line to his predecessor, the debt will revive in the person of the heir whomsoever against the heir of entail; Gordon, 1st Dec. 1757, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 11161; Crauford, 11th Mar. 1809, Fac. Coll. A debt does not become extinguished confusione, when the succession to the fund or subject liable for it, happens to be afterwards divided from the succession to the debt itself. See Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 9; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 23, et seq.; Bank, vol. i. p. 496, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 580, 1298.

The general rule is, that confusion is properly not an absolute extinction, but rather a suspension of obligations. Wherever, therefore, the creditor in the obligation has an interest to keep up the debt, it is held to be only suspended, and not extinguished.

Gonge D'Elire; is the name given to the King's licence or permission, sent to a dean and chapter, to proceed to the election of a bishop, when any bishopric becomes vacant. Tomlins' Dict.

Conjoining of Processes. Where two or more processes in the Court of Session, relating to the same subject-matter, and in which the same parties are interested, are in dependence, and it appears expedient that they should be discussed together, the Lord Ordinary before whom they depend, on the motion of the parties, may pronounce an interlocutor conjoining the processes; after which they are proceeded in as one process. The processes at the time of being conjoined, must be both awake and in dependence before the same judge. Where, therefore, they have been originally brought before different Lords Ordinary, it is necessary that they should be remitted ob contingentiam to the leading process, and both in the roll, or at avizandum, together, before an interlocutor conjoining them can be pronounced; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838. Where necessary, the court may disjoin conjoined processes. See on the subject of this article, Ivory's Form of Process, ii. 52; Bees-ridge, ii. 599, et seq.; Shand's Prac. 500; M'Glash. Sher. Court Prac. 321. See Contin- gency.

Conjunct Rights; are rights taken to two or more persons jointly.

Conjunct rights to strangers.—Where a right is granted in favour of two persons, strangers to each other, “in conjunct fee and liferent, and their heirs,” the two are equal fiars during their joint lives. On the death of either of them, the survivor has the liferent of the whole, and after the survivor's death, the fee divides equally between the heirs of both. Where the right is taken “to two jointly and their heirs,” the conjunct fiars enjoy the subject equally during their lives; and on the death of either, his share descends to his own heir. Where the right is taken “to two jointly, and the longest liver and their heirs,” the expression, “their heirs,” is understood to mean the heirs of the longest liver; and therefore, although the creditors of either of the conjunct fiars may attach their respective shares while both are alive, yet, upon the death of either, the survivor has the fee of the whole, exclusive of the heir of the predeceased, in so far as the predeceased's share is not exhausted by his debts. Where the right is taken “to A and B jointly, and to the heirs of B,” the heirs of B are substituted both to A and B, and will take the whole, if neither A nor B have disposed of their shares, to the exclusion of the heirs of B. Stair, B. 2, tit. 6, § 10; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 35.

Conjunct rights to husband and wife. In questions between husband and wife, where the right is taken to them, “in conjunct fee and liferent, and the heirs of their body,” or “their heirs” indefinitely, the general rule is, that the husband is sole fiar, and the wife a mere liferentrix; “their heirs,” therefore, are held to be the heirs of the husband, and his creditors may attach the right, subject only to the wife's liferent. But this general rule suffers several exceptions, founded on the presumed intention of the parties, as arising out of the different circumstances of particular cases. Thus, where the subject comes from the wife, or her relations, and the expression is not such as to indicate a preference in favour of the husband, the wife is fiar, the husband merely liferent, and his creditors cannot attach the subject. The wife, however, cannot convey it, nor can her creditors attach it, without a reservation of the husband's liferent. The wife is also fiar on her survivorship, if the fee be destined to the survivor. Where the destination is to husband and wife, and the survivor, and "their heirs," if the husband predecease, the fee will be held to be in the wife and her heirs, not in the heirs of the marriage. In a case where heritable property was conveyed by a husband, in an antenuptial contract of marriage, to himself and wife, "in conjunct liferent, during all the days of their lifetime, and to the longest liver of them, and their heirs or assignees, in fee," the fee was held to be in the surviving wife; M'Grigor, 3d Jan. 1831, 9 S. & D. 675. But where the subject so destined belonged originally to the husband, it would seem that, during his life, he may alienate it, or his creditors may attach it; Ferguson, 22d July 1739, Mor. p. 4202; Riddels, 6th Nov. 1747, Mor. p. 4203. Where the subject has come from the wife as tocher, and has been destined to the husband and wife in conjunct fee and liferent, the strongest expressions of preference in favour of the wife will be required, in order to vest her with the fee; Bruce Henderson, 20th Jan. 1790, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 4215, where the fee was held to be in the husband. If the wife's heirs are preferred in the destination, the fee is also in the wife. It is to be observed, however, that it is not a proper criterion of this preference, that the wife's heirs are last named in the substitution, unless there be no intermediate substitutes between the heirs of the marriage and them; for where there are such substitutes, that spouse is deemed fiar where heirs are first called after the heirs of the marriage. Stair, B. ii. tit. 6, § 10; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 36; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 56, et seq. 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 1953; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 33. See Ross, L. C. vol. iii.

Conjunct rights to parents and children. Where rights are taken to a father in liferent, and to his children nascituri in fee, the fee is in the father, and the children have a mere spes successionis, defeasible by the father's creditors; Frog's Creditors, 25th Nov. 1735, Mor. p. 4262. But where the children are in existence, and the right is taken to the child or children nominatim in fee, the fee is held to be in the child named, even although the right has been acquired by the father, and destined to the child gratuitously; M'Intosh, 28th Jan. 1812, Fac. Coll. Even where the children are not yet born, if the right be taken to the father in liferent, "for his liferent use allenarly, and to his children nascituri in fee," this form of expression will limit the father's right to a mere fiduciary fee, for behoof of the children, which cannot be affected by the father's debts or deeds; Newlands, 9th July 1794, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 4289, affirmed on appeal; Watherstone, 25th Nov. 1801, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 4297; Harvey, 26th May 1815, Fac. Coll. But the words, in order to exclude the father, must be clearly taxative; a destination of the subject to the father "during all the days of his life, and to the children in fee," will import a full fee in the father; Lindsay, 9th Dec. 1807, Fac. Coll., Mor. App. voce Fiar; Robertson, 20th Nov. 1806, Fac. Coll., Mor. App. Fiar absolute, limited. It is quite settled that, where a subject is conveyed to trustees for behoof of a certain person in liferent, and of his children nascituri in fee, the father is not fiar; Selon, 6th March 1793, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 4219. Where a subject had been taken to husband and wife, "and longest liver of them two in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and to their son nominatim in fee," with a reserved power of disposal to the father, the fee was found to be in the father, on the ground apparently, that, by the terms of the destination, there was a fee actually vested in him; Wilson, 14th Dec. 1819, Fac. Coll. See this case particularly, and the authorities there cited. See also on this subject, Stair, B. ii. tit. 6, § 10; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 35, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 575, and vol. ii. p. 337; Bell's Com. i. 56, et seq. 5th edit.; *Jurid. Conjunct or Confident Persons. By the act of Sederunt 12th July 1620, ratified and approved as law by stat. 1621, c. 18, the Court of Session declares that, in all actions pursued by any "true creditor for recovery of his just debt, or satisfaction of his lawful action and right, they will decreet and decern all alienations, dispositions, assignations, and translations whatsoever, to any conjunct or confident person, without true, just, and necessary causes, and without a just price really paid, the same being done after the contracting of lawful debts from true creditors, to have been from the beginning, and to be in all time coming, null, and of no avail, force, or effect, at the instance of the true and just creditor, by way of action, exception, or reply, without further declarator." And in case any one shall have bona fide purchased the subject from the conjunct or confident person for a fair price, or shall have obtained it in satisfaction of a just debt, in that case, "the right lawfully acquired by him, who was nowise partaker of the fraud, shall not be annulled in manner foresaid, but the receiver of the price of the said lands, &c., from the buyer, shall be holden and obliged to make the same forthcoming to the behoof of the bankrupt's true creditors in payment of their lawful debts. And it shall be sufficient probation of the fraud intended against the creditors, if they, or any of them, shall be able to verify, by writ or oath of the party receiver of any security from the dyvour or bankrupt, that the same was made without any just and necessary cause, or without any true and competent price; or that the lands and goods of the dyvour and bankrupt being sold by him who bought them from the said dyvour, the whole or the most part of the price thereof was converted, or to be converted, to the bankrupt's profit and use." In the sense of this act, conjunct persons are brothers, sisters, sons, sons-in-law, uncles by consanguinity or affinity, stepsons, sisters or brothers-in-law, and, in general, all persons who, by their relationship to the insolvent person, would be legally incapable of acting as witnesses or judges in a cause in which he was concerned. A confident person is a confidential and intimate friend; e.g., a partner in trade, or a factor, or steward, or confidential man of business, or a servant, or other dependant. See Confident Person. With regard to this statute, which has given rise to questions of construction of considerable difficulty, it may be observed in general, that it was intended to aid the common law, by which, independently of statute, all fraudulent alienations by insolvent persons, to the prejudice of their lawful creditors, are reducible. The chief benefit, indeed, conferred by the act 1621, seems to be that of creating certain legal presumptions, which have the effect of throwing the burden of disproving fraud on the parties concerned in the transaction, wherever they are so connected as to give rise to strong suspicions of collusive or fraudulent proceedings; and it would rather appear that, with reference to this object, the statute has been liberally interpreted. It is not meant to detail here the various difficulties which have occurred in the application of this act, but the following points in the construction of it deserve attention:—1. The challenging creditor must have been a creditor at the date of the alienation challenged; or, at least, his debt must have had its origin prior to the date of the alienation, or he must have lent money to pay off prior creditors, so as to come into their place. It is sufficient, however, that the debt of the challenging creditor is conditional, or even gratuitous; and, where the challenge is at the instance of a trustee for creditors, it is enough if the debt of any of his constituents is prior to the alienation. 2. The deeds liable to challenge are all conveyances or obligations, direct or indirect, which may confer on the grantee property belonging to the debtor, or which may enable the grantee to claim in competition with onerous creditors, or save him from a demand for payment of a debt due by him to the debtor. 3. The proof of conjunct or confident lies with the challenging creditor; but, if that be proved, the presumption of law is, that the debtor was insolvent at the time of granting the deed, and that it was granted without value; and, in order to support it, the person founding on it must prove either that the grantor was solvent at the time of granting it, or that a just price, or some other onerous consideration, was given for it. 4. With regard to the consideration, it must be a fair price paid bona fide, and not collusively, to answer the debtor's purposes. It is not necessary, however, that the consideration should be a payment in money; it will be a sufficient onerous cause to support the deed challenged, if it has been granted in consequence of a legal obligation undertaken during solvency, or if it be a deed in implement of an antenuptial contract of marriage. It is a more difficult question where the deed has been granted in implement of a mere natural obligation, as in the case of provisions made for a wife or children in a postnuptial contract; but even in such a case it would seem that the marriage will be regarded as a sufficient onerous cause, to support moderate provision, provided they are not struck at by the act 1696, c. 5, nor are otherwise objectionable; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 33, et seq. 5. It is a sufficient defence against a challenge under this act, that the debtor was solvent at the time of granting the deed challenged; Ersk. ib. § 32. 6. The challenge is competent before the Court of Session only; and, by invariable practice, it is made in the form of an action of reduction, although that form seems not to be indispensable. 7. The effect of a decree of reduction is a restitutio in integrum, as between the parties to the fraud; but where a third party has bona fide purchased from the conjunct or confident person, without being aware of the nullity to which his title was exposed, the sale will be effectual, the challenger's remedy in that case being a claim against the bona fide purchaser for the price if not paid, and, if paid, an action against the receiver of the price for restitution. Lastly, The benefit of the legal presumptions created by this act may be lost by undue delay, or mora, in bringing the challenge. See the subject of this article fully treated, Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 457; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 186, et seq. 5th edit. See also Collusion. Diligence.

Conjunction of an Adjudication. When a first adjudication is called in court, the process must be intimated on the walls and in the minute-book, in terms of the statute 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 9, that those ready to adjudge may be conjoined. For this purpose, twenty sederunt-days are allowed, in order that those who have liquid grounds of debt, and summonses of adjudication labelled and signetted, may produce them in the clerk's hands, and be conjoined in the adjudication. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 723, 5th edit. See Adjudication.

Conjunctly and Severally. When two or more persons are bound conjunctly and severally to perform an obligation, they are liable singuli in solidum, and it is in the option of the creditor to exact performance, either from each of them proportionally, or to enforce the obligation to the full extent against any one of them, leaving him to seek his relief from the rest. The general rule in joint obligations is, that the obligants are bound pro rata, unless the contrary be expressed, or unless in the case of bills of exchange, or where the obligation is an obligation ad factum præstandum, and so indivisible. *Ersk. Conquest. In explaining this term, it is necessary to distinguish between its meaning, as applied to succession in heritage, and the construction it receives when it occurs in a contract of marriage.

Succession of Conquest. Those heritable rights to which the deceased has succeeded as heir to his ancestor, are sometimes termed heritage in a strict sense, in contradistinction to conquest, which term is applied to such heritable rights as the deceased has acquired by singular titles, e.g., by purchase, donation, or even excambion. When left to the destination of the law, heritage, as thus limited, descends to the heir of line, and conquest ascends to the heir of conquest. There is room for this separation in the succession, however, only where the deceased has died without lawful issue, leaving brothers both older and younger than himself, or the issue of such brothers, or two or more uncles, older and younger than the father of the deceased, or the descendants of such uncles. In such cases heritage descends to the immediate younger brother of the deceased, or to the next younger brother of his father, but conquest ascends to the immediate elder brother or uncle. Where the deceased is the youngest brother, and leaves two elder brothers, the youngest surviving brother is heir both in heritage and conquest; and where the deceased leaves but one brother, he is necessarily heir both of line and conquest. In conquest as well as in heritage, the whole blood excludes the half blood. Conquest can ascend but once. Thus, where one who has acquired an estate by singular titles dies, although this estate may ascend to the heir of conquest, yet in the person of such heir it becomes heritage, and will descend to his heir of line. Where a father propels an heritable subject to his eldest son, who at the date of the gift is heir alioqui successurus, it will not be conquest in the son. But such a grant in favour of an heir presumptive merely seems to be conquest; if the right was granted, for example, by a person having no lawful issue, in favour of his brother, it is conquest in the brother; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 15. See also Short, 13th Feb. 1771, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 5615. All rights to lands, and other heritable rights which require sasine to complete them, fall under conquest, including heritable bonds; but rights to teinds, leases, annuities, pensions, and personal bonds, excluding executors, descend to the heir of line. Ersk. ib. § 16; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 10. See Succession.

Provision of Conquest in a contract of marriage. In contracts of marriage, the conquest acquired during the marriage, or a certain proportion of it, is frequently settled either on the heir or on the issue of the marriage; and in giving effect to a provision of this kind, it is to be observed, that conquest in this sense means only such an accession of fortune as renders the husband locupletior, and does not therefore necessarily include all that has been acquired during the marriage by singular titles. A subject purchased with money acquired by industry or economy is conquest in this sense; but land or any other subject purchased with borrowed money, is not conquest of the marriage, except in so far as the subject may be of greater value than the price paid for it. A clause of this kind will be defeated by onerous or rational deeds, but a deed merely gratuitous would be reducible, as granted in fraudem of the provision. The father retains, however, during his life, the uncontrolled right of fee in the conquest; and notwithstanding the dissolution of the marriage, no action lies at the instance of any of the children for enforcing the provision; so that the conquest quoad the father must be computed, not as at the time of the dissolution of the marriage, but at the time of his death; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 43. The question as to what subjects fall under a clause of conquest, will be determined by the expressions used in the particular clause out of which the question arises. Without an express provision to that effect, it will not include what devolves on the husband by succession; Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 52. Thus legacies to a wife stante matrimonio, falling to the husband jure mariti, were found not to be conquest under such a clause, generally expressed; Rae, 23d Jan. 1810, Fac. Coll. But, on the other hand, where the clause conveyed "all heritages, goods, gear, debts, sums of money, or other moveables which should be acquired during the standing of the intended marriage," it was held to carry leases acquired during the marriage, although leases do not, in their own nature, fall under the denomination of conquest. Duncan, 15th Feb. 1810, Fac. Coll.; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 387, 398; Bell's Princ. § 1656, et seq., 1974, et seq.; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. i. p. 3, 30, et seq. See Kames' Elucidations, art. 6.

Conquests; succession of conquest; Skene, h. t. See Conquest.

Consanguinity; is the relationship of persons descended from the same ancestor. It is either lineal or collateral. Lineal or direct consanguinity is that formed between the persons generating and generated; and is either descending, as in the case of parent and child,—or ascending, as from the child to the parent. Collateral consanguinity, termed also transverse or oblique, is that which exists between persons descended from the same common ancestor, but not from one another, as brothers, uncles, and nephews. Bell's Princ. § 1527, 1646, et seq. See Heir.

Consensus, non Concubitus, facit Matrimonium; a Roman law maxim, adopted in the law of Scotland, importing that marriage is constituted by the conjunctio animorum, or consent alone; so that, though the parties, after consent given, should, by death or disagreement, or from any other cause, except impotency, happen not to consummate the marriage, conjunctio corporum, they are nevertheless entitled to all the legal rights consequent on marriage. Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 2, 5, note by Ivory. See Marriage. Consent. Impotency. Divorce.

Consent. The consent of parties is implied in all legal and binding contracts; hence persons legally incapable of giving consent, as idiots, pupils, &c., cannot be parties to a contract. By the Roman law, and by our more ancient usage, this disability was extended to deaf and dumb persons; but if this be the general rule of the law of Scotland, it plainly must suffer exceptions in favour of those persons who, notwithstanding this infirmity, possess abilities which qualify them for the discharge of the most important duties of life. Persons in a state of absolute drunkenness cannot give legal consent, although a lesser degree of intoxication will not afford sufficient ground for annulling a contract. The consent, although given by a person labouring under no disqualification, is null where it proceeds on essential error, or where it has been obtained by fraud, or by force and fear. Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 11; More's Notes, p. clix. and cclxiv; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 16; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 294, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 10, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 8, et seq.; Brown on Sale, p. 152. See Deaf and Dumb.

Consenter. Where one signs as consenter to a deed, by which land is conveyed, his consent is held to amount to a total conveyance of his right to the subject, whatever that right may be; or, at least, such consent will import a valid obligation on the consenter to grant such a conveyance. But where a person, who holds an heritable security over lands, signs as consenter to a disposition of those lands, his consent imports merely that he is not to use his security to the prejudice of the disponee's right, not that he is to discharge his claim for the debt against the debtor personally; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 21. A mere consenter is not liable in any implied warrandice, for he is not the seller, and only gives his consent at the purchaser's desire; and although he thus resigns his own right entirely, he incurs no obligation to warrant the right conveyed, unless his warrandice is made matter of express stipulation. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 25. See Ross, L. C. vol. i. p. 33.

Consequential Damages. See Damage.

Conservator. The conservator of the Scotch privileges in the Netherlands formerly held a mercantile court for Scotchmen resident in the Scotch factory at Campvere, to which he had four merchants as assessors; 1503, c. 81; 1597, c. 259. The Court of Session had a cumulative jurisdiction with the conservator's court over Scotchmen established at the factory. This was one of the offices the appointment to which vacated a seat in the House of Commons. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 34.

Consideration; is the name given to the cause or reason of granting a deed, or of entering into a contract. The consideration may be either onerous or gratuitous. Where value in money, or goods, or services, has been given in return for the deed, the consideration is said to be onerous. Where the deed is granted without value, and from mere love and favour to the grantee, the consideration is termed gratuitous. But where the deed is granted in implement of a natural obligation, such, for example, as the natural obligation on a husband to make a rational provision for his wife or children, it would seem that, although the consideration for such a deed does not fall properly under the denomination of onerous, as above explained, yet that it differs essentially from a consideration merely gratuitous; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 33.

By the law of Scotland, a deed granted for a gratuitous consideration, where not struck at as a fraud against onerous creditors, is as effectual as a deed granted for a valuable consideration, or in implement of a valid legal obligation. Bell's Com. ii. 187; Ross's Lect. ii. 232; Thomson on Bills, p. 103-30, et seq. See Conjunct and Confident. Collusion.

Consignation; is the deposite in the hands of a third party of a sum of money, which is the subject either of a dispute or of a competition. Consignation may be made where the existence or amount of the debt is judicially questioned, as in a suspension; or where the creditor refuses to receive his money, as in wadsets and other redeemable rights; or where it has not been finally determined to whom the money is to be paid, as in the case of consignation of the price of subjects bought at judicial sales, or of the fund in medio in a process of multiplepounding. The general rules as to consigned money are, —1. That the risk of loss, either from the failure of the consignee, or the loss of interest, or the expense of consignation, lies with the consigner, where he ought to have made payment, and not consignation, or has consigned a part only, or has chosen as consignee a person neither authorized by law nor named by the parties; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 31. 2. The charger or other creditor runs the same risk if he has charged for sums not due, or has, without good reason, refused payment when offered, whereby the consignation has become necessary; Ersk. ib. Where, indeed, the creditor has unwarrantably refused to take the money when tendered to him, consignation in the hands even of a private party who is solvent, not only stops the currency of interest against the debtor, but is said by Erskine to be equivalent to payment of the debt; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 5. 3. It is the duty of the consignee to keep the money in safe custody until called for. If, therefore, he puts it out to interest, he does so at his own risk; but, for the same reason, he has right, according to Erskine, to the interest he draws, without being liable in interest to the consigner; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 31. This doctrine, however, appears to be questionable; and, in practice, it is usual to consign money in a public bank, so that the party entitled to it receives it with bank interest for the time it has remained consigned. 4. By 1695, c. 6, the purchaser at a judicial sale was entitled, a year after the decree of sale, to consign the price of the lands, and interest due to the date of consignation, in the hands of the town-council of Edinburgh, or their treasurer; but, by 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 6, this statute is so far repealed, and it is made lawful for the purchaser at a judicial sale, at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the term of payment of the price, to lodge the same, with the interest due on it, in the Royal Bank, or the Bank of Scotland, or the Bank of the British Linen Company, at such interest as can be procured for it; and by doing so, and intimating it to the agent in the sale, the purchaser shall be discharged of the price. By the same section of the statute, the Court of Session is empowered, upon the application of any of the creditors, to order the purchaser to lodge the price and interest in one of those banks, at any of the foresaid terms after the term of payment, sufficient intimation of such application being given to the purchaser and the common agent. 5. The effect of consignation in terms of this statute seems to be, that each creditor's right, whether previously secured over the lands heritably or not, becomes merely personal, and may be attached by the diligence applicable to moveables; Bell's Com. vol. ii. pp. 6 and 276, 5th edit. In wadsets, money consigned for the redemption remains heritable until declarator of redemption; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 23. And, on the same principle, consignation made in terms of the clause of redemption in an heritable bond, will not have the effect of rendering the sum moveable until redemption. Stair, B. i. tit. 13, § 6, and tit. 18, § 4; More's Notes, p. lxxviii.; Ersk. Princ. 11th edit. 217; 296; Bell's Princ. § 215; Illust. ib.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. i. p. 608; vol. iii. p. 979; Thomson on Bills, p. 410, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Ross's Lect. i. 383, 458; ii. 363.

Consignatory; a consignee, or the person in whose hands consignation is made; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 31.

Consignment. In mercantile law, the term consignment is generally applied to goods delivered over or transmitted by one merchant to another, or by a merchant to a mercantile agent or factor, for sale, or for some other specific purpose. The bankruptcy of either the consigner or the consignee may give occasion to questions of considerable difficulty both in regard to reputed ownership, and on other points connected with the rights of the parties or their creditors. But these are questions which must obviously depend in a great degree on the circumstances under which they arise, so that it would be difficult to comprehend them under any general rule. One very ordinary transaction, however, is for the consignee to make advances, either in money or bills, to a certain extent, on the faith of the expected sales of the goods consigned; and, in such a case, the following general rules seem to be fixed:—1. If the consignee should fail, and the consigner be obliged to pay the bills granted to him for such advances, the consigner may demand back his consignment in so far as unsold. 2. If the consigner should fail, the consignee has a lien over the consignment, to the amount of all engagements on the faith of the goods consigned. 3. When both parties fail, the holder of such bills may rank upon both estates for the full amount of the bills, provided he does not draw more than twenty shillings in the pound on his debt. Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 269, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 1456; Bell's Illust. § 1456; Shaw's Digest, p. 20. See Factor.

Consistorial Court. This term was applied to the commissary-court, lately abolished, which came in place of the bishops' court; and the bishops' court derived the term from the courts held by the Roman emperors. See Commissaries.

Consistory; in English law, a prætorium or tribunal. It is commonly used for a council-house of ecclesiastical persons, or place of justice in the spiritual court: a session or assembly of prelates. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Consolidation; in feudal law, is the reunion of the property, or dominium utile, with the superiority, or dominium directum, after they have been feudally disjoined. A proprietor may sub-feu his lands to be holden of himself as superior. The sub-feu is called a base right, and conveys what is denominated the dominium utile, or property; that which remains with the granter of the sub-feu being termed the dominium directum, or superiority. When the sub-vassal wishes to reconvey the property to his superior, he does it by a resignation ad remanentiam in the superior's favour; a mere renunciation of the sub-feu not being held sufficient to accomplish this object. By such resignation the dominium directum and the dominium utile are again united or consolidated as one property in the person of the superior. Where the superior succeeds to the dominium utile, as heir to the vassal, it is necessary for him to complete his title to the property by a precept of clare constat, granted by himself, in his character of superior, to himself as heir to his vassal, on which precept he is infeft. He will then hold the superiority under his former titles, and the property under the precept of clare constat and infeftment; the two estates, although vested in the same person, being entirely distinct. In order to unite them, the proprietor must, in the double capacity of superior and vassal, resign the dominium utile in his own favour ad remanentiam; and in this, as in the former case, consolidate the two estates of property and superiority. In like manner, if the vassal should succeed to the superiority, it would be necessary for him, after having completed his title to the superiority, to consolidate the two estates in the same manner, by resignation ad remanentiam. The same rule holds where, by adjudication or otherwise, the two estates have come to be vested by separate titles in the same person. According to our more ancient practice, it was considered incongruous for the same individual to act in the double capacity of superior and vassal to himself, so that, wherever the two estates came to be vested in the same person, an ipso jure or virtual consolidation was held to have taken place. But the practical inconvenience attending this notion of ipso jure consolidation, and, in particular, its prejudicial effect on the security of the records, led to the adoption of a different view; and it was at last settled, by an almost unanimous decision, that consolidation could not be effected ipso jure, or without resignation ad remanentiam; Bald v. Buchanan, 8th Mar. 1786, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 15084; affirmed on appeal. The separation of property and superiority may take place, not only by a regular sub-infeudation, but also where a conveyance has been made by a disposition containing a double manner of holding. If, for example, the disponee were to die after taking infeftment on the precept of sasine in such a deed, and his heir were to make up his title, by serving heir in general to his ancestor, so as to carry the unexecuted procuratory of resignation, and were then to expedite, and be infeft on, a charter of resignation on the unexecuted procuratory, to which he had thus acquired right, he would carry the mid-superiority merely, and would leave the property in hereditate jacente of his ancestor. In order to complete his titles, and unite the property and superiority, it would be necessary for him to grant a precept of clare constat to himself, as heir to his ancestor in the property, and afterwards to consolidate the two estates by resignation ad remanentiam in his own hands. Where the disponee, in a disposition containing a double manner of holding, has first taken infeftment on the precept, without taking a charter of confirmation, and has afterwards resigned upon the procuratory, and obtained a charter of resignation, the property and superiority are held to be separated, although a different doctrine is held by Lord Stair. See Stair, App. p. 787, and Bell on Purchaser's Title, 319, et seq.; More's Notes to Stair, pp. ccv. cclxiii.; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 209, 444; Bell's Princ. § 821; Ross's Lect. ii. 222, 292, 368. See also Confirmation. Resignation. Disposition. Charter.

The dominium utile may be consolidated with the dominium directum, by a prescriptive possession of the former following on a title to the latter; and this will take place although the effect of the consolidation may be to bring the dominium utile under the fetters of a strict entail. Lord Elbank v. Campbell, 21st Nov. 1833, 12 S. 74; Bartrie v. Graham, 2d March 1837, 15 S. 711; affirmed in the House of Lords, Aug. 6, 1840, 1 Bell, 347; Wilson v. Pollock, 29th Nov. 1839, 2 D. 159. See also 3 Ross, L. C. 534.

Constat, Precept of Clare. See Clare Constat.

Constable of Scotland. The office of Lord High Constable of Scotland is one of great antiquity and dignity. The Lord High Constable had anciently the command of the King's armies while in the field, in absence of the King. He was likewise judge of all crimes or offences committed within four miles of the King's person, or within the same distance of the Parliament, or of the Privy Council, or of any general convention of the states of the kingdom. The office is hereditary in the noble family of Errol, and is reserved, both in the Treaty of Union, and in the statute 20 Geo. II., c. 43, by which heritable jurisdictions were abolished. Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 37.

Constables; are the officers of the justices of the peace, entrusted with the execution of their warrants, decrees, or orders. They are appointed by the justices at their quarter-sessions, two at least for every parish, and more if thought necessary. In royal burghs, constables are appointed by the magistrates. It is the duty of constables, ex officio, and without any special warrant from a justice of the peace, to apprehend offenders against the peace, vagrants, and such as can give no account of themselves, and take them to the next justice. It is also their duty to suppress riots, and apprehend the rioters; but, after the riot is over, a constable is not authorized to apprehend, brevi manu, any person concerned in it, unless one has been dangerously wounded in the fray. See 1617, c. 8; 1661, c. 38. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 16; Hume, i. 386, ii. 75; Tait's Justice of Peace, h. t., and Tait on Duties of a Constable; Blair's Justice of Peace, h. t.

The act 1 Geo. IV., c. 37, authorizes justices to appoint special constables, not only in case of actual tumult, riot, or felony, but also where they have information that any such tumult, &c., has taken, or is likely to take place, and may be reasonably apprehended, such special constables being authorized to act for such time, and in such manner, as the justices shall deem fit and necessary for the preservation of the public peace. Parties appointed under this act generally continue to act until they are removed, or their resignations accepted by the Quarter Sessions. The statute 2 and 3 Vict., c. 65, authorizes commissioners of supply to establish and maintain an efficient constabulary, or police force, in their respective counties, for the prevention of crime, and to levy an assessment for such purpose, in addition to the fund called Rogue Money. The statute 8 Vict., c. 3, provides for the appointment, by the Sheriff or Justices, of persons to act as additional constables and peace officers within the limits of public works—e.g., railways and canals—in process of construction, and within a mile therefrom, with a view to repress the mischiefs arising from the violent and unlawful behaviour of the labourers at such works. See Barclay's Digest, which contains an abstract of the various statutes, and gives also the instructions framed by the present Lord Justice-General for the guidance of the constables of the county of Perth.

Constitution, Decree of. Every decree by which the extent of a debt or obligation is ascertained, is a decree of constitution; but the term is usually applied especially to those decrees which are requisite to found a title in the person of the creditor, in the event of the death of either the debtor or the original creditor. Thus, where the debtor dies, the creditor must obtain a decree, constituting the debt against the heir of the debtor, before he can proceed with diligence to attach the debtor's heritable or moveable estate, unless the heir chooses voluntarily to grant a new obligation in his own name for the debt; or unless he renounces the succession, in which last case a decree of cognition is pronounced. Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. pp. 328, 363. See Cognitionis Causa. Bond of Corroboration. Adjudication.

Constitution; means an ordinance, decision, regulation, or law, made by authority of any superior, ecclesiastical or civil. The constitutions of the Roman emperors had the authority of laws. See Roman Law.

Constructure. See Contexture.

Consuetudinary Law. Consuetudinary or customary law, in contradistinction to written or statutory law, is that law which is derived by immemorial custom from remote antiquity. Such is the common law of Scotland. Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 16; Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 43, et seq. See Common Law.

Consultation of Judges. In cases of difficulty it occasionally happens that the judges of one Division of the Court of Session, consult those of the other Division; or the record and pleadings in the cause are laid before the whole judges for their opinion, on questions stated in writing. In such cases it is enacted, by 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 24, that, when consultations take place, "the judgment to be pronounced in the cause shall be according to the opinion of the majority of all the judges so consulted, and shall bear that it is the judgment of the Division before which the cause depends, after consulting with the other judges." This is interpreted to mean the majority of the judges consulting and consulted. See Shand's Prac. 57, 957.

With the view of remedying the disadvantages arising from the judges being called upon to give opinions in cases without having heard the debate, the statute 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 35, lays down the procedure to be adopted when one Division consults the other, as follows:—The judges of either Division, in any cause in which they are equally divided in opinion, may appoint it to be heard and judged by the Inner-House judges of both Divisions, either on any sederunt-day during session, or at any time during the sittings of the Lord Ordinary. The cause is thereupon heard before the judges of the Division before which it depends, with the addition of three judges of the other Division. The judgment must be according to the opinion of the majority; and the interlocutor bears to be the judgment of the Division before which the cause depends, after consulting with the other Division. If present, the Lord Justice-General presides. See Session, Court of. Hearing.

Contempt of Court. This term is generally applied to any disrespect or indignity offered to judges while sitting in judgment, or on account of their proceedings in their judicial capacity; including personal violence or indecorous expressions towards the court or its members, libellous attacks written or spoken against the judges or their mode of administering justice, and contemptuous or illegal disobedience to the orders of the court, or to the rules prescribed by the court for the conduct of business before it. Outrageous contempts, such as striking or threatening judges for their proceedings as such, or committing an assault in open court, are offences punishable either capitally or by very severe arbitrary pains; 1593, c. 173; 1600, c. 4. See Beating of Judges. Inferior acts of insult or contempt, although they may not fall under any statutory enactment, are nevertheless punishable at common law. The defaming of judges, or casting imputations upon the integrity of the court, are offences of this description; and if committed in the course of a depending process, or connected with a process which has been lately in dependence, they may be punished summarily ex proprio motu of the court to which the insult has been offered. See Jamieson, A. S. 17–28th January 1815. In like manner, every court must necessarily be vested with the power of inflicting punishment summarily, for all disorders, or acts of contempt, committed during the sitting of the court. Where the contempt has not been committed in the immediate presence of the court, but has relation to a matter in dependence, or recently before the court, the proper form seems to be to bring the offence under the notice of the court by summary complaint at the instance of the public prosecutor. And in such cases, the punishment of censure, fine, or imprisonment may be inflicted. See Lord Advocate v. Jamieson, 1st Feb. 1822, 1 S. 285; Lord Advocate v. Hay, 1st Feb. 1822, 1 S. 288; Stair, B. iv. tit. 37, § 8. See also Hume, vol. i. p. 405, et seq., vol. ii. p. 138, et seq.; Alison's Princ.; Barclay's Sher. Court Prac. 409, 419. See Caption. Process.

Contexture; is a mode of industrial accession, borrowed from the Roman law. It takes place "where things belonging to one are wrought into another's cloth, and are carried therewith as accessory." It is similar to construction, whereby, if a house be repaired with the materials of another, the materials accrue to the owner of the house, full reparation, however, being due to the owner of the materials. If the materials have been obtained mala fide, the person using them will be liable for their value, ascertained by the owner's oath in litem; or he may be prosecuted for theft, according to the circumstances under which he has acquired them. It would also appear, that where there has been mala fides, the former owner may estimate the materials per pretium affectionis. Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 39; Bank, B. ii. tit. 1, § 17. See Adjunction. Accession.

Contingency of a Process. "Where two or more processes are so connected that the circumstances of the one are likely to throw light on the rest, the process first enrolled is considered as the leading process, and those subsequently brought into court, whether before the same Division or not, may be remitted to it ob contingentiam;" Ivory's Form of Process, vol. ii. p. 51. If both cases come into court the same week, that enrolled before the senior Lord Ordinary is deemed the leading process, and the other is remitted to his Lordship, and belongs to the same Division with the leading cause. If cases having a contingency are enrolled the same week before the same Ordinary, and marked for different Divisions, his Lordship determines to which Division they shall belong; A. S. 24th Dec. 1838. The remit is usually made on a simple motion at the bar. The effect of remitting processes in this manner is merely to bring them before the same division of the court, or the same Lord Ordinary. In other respects they remain distinct; the pleadings may be unconnected; and no step taken in the one will prevent the other from sleeping. Where an action has been brought into the Court of Session, and a process between the same parties in relation to the same subject-matter is depending in an inferior court, it is usual to bring the case from the inferior court into the Court of Session, by an advocacy ob contingentiam, which is competent at any stage of the inferior court process; 50 Geo. III., c. 112, § 36. See also 48 Geo. III., c. 151, § 9; Shand's Prac. 501; Shaw's Digest, 407. See Advocation. Conjoining.

Contingent Debts; are debts due provisionally, in a certain event. Creditors in such debts are, by the law of Scotland, entitled to rank upon the estate of a bankrupt, and formerly they had security found for the payment of their debts, proportionally with those of the other creditors, on the emerging of the contingency. A discharge obtained under the sequestration statute operates against such debts, as well as against debts due at the time of the bankruptcy, although it would appear that in England the rule is different; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 315, 5th edit. A contingent creditor, however, is not entitled to concur as a creditor in the petition for sequestration, or to vote in the election of the trustee, or in the other steps of the procedure until his claim shall be valued; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 14.

When the claim of a creditor depends upon a contingency which is unascertained at the date of his lodging his claim, he is not entitled to draw a dividend in respect of such contingent debt; but on applying to the Sheriff or the trustee, a value is put on the debt as at the date of the valuation, and the creditor votes and draws dividends in respect of such value, and no more; Id. § 53.

Contingent Legacy; is a legacy, the existence of which depends upon an uncertain future event, as where a legacy is given, provided the legatee shall arrive at a certain age. See Conditional Obligation. Legacy.

Continuation of the Diet. The summons in a civil process authorizes the defender to be cited to appear on a certain day, "with continuation of days," and the summons may be called in Court, either on the day named, or within year and day of the day of comparance, unless it be forced on by protestation. (See Calling of a Summons. Protestation.) But in a criminal prosecution the diet is peremptory, and the libel must be called on the precise day, and, in some way or other, disposed of; otherwise the action falls, and cannot be resumed. The diet may be continued, however, by an act of Court, made in the presence of a single judge, and in the absence of the parties. Such an act is not even signed by the judge, but merely entered in the books of adjournal by the clerk, in the judge's presence. The diet must be continued, not indefinitely, but to a fixed day. So, when after a verdict of guilty on a charge of murder, the judges on circuit certified the case to the High Court, with reference to a question as to the admissibility of evidence, but did not name a diet for the cause being taken up, it was held that, on account of the generality of the certification, the diet had fallen, and the panels were accordingly discharged; and subsequently a new indictment and trial were held incompetent, in respect that the panels had already tholed an assize; Frasers, 9th June and 12th July 1852; 1 Irvine, pp. 1, 66. Stair, B. iv. tit. 2, § 2, and tit. 38, § 2; A. S. 8th July 1831; Hume, ii. 263, 275, 417; Bell's Notes. See Diet. Criminal Prosecution.

Contra non Valentem agere non Currit Præscriptio; a Roman law maxim, received in the law of Scotland, importing that prescription does not operate against one under a legal incapacity to interrupt it. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 7, § 37. See Prescription. Citation.

Contraband Goods; are those goods which are imported to this country, or exported from it, without paying the duties imposed by law. Contracts for smuggling, or for the delivery of goods known to be contraband, found no right of action; and no party participant in the smuggling, or by whom the contraband goods have been delivered in this country, can legally claim under the contract. But foreigners, or even native Scotchmen settled abroad, selling and delivering goods which are afterwards smuggled into this country, have action here for the price, even although the seller suspected or knew that the buyer meant to smuggle the goods into Britain, provided the seller was not himself accessory to the smuggling; Cullen and Company, 15th May 1793, Fac. Coll., Mor. p. 9554; Reid, same date, Mor. p. 9555. Where the buyer of contraband goods knows them to be contraband, he has no claim for delivery, or no action of damages for breach of contract, the maxim being, that, in all demands upon illegal contracts, Potior est conditio possidentis et defendentis. It seems, however, to have been thought at one time, that where a bill was granted for the price of contraband goods, action or diligence was competent on the bill; but more recently action has been refused, where the bills were in the hands of the original parties, or of their trustees. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 2, § 14; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 305, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 42, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 42, and *Mor. Contract. A contract is "the voluntary agreement of two or more persons, by which something is to be given or performed upon one part, for a valuable consideration, either present or future, on the other part;" Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 16. Consent of parties being implied in all contracts, persons incapable of consent, such as idiots, pupils, persons absolutely drunk, &c., cannot contract. Persons who have been compelled to give their consent by force or fear, or who have been induced to consent by means of fraud or deception, cannot be said to have legally consented; and all contracts, therefore, exposed to such objections, are null and reducible. In like manner, error in the essentials,—e. g., either in regard to the contracting parties, or the subject-matter of the contract—will vacate the agreement. A contract, by which the parties, or any of them, become bound to perform what is naturally impossible, or to do any illegal act, or in which stipulations contra bonos mores are inserted, can found no action; and the contracting parties are neither liable in performance nor in damages for non-performance. But all facts, in themselves legally possible, are the subjects of obligation, although beyond the power of the contracting party, and he is liable in damages if he cannot perform; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 83, 84. Things exempted from commerce, either by nature, by destination, or by statute, cannot be the subject of obligation. The nominate contracts in Scotch, as in the Roman law, are loan, commodate, deposit, pledge, sale, permutation, location, society, and mandate,—for which see separate articles. There are also in our law, as well as in the Roman law, a great variety of contracts, which, not having been distinguished by special names, are termed innominate, all of which are obligatory on the contracting parties from their date; so that neither party can resile, even although one has, and the other has not, performed his part of the contract; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 35; Bank. vol. i. p. 328. Breach of contract subjects the party guilty of it not only to an action for enforcing it, but also to a claim for damages. Stair, B. i. tit. 10; More's Notes, p. lxii. et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. 1. p. 293, et seq. 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 5, 15, et seq.; Bell's Illust. p. 1, et seq. For an explanation of the different degrees of diligence prestable under contracts, see Culpa. See also Damages. Feu-Contract. Lease. Marriages, &c.

Contract of Marriage; is the technical name given to a written contract entered into between parties, who are either about to become husband and wife, or actually married to each other. In the one case, it is termed an antenuptial contract, and in the other a postnuptial contract.

1. Antenuptial Contract.—The object of this contract generally is, to make some modification on the legal rights of the parties and their children, and more effectually to guard against the risk of the husband's insolvency.

An antenuptial contract is held to be strictly an onerous deed, by which either a real security or a jus crediti, may be constituted in favour of the wife or children, which will, in the one case, give them a preference, and, in the other, entitle them to rank as creditors. With regard to the wife.—Instead of her legal provisions of terce and jus relicta, the husband may become bound to infest her in liferent in certain lands; and infestment on the contract will render her right real. Lands thus set apart for the wife are called locality lands: or he may secure her by infestment in an annuity, which is termed a jointure: or he may bind himself to invest money in real security for her behoof, or to provide her in a certain annuity. All which obligations, if expressed with sufficient precision, will vest a jus crediti in the wife, which, in case of the husband's insolvency before they are made real by infestment, will entitle her to rank as a creditor for such provisions, or if previously realized by infestment, will give her an absolute preference. By contract of marriage, the jus mariti may be excluded as to a particular subject, but it cannot be excluded per aversionem; e. g., an annuity may be purchased by the husband for the wife for her aliment, or a bond may be taken, payable to her, excluding the jus mariti, provided this is done by an antenuptial deed; for, after marriage, all such provisions between husband and wife are revocable as donations. The terce is excluded by a conventional provision to the wife, unless the contrary be expressed; 1681, c. 10. The rule is different with regard to the jus relicta, which requires an express exclusion, even where conventional provisions are made. Bell's Com. i. 636, 5th edit.

Provisions in favour of children, in an antenuptial contract, are also held to be onerous deeds; but it depends entirely upon the manner of expressing the provisions, whether they shall confer either a preference or a jus crediti. In the ordinary case, the contract makes the children merely heirs, having only an expectancy, or spes successionis; but, on the other hand, it is not possible, by means of a contract of marriage, whether antenuptial or postnuptial, to deprive the children of the marriage of their legal provision of legitim, without providing them with an equivalent. And even in that case, they will have an option either to accept the conventional provision, or to reject it, and insist for the legitim. See Legitim. Where the property is settled on the children nascitur in fee, or the provisions made payable after the death of the father, the children cannot compete with onerous creditors, although they may reduce gratuitous alienations to the prejudice of their provisions. In order to confer a jus crediti, the children must be vested with the character of creditors, during their father's life, which may be done by an obligation to pay the provisions, or the interest on them, at a term which either must or may happen during the father's life. Where it is intended to give the heir or children a preferable right, to be effectual against onerous creditors, it may be done by the father in an antenuptial contract, binding himself not to contract debt, or to infect the heir against a determinate day, or by a clause restricting his own right to a mere liferent; and such obligations, though granted liberis nascituris, when secured by proper diligence, and perfected by sasine, found a preference against all posterior deeds of the father. Where the husband or wife's titles are not complete, or where any other obstacle prevents the execution of a regular antenuptial contract, antenuptial marriage articles may be entered into, under which a jus crediti may be effectually vested in the parties; and any deed after marriage in implement of these articles, if it does not fall within the bankrupt statutes, and if it be otherwise unobjectionable, will be effectual. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 40.

2. Postnuptial Contracts.—After marriage, the wife and children can take nothing in competition with his creditors, which the husband cannot legally bestow. Postnuptial contracts must always be construed with reference to this principle, in so far as creditors are concerned; and, in so far as regards the husband and the wife, they are exposed to the risk of revocation by either of the parties, as donationes inter virum et uxorem. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 29. As to the wife's provisions under such a contract, it has been held, in questions with creditors, that a moderate provision granted to her during her husband's solvency will be effectual; and to the extent of a moderate aliment, even after the contraction of debt by the husband. And as to children, it is held that provisions to them made in a postnuptial contract, after contraction of debt, are ineffectual, although granted in implement of the natural obligation to aliment. Where insolvency does not follow, and where the provisions are reasonable and proper, the rights of the parties (with the exceptions above-mentioned) may be effectually settled in a postnuptial contract of marriage. See Jeffrey v. Campbell's Children, 24th May 1825, 4 S. & D. 32. It may be proper to observe here, that where a separation has taken place between the husband and wife, without a dissolution of the marriage, whether the separation has been judicial or by decree-arbitral, or by voluntary contract of separation, the husband may, in such a case, vest his wife either with a jus crediti, or a preference for her aliment or other stipulated provision, according as his obligation is personal, or completed by infestment in security, provided such provision is made during solvency. The provisions of such contracts are of course revoked by a reconciliation; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 641, 5th edit. The framing of the contract of marriage, so as to provide for the various events contemplated by that deed, and to secure the fulfilment of the different stipulations, is one of the most important and difficult duties of a conveyancer; and, as it is a duty requiring much professional circumspection, it may not be improper to close the present short notice of this important deed by the following references to authorities on this subject:—*Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 41; Ib. tit. 6, passim; Ib. B. ii. tit. 5, § 19; Ib. tit. 8, § 45; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6; Ib. B. iii. tit. 3, § 30; Ib. tit. 8, § 38, et seq.; Bank. Contract of Copartnership. See Society.

Contrario Actio. See Actio directa.

Contravention; may be defined generally to be any act done in violation of a legal condition or obligation, by which the contravener is bound. The term, however, is most frequently applied to an act done by an heir of entail in opposition to the provisions of the deed, whereby a forfeiture of the contravener's right may be incurred; or to acts of molestation or outrage committed by a person in violation of lawborrows, whereby the contravener exposes himself to the penal action of contravention of lawborrows. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 30, and B. iv. tit. 48; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. pp. 96, 190. See Tailzie. Lawborrows.

Contribution; takes place where several parties pay their share of a common expense. The term, in a legal sense, is generally applied to contributions made for equalizing the loss arising from sacrifices made for the common safety in sea-voyages, where the ship is in danger of being lost or captured. The basis of our law upon this subject, is the celebrated Lex Rhodia de jactu, the natural equity of which has led to its adoption in the maritime law of most European states. The general rule in this country seems to be, that where any part of the ship or cargo has been sacrificed to save the rest, the loss is to be adjusted by a contribution from all who have partaken of the benefit. In this contribution, or general average, as it is also termed, the most valuable goods, though their weight should have been incapable of putting the ship in hazard, such as diamonds or other precious stones, are to be estimated at their just price, on the ground, that they could not have been saved but for the ejection of the other goods. Persons on board, however, bear no share in the contribution, quia liberi corporis nulla est aestimatio. The ship's provisions are also exempted from contribution; but wearing apparel is estimated, and pays in proportion to its value. In this estimation, the goods ejected are valued at prime cost, and the goods saved, at the price they would bring at the port of arrival—freight, duties, &c., deducted. If a mast has been cut away, or an anchor parted with, in order to save the ship, contribution takes place; but if they have been lost in a storm, the loss falls on the ship alone. In order to found the right to contribution, it is necessary that the goods shall not have been rashly or unnecessarily sacrificed, but after such consultation as the exigencies of the occasion may admit of; and in case of difference of opinion amongst the crew as to the necessity of the sacrifice, a majority shall determine. In such a case, the opinion of the master, where he had no adverse interest, would be entitled to great weight. In all cases in which a part either of the ship or cargo has been sacrificed for the common benefit, an account of the circumstance under which it happened ought to be entered in the log-book, with a specification of the articles thrown overboard, or otherwise destroyed, to which affidavit should be made at the first port, otherwise the presumption will be against the master and crew. Ersk. B. 3, tit. 3, § 55; Bank. i. 233; Bell's Com. i. 580, 5th edit.; Princ. § 437. See also Salvage. Collision of Ships. Jactus Mercium.

Contributory. See Joint-Stock Company.

Contumacy; is a wilful disobedience to any lawful summons or judicial order. In a criminal process, the punishment of contumacy in the accused person is sentence of fugitation. In a civil action, the only consequence of the defender's contumacy, in refusing obedience to the citation, is, that the judge will take cognizance of the cause, and decern in his absence. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 27, et seq., and tit. 38, § 27; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 7. See Fugitation. Decree in absence. Contempt of Court.

Conventicle; in English law, a private meeting or assembly for the exercise of religion; first used as a term of contumely for the meetings of Wickliffe above 200 years ago; and now applied to the meetings of dissenters from the Established Church. Tomlin's Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Convention of Estates. In Scotland, before the Union, a convention of the estates of the kingdom was in use to be summoned, for the purpose of imposing a taxation to answer a present exigency, or upon any special occasion requiring immediate deliberation. Those conventions consisted of any number of the estates that might be suddenly called together without the necessity of a formal citation, such as was required in summoning a regular parliament. The power of the convention was limited to that particular business for which it had been assembled; and, regularly, the estates could be so convened only by royal authority; but, in case of absolute necessity, they met without it, as in the convention for settling the government at the Revolution of 1688. Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 6; Bank. vol. ii. p. 449; Mackenzie's Inst. B. i. tit. 3, § 5. See Parliament.

Convention of Royal Burghs. By the act 1487, c. 111, the royal burghs are ordered to meet once a-year, by commissioners, to treat of the "welfare of merchandise, the gude rule and statutes for the common profite of burrows, and to provide for remeid upon the skaith and injuries sustained within the burrows." These powers are renewed by later statutes; and accordingly, commissioners from each burgh meet annually in Edinburgh, to treat of the subjects committed to their charge. The powers, however, of this convention were never understood to be final or uncontrollable; consequently, its deliberations excite little interest, and are, in general, directed to matters of no public importance. See on this subject, Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 23; Bank. vol. ii. p. 579; Bell's Princ. § 2175; Hume, i. 400; ii. 135; Report by the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations (1835), p. 52.

Conventional Obligations; are obligations resulting from the special agreement of parties. The term is generally used in contradistinction to natural or legal obligations, which arise from the operation of the law itself, independently of contract. Stair, B. i. tit. 9; Bell's Princ. § 7; Bell's Illust. p. 1. See Obligations. Contract.

Conveyance; is a deed executed according to all the forms required by law, and by which a right is either created, or transferred, or discharged.

Conveyancing. The literal meaning of this term is, the preparing of conveyances; and, in professional language, the word conveyancer is sometimes used as contrasted with that of agent; the one being regarded as a preparer of deeds, and the other as a conductor of law-suits. But, in its larger acceptance, the term conveyancing not only includes the preparation of all voluntary deeds, constituting, transmitting, or extinguishing rights or obligations, but extends to those forms prescribed by law, for accomplishing the same objects, when the party is either unwilling or unable to do so by a voluntary act. The object of voluntary written deeds, generally speaking, is to express the purpose of the parties, or to impose obligations on them in apt terms, so as to insure their being carried into full effect; and, as practice and adjudged cases have attached certain determinate meanings to many of the terms employed in deeds, it is necessary that a conveyancer should be intimately acquainted, not only with the various deeds themselves, and the clauses peculiar to each, but that he should be fully aware of the legal import of every clause or expression which he may have occasion to use in expressing, in technical and formal language, the intentions of the parties. In Scotland, as in every other country of Europe, the forms of the deeds which relate to land rights have been very much modified by the feudal system; and, by a concurrence of circumstances, partly accidental, the feudal forms have, in this country, been combined with a system of records, remarkable both for its completeness and utility. The titles to landed property in Scotland have thus attained a very high degree of security. The forms of Scotch deeds concerning moveable property are, in general, simple and natural; and the authentication or testing of all formal deeds, whether relating to heritable or moveable property, is regulated by statutory enactments, calculated, as far as seems practicable by human ingenuity, to guard against fraud or interpolation. These, however, as well as the forms of voluntary and judicial conveyancing, are subjects which are necessarily treated of in separate articles. See Ross's Lect. i. 147; ii. 1, et seq. See also Charter. Disposition. Sasine. Bond. Assignment. Adjudication. Ranking and Sale. Records. Registration. Testing Clause.

Convict; is a person found guilty of a crime. Convictions generally proceed on the verdict of a jury; but our law also admits of summary convictions, without the intervention of a jury, in certain circumstances, as in cases of contempt of Court, of attempts to corrupt or withhold evidence, of malversation by persons intrusted with the criminal police of the country, of certain offences against the revenue laws provided for by special statute, and in proceedings before sheriffs, police magistrates, and justices of the peace for minor offences. See Hume, vol. ii. p. 138, et seq.

Convocation; in England, an assembly of the representatives of the clergy, to consult of ecclesiastical matters, of which there is one in each province. In the province of Canterbury, it consists of two houses, an upper and lower; in that of York, of one house only. From the judicial determinations of convocation, an appeal lies to the Queen in Council. Tomlin's Dict. h. t.

Convocation of the Lieges. See Mobbing.

Convoy; is the name given to the ship or ships of war, appointed by Government, to accompany merchant vessels during war, as a protection against capture. During the wars with France, merchant ships were prohibited by statute to sail without convoy. During war, the obligation to sail with convoy is an implied condition of the contract of affreightment; and, in case of insurance, it is a warranty in the contract with the underwriters. It is sufficient implement of this obligation if the vessel join the convoy at the usual place of assembling, and accompany it as far as it goes on the destined voyage, provided it is the only convoy appointed for vessels destined to that port. If, however, the convoy have sailed, the vessel cannot legally endeavour to overtake it; although, if the vessel have sailed with convoy, and is driven back, she need not wait for new convoy, but may proceed on the voyage. The convoy must be the naval force appointed for the purpose, and the vessel must continue with it, unless driven off by stress of weather or other inevitable accident. It is not sufficient to sail with any ship of war about to undertake the same voyage, unless such ship be also appointed a convoy. See Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 555, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 408; Bell's Illust. § 408.

Co-obligants; though bound in solidum to the creditor, are liable inter se, only pro rata; and any one of them paying more than his share is entitled to relief from the rest. Bell's Princ. § 62; Illust. ib. See Conjunctly and Severally. Correi debendi, and authorities there cited.

Copartnership; is a contract, by which the several partners agree concerning the communication of loss or gain arising from the subject of the contract. See Society.

Copartner; is a member of a copartnership. He may be either an ostensible partner known to the public as such, or a latent, dormant, or sleeping partner, as he is colloquially termed; and in either case he is liable in all the legal obligations arising out of the contract of society or copartnership. See Society.

Copyhold; is a tenure in English law, for which the tenant has nothing to show but the copy of the rolls made by the steward of the lord's court, on the tenant being admitted to the possession of the subject as a part of the manor. It is also called base tenure. Copyhold property cannot now be created, for the foundation on which it rests is, that the property has been possessed, time out of mind, by copy of court roll, and that the tenements are within the manor. Tomlin's Dict.; Wharton's Lex. This tenure is unknown in the law of Scotland. Ross's Lect. ii. 479.

Copyright; is the exclusive right of printing and publishing any literary work; extended also to engravings and music. Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 104. See Literary Property.

Corn. See Growing Corn.

Cornage, Horn-geld, Newt-gelt, or Neat-geldt; an ancient English tenure, the service of which was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scotch was perceived. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Camb. Brit. 609.

Coroner. In England, the coroner is an officer who possesses both judicial and ministerial authority. In his judicial capacity, he takes inquisitions in cases of violent deaths: it is his duty also to inquire after the lands and goods of murderers, treasure trove, wreck of the sea, deodanda, &c. The coroner acts ministerially in the execution of the king's writs, when the sheriff is disqualified by relationship to the parties, or interest in the suit, or otherwise. Coroners are chosen by the freeholders in the county courts; and four are usually named for each county; Tomlins' Dict. They may also be appointed for districts within counties; 7 and 8 Vict., c. 92. County coroners may appoint deputies; 6 and 7 Vict., c. 83. Even boroughs having a separate quarter session has a coroner; 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 76. See Jervis on Coroners; 2 Steph. Com. 619. The office of coroner is said to have been known in Scotland formerly. See Hume, vol. ii. p. 24, note.

Coroner, Crowner. According to Skene the coroner is he who inquires by an inquest concerning murder and slaughter. Skene defines this word as one of those which occurs in the Regiam Majestatem, from which it may be inferred that the coroner was a functionary at one time known in the practice of Scotland. This, however, is doubtful. See Regiam Majestatem; see also Skene, h. t.

Corpora of Moveables; are moveable subjects which may be seen and felt, as corn, furniture, &c., or cattle, which move of themselves. In speaking of moveable property, the term corpora is used in contradistinction to nomina debitorum, or obligations of debt, which, in our law, also fall under the denomination of moveables. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 1, et seq.

Corporation or Community; is a fictitious person or body politic, enduring in perpetual succession, with power to take and grant, to sue and to be sued. See Community.

Corporeal and Incorporeal. Both by the Roman law and by the law of England, the subjects of rights are divided into corporeal and incorporeal. Corporeal are such as fall under the senses, and may be seen and handled, as the ipsa corpora of things moveable or immoveable. Incorporeal, are things not subject to the senses, but which exist in law, as rights and obligations of all kinds. This distinction is not much regarded in the law of Scotland, according to which, the great division of rights, and the subject of rights, is into heritable and moveable. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 2, § 1, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1455, 1471. See Heritable and Moveable.

Corpse. See Dead Body.

Corpus Delicti. In the criminal law of Scotland, the corpus delicti is the substance or body of the crime, or offence charged, with the various circumstances attending its commission, as specified in the libel. It follows, that before a conviction can take place, the corpus delicti must be clearly made out. Thus, for example, if a person be charged with murder, it must be proved that the deceased came by his death in consequence of the injury libelled, otherwise the corpus delicti will not be established. Hume, i. 115; ii. 320, 391.

Correi Debendi. Two or more persons, who are bound as principal debtors to pay or to perform, are termed in the Roman law correi debendi. Where the obligation is indivisible, e.g., an obligation for the delivery of a special subject, the co-obligants are bound singuli in solidum; but where the obligation is to deliver a certain quantity of corn or money, the obligation may be divided into parts, and each obligant can be sued only for his own share, or pro rata, unless the obligants are expressly taken bound conjunctly and severally. From this rule, however, there are exceptions—1st, Contracts importing a co-partnership; and, 2d, Bills of exchange; in both of which cases the co-obligants are bound singuli in solidum, whether the obligation be so expressed or not. By the Roman law, every one of several cautioners became bound in solidum; and where all the cautioners remained solvent, any one of them who was sued had the equitable remedy of the beneficium divisionis. But where, for example, all the cautioners but one became insolvent, the solvent cautioner might be sued for the whole debt. This could not happen with us, because, if the cautioners were bound severally, they would only be liable pro rata; and if bound conjunctly and severally, they would be liable singuli in solidum, and could not claim the beneficium divisionis. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 9, and tit. 18, § 20; More's Notes, pp. lvi. and cxviii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. § 74; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 78; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. ii. p. 371, 87; Ross's Lect. i. 76. See Conjunctly and Severally.

Corroboration, Bond of. See Bond of Corroboration.

Corruption of Judges. By a variety of acts of the Scotch Parliaments, and, in particular, by 1579, c. 93, and 1540, c. 104, judges, whether of the Court of Session, or in inferior courts, who, through corruption or partiality, use their authority as a cover for injustice or oppression, are punishable with confiscation of moveables, loss of honour, fame and dignity, besides an arbitrary punishment in the person. See Hume, i. 407.

Corruption of Blood. When a person has been attainted of treason, his blood is said to be corrupted; and neither his children nor any of his blood can be heirs to him or any other ancestor. If the attainted person be a nobleman, he and his posterity are by the attainer rendered base and ignoble. Corruption of blood cannot be entirely removed, except by act of Parliament; for the king's pardon does not restore the blood, so as to make the attainted person "capable either of inheriting others, or being inherited himself by any one born before the pardon." Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 37; More's Notes, p. cccxii.; Bell's Princ. § 1645; Tomlins' Dict. See also Bank. vol. ii. p. 275.

Council and Session. The Judges or Senators of the College of Justice are also called Lords of Council and Session. Counsel; an advocate or barrister. A counsel is not responsible for the result of the advice he gives, provided he gives it honestly and to the best of his judgment; Bank. vol. iii. p. 76. By the criminal law of Scotland, the accused party is allowed the benefit of counsel, who, if not retained by the party, will be nominated by the Court to undertake the defence; an advantage which, except in cases of treason, was not enjoyed in England prior to 1836. 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 114; More's Notes to Stair, p. cccxv.; Hume, i. 5, and ii. 283; Bell's Princ. § 2051. See Advocate. Barrister.

Count and Reckoning; is the technical name given to a form of process, by which one party may compel another judicially to account with him, and to pay the balance which may appear to be due. The summons in this process calls on the defender to produce a full statement of his accounts and intromissions, so that the balance may be ascertained; and it also concludes for a random sum, as the amount of the supposed balance: for which sum a decree will be given, in case the defender fails to appear, or to render the statement required. The Act of Sederunt 22d Nov. 1711, makes various regulations for expediting the discussion of processes of this description in the Court of Session; but according to the present practice, such actions proceed according to the ordinary routine; A. S. 22d Nov. 1711, § 2. In actions of count and reckoning a remit to an accountant is usually made. See Ivory's Form of Process, vol. i. p. 270, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. pp. 34, et seq. 50, 109, 113; Shand's Prac. 738, and note to p. 740. See Process, Record.

Counterpart. In England, when the several parts of an indenture are interchangeably executed by the several parties, that part or copy which is executed by the grantor is usually called the original, and the rest are counterparts. Tomlins' Dict. h.t.; Wharton's Lex.

County. By 1 Vict., c. 39, it is enacted, that the word "county" occurring in any existing or future act shall comprehend and apply to any stewartry in Scotland, excepting where otherwise specially provided, and excepting cases in which there is anything in the subject or context repugnant to such meaning and application.

Court. The Courts of Scotland have been divided into superior, inferior, and mixed. The Court of Session, in which the Court of Exchequer is now merged, is the Supreme Civil Court. Its jurisdiction in all civil and revenue causes is universal over the whole kingdom; the sentences of all the inferior courts of Scotland being subject to its review, unless where special statute interposes. The Court of Justiciary is the Supreme Criminal Court. Inferior courts are those of which the sentences are subject to the review of one or other of the Supreme courts, and whose jurisdiction is confined to a particular territory, as the Sheriff-court, Bailie-court, Justice of Peace court. The courts formerly possessed of a mixed jurisdiction were the High Court of Admiralty, the Commissary Court of Edinburgh, both of which had an universal jurisdiction over Scotland, by which they reviewed the decrees of inferior admirals and commissaries; but as their own decrees were subject to the review of the Courts of Session or Justiciary, they were in that respect inferior courts. These two courts are now abolished. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 5 and 6; Bell's Princ. 4th edit., art. 2205, et seq.; Shaw's Digest, tit. Jurisdiction. See Admiralty. Commissary Court.

Court-Martial; is a court for trying the military offences of officers, whether naval or military, and of soldiers, and of sailors in the royal navy. Military Courts-Martial are either regimental or general. The latter must consist of at least thirteen judges, all commissioned officers, the president being a field-officer. The jurisdiction of these courts is limited to points of military discipline; e.g., mutiny, desertion, neglect of duty, beating or insulting an officer or fellow-soldier, &c. In all other matters, both officers and soldiers are amenable to the ordinary courts of law. No capital punishment can be inflicted by a military Court-Martial, unless nine of the judges present shall concur. Where these courts do not exceed their powers, no appeal lies to any other court; the only remedy resting with the king, to whom their sentences are reported, before they are promulgated. But, if they exceed their powers, the party injured may obtain redress in the Civil Court. The rules by which military Courts-Martial are to be guided are explicitly stated in the annual Mutiny Act and the Articles of War; and the laws in relation to naval Courts-Martial were reduced into one act; 22 Geo. II., c. 33, explained and amended by 19 Geo. III., c. 17. See also 24 Geo. III., st. 2, c. 56; 37 Geo. III., c. 140; 55 Geo. III., c. 156; and 56 Geo. III., c. 5. Courtesy or Curiality. The courtesy of Scotland, as it is termed, is a liferent conferred by the law, on the surviving husband, of all the heritage in which his deceased wife died infest, as heir to her predecessors. It is essential to the existence of this right—1. That there shall have been a living child born of the marriage, and heard to cry, otherwise courtesy is not due, however long the marriage may have subsisted; 2. That the child shall be the mother's heir. Thus, if there be a child of the wife in existence by a former marriage, who is her heir, courtesy is not due to the second husband, while such child exists, although there be also children of the second marriage. Hence, it has been said, that courtesy is due to the surviving husband, rather as the father of an heir than as the widower of an heiress. In order to confer the right, however, it is not necessary that the child survive: it is enough that it was once in existence, although it should have died immediately after its birth. The heritage, to which courtesy extends, is that to which the wife succeeds as heir of line, tailzie, or provision, to her ancestor, whether the succession opens to her before the marriage or during its subsistence. But it does not extend to conquest; that is, the heritage acquired by purchase, donation, or other singular titles, unless where the heritage has been put forward to the wife by her ancestor præceptione hæreditatis, in which case the courtesy extends to the property so put forward; Primrose, December 10, 1771, Fac. Coll., Mor. App. Courtesy, No. 1. Burgage property also falls under the courtesy, although it is excluded from terce. The wife's sasine is the measure of the courtesy; hence any real burden or infestment, preferable to her sasine, excludes the courtesy; and as the husband enjoys the liferent of the wife's estate titulo lucrativo, he is considered as her temporary representative, and, as such, is liable not only for all annual burdens affecting the lands, but also for the current interest of her personal debts while his rights subsist, in so far, at least, as he is lucratus. But he will have recourse against the wife's executors, or her heirs succeeding in such property, as does not fall under the courtesy, for the personal debts which he may thus pay. In this respect, courtesy differs from the widow's terce, which is in no degree affected by the husband's personal debts. The two rights also differ in this, that a widow, whose right of terce has been declared by service, transmits to her executors the right to receive the rents falling under the terce, and not drawn during her life; whereas, if a husband has not exercised his right of courtesy during his life, by drawing the rents, his executors will have no right to receive them; the courtesy being held as a privilege personal to the husband, who will be understood to have renounced it in favour of the heir, if, during his life, he has suffered him to draw the rents. The courtesy vests in the husband ipso jure; and, immediately on the wife's death, he may enter into possession of her lands, without service or any other legal formality; and, in virtue of this right, under the former election law, he enjoyed, not only during the marriage, but after the wife's death, the right of electing and being elected to Parliament on her freehold; 1681, c. 21; 12 Anne, c. 6, § 5. But it has not been decided whether a liferenter by courtesy is entitled to any of the casualties of superiority. It would rather appear, however, that as the person entitled to those casualties must be infest, the husband who is not infest can have no right to them under the courtesy; but he is entitled to the feu-duties, although these do not fall under terce. Stair, B. ii. tit. 6, § 19; More's Notes, clxxxvii. et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 52, et seq.; *Ersk. Crime. A crime may be defined to be any act done in violation of those duties which an individual owes to the community, and for a breach of which the law has provided that the offender shall make satisfaction to the public; besides repairing, where that is possible, the injury done to the individual. Dole, or corrupt and evil intention, is essential to the guilt of any crime. It is not necessary, however, for the prosecutor to prove the intention to commit the particular offence, out of enmity to the individual injured; it is enough that the act is attended with circumstances indicating a corrupt or malignant disposition, regardless of order and social duty. Thus, it is murder if A be killed by mistake instead of B, unless the killing of B would have been justifiable or excusable. So also it is murder to fire without legal cause, into a crowd and kill a person; Hume, i. 21, et seq. In order to constitute a crime, there must always be an act done in prosecution of the criminal purpose. This gives rise to several difficult questions, as to how far an attempt to commit a crime, is punishable; and the general rule seems to be, that where unequivocal acts, indicating the criminal intention, are proved, they are punishable, but not to the same extent, as the completed offence; but, on the other hand, the law takes no cognizance of remote acts of preparation, even although they be pretty distinctly referable to a criminal purpose; see Hume, ib. See Attempt. Where dole is wanting, either entirely or to a certain extent, there is, in the one case, no crime at all, and, in the other, a proportional mitigation of the punishment. Thus, pupils under seven years of age are legally incapable of crime; in like manner, insane persons are held to be incapable of dole. But, on the other hand, pupils above seven years of age, and minors who have reached puberty (which in this question is fourteen years of age, both in males and females), are held to be capable of dole, and are consequently punishable for the greater crimes, of the guilt of which they must be presumed to be aware. Minors under sixteen years of age, however, except in very flagrant cases, seem hardly liable to capital punishment. With regard to defect of intellect, if it amount to mere weakness or craziness, it is not sufficient to exempt from punishment, but may be the ground of an application for mercy. The defence of compulsion, where vis major has been used will be sustained. See Compulsion. But it will be no defence, that the crime was committed by a wife or child, under the influence of subjection to the husband or father, if it be one of the greater crimes; although such subjection may perhaps be successfully pleaded in minor delicts. The subjection of a servant to his master affords no defence whatever to the servant who has committed a crime, unless he can prove coercion, or the fear of violence, against which he had no protection at hand. Magistrates or officers of the law, acting bona fide in the administration and execution of the law, unless perhaps there be gross ignorance or carelessness,—and soldiers acting under the orders of their officers in the known and customary line of their duty,—are not liable to a criminal charge for acts done under such circumstances. The compulsion of extreme want is held to be no excuse for a crime; but it may be the ground of an application for mercy. See, on the subject of this article, Hume, vol. i. p. 21 to 56; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4; Ersk. Princ. 514, 12th edit.; Tait's Justice of Peace, h. t.

Crimen Repetundarum. By the Roman law, all judges and magistrates who accept bribes to pervert judgment, were said to be guilty of this crime, and punished accordingly. With us, this offence is known by the name of baratry or bribery. See Baratry. Bribery. Corruption of Judges.

Criminal Prosecution; includes the whole form of process by which a person accused of a crime is brought to trial; and the procedure will here be briefly traced from its commencement to its close in the supreme criminal court. When a crime has been committed, the first step is to arrest the supposed offender; and this may be done under authority of any sheriff, justice of peace, or other magistrate. Those magistrates may grant warrant to arrest persons charged with offences, in the trial of which they have themselves no jurisdiction. Thus, a sheriff may commit for treason, or the magistrate of a royal burgh for pleas of the Crown. The warrant for apprehension must be granted on sufficient information, written or verbal; but there ought to be a formal written and signed application wherever possible. The oath of the informer, even where he is a private party, is not indispensable, except as to offences under special statutes; and when the procurator-fiscal applies for the warrant, his oath is never required. The warrant must bear the date and place of granting, and be under the hand of the magistrate in whose name it runs. It would seem that it may be general as to the nature of the crime to be charged; but it must not be general in the description of the person or persons to be apprehended, nor leave any discretion to the officer to arrest all suspected persons. The warrant may be, to bring the accused before either the granter of the warrant, or some other competent magistrate; and it may be addressed either generally to the officers of the magistrate who grants it, or to messengers-at-arms; or even, in case of need, to a private individual, who is thus invested, pro hac vice, with the powers, privileges, and protection, given to an officer, provided the person intrusted with it proceed regularly in the execution of the warrant. In executing the warrant, it is necessary that the officer should attend—1st, Not to execute it beyond the jurisdiction of the granter, without the indorsation of a magistrate within the jurisdiction into which the offender has fled, unless where such indorsation is rendered unnecessary by special statute, as in the case of sheriffs' warrants under 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 25. See Backing of a Warrant. 2d, He must communicate to the party the import of the warrant; and if the officer be acting beyond his ordinary bounds, he must show the warrant on demand, but he is not bound to part with it. 3d, The officer has no authority to break open doors, unless he has intimated to those within the purpose of his errand; and after that, and on refusal to open, he may break open the door, and take the party against whom the warrant is directed, or the person whom he has probable reasons for believing to be the person meant. 4th, Having taken the person, the officer cannot, on his own authority, commit him to jail, but must take him before a magistrate, to be dealt with according to law; except in the case where the warrant contains authority to commit de plano, as is the case with judiciary warrants, under which, of course, the officer is in safety to commit the accused to prison at once. In the case where the party is brought before a magistrate for examination, it is the duty of the magistrate—1st, To see that the prisoner is in a fit state to undergo an examination; 2d, That he is warned of the use which may be made of what he says; and, 3d, That the declaration is taken down in writing in the presence of credible witnesses, who will sign it along with the magistrate and the prisoner, in order that, if necessary, they may be able, at the trial, to authenticate it and to swear to what passed. When the prisoner cannot or will not sign his declaration, the magistrate may sign it instead of him.

Unless the magistrate see reason immediately to release the prisoner, his next step is to commence an inquiry, or precognition as it is termed, concerning the grounds of suspicion, in which he will take the declarations of such persons as have cause of knowledge of the offence, and the prisoner's participation in it. This is necessary, not only in order that speedy justice may be done to the accused, but also for the information of the public prosecutor, so as to enable him to lay his charge properly. While the precognition is going on, the magistrate may, if necessary, commit the accused to prison for further examination, or to abide the result of the precognition; and, in that case, the prisoner is not entitled to bail under the act 1701, c. 6, although it is not unusual to liberate him on bail at this stage of the proceedings. The magistrate must proceed with the precognition without undue delay, otherwise he will be liable at common law for malversation and oppression. Witnesses may be compelled to attend the precognition by letters of first and second diligence; and, in extreme cases, the witnesses may be examined upon oath, although that is not usual. If the witnesses refuse to attend or to swear, they may be imprisoned. Neither the accused nor his friends are entitled to be present at the precognition; nor can they insist for a copy or for a perusal of the declarations of the witnesses. The precognition must be finished before the libel is executed, because, after the execution of the libel, the process has commenced, and all intercourse with the witnesses after that is suspected and "utterly forbidden." In whatever way the examinations of the witnesses at the precognition are taken, whether by oath or simple declaration, they never can be used in any shape against the witnesses, who may insist on having them destroyed before they give their testimony on the trial. Articles to be founded on as proving the crime, ought to be identified at the precognition, either by the subscription of the judge and witnesses, or by some other mark, and a reference to the declaration of the witnesses; and such articles ought to be put in safe custody. The entire charge of conducting precognitions is now committed to the procurator-fiscal, sheriff, justices of the peace, and other inferior magistrates, although, formerly, precognitions were sometimes conducted by the Lord Advocate, in presence of the Lords of Justiciary. See Precognition. The precognition being concluded, and the facts being such as to warrant a commitment, the accused is then committed for trial, on a regular written warrant, specifying the offence for which he is committed, and proceeding on a signed information. With regard to the form of a warrant of commitment, and the steps necessary to be taken in order to obtain bail, or liberation under the act 1701, c. 6, see Commitment for Trial, Bail, Liberation.

The right to prosecute for a crime is vested, by the law of Scotland, either in the party injured, or in the Lord Advocate, who is the only prosecutor for the public interest; the popular actions of the Roman law being unknown in our practice. A criminal prosecution by the private party embraces not only the private interest and damages, but the full pains of law. But, in order to support the private instance, the party must be able to show some substantial and peculiar interest in the issue of the trial, not a mere remote interest as a member of the community, or even as the member of a portion or class of it, which has been particularly injured. It does not appear to be quite fixed, what degree of relationship to an injured party entitles a private party to prosecute; but perhaps the right is vested in the next of kin, however remote in degree; Hume, vol. ii., p. 124. But, in the Court of Justiciary, every libel at the private instance must be raised with concurrence of the Lord Advocate; see Concours. The Lord Advocate is the public accuser, who insists in the Sovereign's name, and for his (or her) Majesty's interest, in the execution of the law; and he is vested with an uncontrolled right to exercise his discretion, either in commencing or in following forth a trial; and, at any time in the course of it, either before or even after the return of the verdict of the jury, he may, in the case of a capital offence, restrict the libel to an arbitrary punishment. See Advocate, Lord.

The trial of an accused party proceeds before the Court of Justiciary, either on indictment or on criminal letters. The process by indictment is the exclusive privilege of the Lord Advocate, in whose name, as public prosecutor, it proceeds. Criminal letters resemble a summons in a civil action; they proceed in the Sovereign's name, and, like the summons, they are addressed to messengers, and other executors of the law, who are commanded to cite the accused. See Indictment, Criminal Letters. The form of indictment is commonly used where the accused is in prison; and that of criminal letters where he is at large, either on bail or otherwise, although there is no invariable rule on that subject. The indictment or criminal letters must be executed against the accused by a messenger-at-arms, or by a macer of the Court of Justiciary, or other officer properly authorized, who must serve the party with a copy of the libel, with a notice attached, requiring him to appear on a day certain to take his trial. See 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 36, et seq., and Schedules thereto annexed; see also 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 6. The accused must, at the same time, be served with a list of the witnesses who are to be examined against him, and of the whole assize of forty-five, out of which the jury is to be selected. If the accused cannot be found, he must be cited in the same form at his dwelling-place, and at the market-cross of the head burgh of the county in which he resides. When he is abroad, an edictal citation of sixty days at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and the pier and shore of Leith, is necessary. The diet to which he is cited in a criminal process is peremptory. See Calling of Diet. And, on the day fixed, the accused and the prosecutor, whether public or private, must appear in the Court, the Lord Advocate having the privilege of appearing by his deputies; but the personal presence of the private party, where he is the prosecutor, being indispensable. The accused must also be present, otherwise the trial cannot proceed; and, if he is wilfully absent, sentence of fugitation will be pronounced. See Fugitation. When both parties are present, and the trial is not adjourned, the Court, upon the prosecutor's application, and on cause shown, may desert the diet pro loco et tempore; after which the accused may be served with a new libel; or the prosecutor may desert the diet simpliciter, which puts an end to all farther prosecution for the same offence; Hume, ii. 275, et seq. When both parties are present at the calling of the diet, and there is no desertion, this is the proper time, in limine of the process, to state all objections to the execution of the citation of the party. The panel is also then called on to state any objection to relevancy of the libel, and the relevancy, whether objected to or not, is disposed of before he is called on to plead. When the libel is found relevant, the same is read, unless the reading is dispensed with (which is always held to be done in practice unless the contrary is stated); the panel is called upon to plead guilty or not guilty; and his plea is entered on the record ; if he plead guilty, the Court passes sentence, and if not guilty, the Court remits him and the libel to an assize; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 9, altering 9 Geo. III., c. 19, § 12. Objections to relevancy are disposed of after a viva voce debate, either by immediate decision, or by an order for farther pleadings in the shape of printed informations, in which latter case the trial is adjourned. Even where the accused pleaded guilty, it was formerly the practice to empanel a jury, before whom, if he repeated his plea, he was found guilty by the jury on his own confession ; but, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 14, the necessity of empanelling a jury, where the accused pleads guilty, is dispensed with. Where, in addition to the general plea of not guilty, the accused means to insist on some special defence, he must, at this stage of the proceedings, either by himself or his counsel, state generally the nature of the course of defence he means to adopt. By 20 Geo. II., c. 43, it is required, that, in such a case, the accused shall, on the day before his trial, lodge with the clerk of Court a written statement or defence, signed by himself or his counsel, of the facts he alleges, and the heads of the objections or defences he means to maintain ; and, where such a defence is not lodged, it would seem that the prosecutor, on the day of trial, may at least insist on having an outline of the course of defence ; and, accordingly, in all cases where such special defence is pleaded, it is usual either to lodge defences, or to explain the nature of the defence in the outset of the trial. A list of any exculpatory witnesses must also be lodged the day before trial. When the libel is remitted to an assize, a jury of fifteen persons from the assize of forty-five is ballotted for ; the prosecutor and the accused having each of them five peremptory challenges and an unlimited number of challenges upon cause shown ; 6 Geo. IV., c. 22. As to the mode of citing the jury, see Jury. The jury are then sworn in, and the trial proceeds,—the prosecutor, in the first place, leading evidence in support of the libel, after which the exculpatory evidence is adduced. After the proof on both sides has been concluded, the counsel for the parties address the jury, on the import of the evidence, the counsel for the accused, except in cases of treason, having the last word ; Regulations, 1672, No. 10. The presiding judge then sums up the evidence, and states the law to the jury. The jury need not be unanimous in their verdict ; and, in case of difference, the majority decide. Formerly, no verdict of a jury was good if made up in open court ; but, by 54 Geo. III., c. 67, the Court of Justiciary and Circuit-courts were authorized to receive verdicts from the jury, by the mouth of their chancellor, on a consultation in the jury-box, provided the whole jurymen were agreed in their verdict ; and, even when the jury had retired, the Court was authorized, by the same statute, to receive viva voce verdicts, provided the jury were all agreed in the verdict, and that the judges were then sitting in Court. And now, by 6 Geo. IV., c. 22, § 20, all verdicts in the High Court of Justiciary, or the Circuit-court, or in inferior courts, whether the jury are unanimous or not, and whether on a consultation in the jury-box, or after having retired, may be returned by the mouth of the chancellor of the jury, unless the Court has directed a written verdict to be returned. But where the jury is not unanimous, the chancellor must announce the fact in order that it may be entered on the record ; and when, in such cases, a jury is inclosed, the jury is not allowed to separate, or to hold communication with other persons, until their verdict has been returned in their presence by their chancellor. The verdict must be returned to the Court in presence of the accused and of the whole jury. The verdict, when in writing, is authenticated by the subscriptions of the chancellor and clerk of the jury, and accompanied with a list of the names of the jurors, and a state of the vote of each individual, “ whether condemning or assolzieing ;” Regulations, 1672, No. 9. See Verdict. If the verdict be not guilty, or not proven, or in any other way amount to an absolvitor of the crime libelled, the accused is immediately dismissed from the bar. If the verdict be condemnatory, the prosecutor then moves the Court to apply it. If there be no pleas stated by the accused in arrest of judgment, it was formerly the practice for sentence to be pronounced by the presiding judge, and afterwards read out by the clerk from the record, and subscribed by all the judges present. Now, however, this is only necessary in cases of capital sentence. In all other cases, all that is now required is a short entry of the sentence in the record, signed by the clerk, but not by the judge, and not read out by the clerk ; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 10 ; and Act of Adjournal, 1 Aug. 1849, § 6. In Scotland, a sentence importing capital punishment cannot be carried into execution within less than fifteen, or more than twenty-one days after its date, if pronounced to the southward of the Forth, or within less than twenty, or more than twenty-seven days, if to the north of that river. Inferior corporal punishments may be carried into execution after the lapse of eight or twelve days from the passing of the sentence, according as it is pronounced on the south or north of the Forth ; 11 Geo. I., c. 26, and 3 Geo. II., c. 33 ; 1 Will. IV., c. 37, § 2. See Execution of Sen-

times. And the Court of Justiciary has a power to interfere in altering the day for the execution of sentences, when particular circumstances render such an interference necessary; Hume, vol. ii. p. 473. The sentences of the Court of Justiciary are not subject to review, or to appeal to the House of Lords; and, unless the royal mercy be interposed, execution will follow in terms of the sentence; Hume, vol. ii. p. 504. See Pardon.

The account of criminal process, which has now been given, has reference to proceedings in the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, and in the circuits of that Court, where the forms of process are almost precisely similar. See Circuit Court of Justiciary. The sheriff also has a very extensive criminal jurisdiction, extending to the trial of many of the higher crimes by means of a jury, and entitling him to convict summarily without the intervention of a jury, in minor offences; the privilege of summary conviction being a branch of the criminal jurisdiction of the sheriff, which he shares with justices of the peace and the magistrates of royal burghs. As to the form of procedure before the sheriff under criminal libel, see 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 33, et seq. With regard to those inferior jurisdictions, it may be observed in general, that, where express statute does not interfere, the criminal proceedings in all of them are subject to the review of the High Court of Justiciary. See Sheriff. Justice of Peace. Review. Bill of Advocation. Bill of Suspension. Circuit Court. Procurator-Fiscal.

The Court of Session, partly by usage and partly by statute, may take cognizance of the crimes of forgery, perjury, deforcement, fraudulent bankruptcy, contempts, &c. This Court tries and punishes those offences without the intervention of a jury; and its sentences are not subject to review in the Court of Justiciary; Hume, vol. ii. p. 509. But the criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Session is never exercised, unless where the offence has been committed or discovered in the course of proceedings in a civil action before it; and, even in that case, the practice now is to remit the criminal part of the case to the Court of Justiciary. See Court of Session. Contempt of Court.

Criminal Letters. In the preceding article it has been stated that a criminal process may be brought into the Court of Justiciary either by criminal letters, or by indictment. In form, criminal letters resemble a summons in an ordinary civil action. They run in the Sovereign's name, state the charge laid against the accused, and the conclusions founded on the charge, and they conclude with the royal will, commanding the officers of the law to summon the accused party to appear on a day named, and find caution to underlie the law.

They also contain a warrant for citing the witnesses and the jury, according to correct lists which accompany the criminal letters. These letters pass the signet of the Court of Justiciary, on a bill presented to the Court, in which the tenor of the criminal letters is engrossed at large. The bill is signed by the Lord Advocate, or some of his deputies, when he is the sole prosecutor; and, when the prosecution is at the instance of a private party, the bill must be signed by the party, with the Lord Advocate's concurrence. A deliverance on the bill, signed formerly by one of the Justiciary Judges, now by one of the clerks of court (11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 3), authorizes the criminal letters to be raised, and is the warrant for their passing the signet of the Court; Hume, vol. ii. p. 154. The record copy of the letters may now be printed in whole or in part; § 1 of said stat. As to the form of executing criminal letters, see Criminal Prosecution. See also Concourse. Indictment.

Criminal Conversation; is the technical term, in questions of divorce, applied to the criminal intercourse of the party charged with incontinence. See Divorce.

Cro; in the Scotch acts of Parliament, signifies the satisfaction or assything for the slaughter of a man. Skene, h. t.

Croft; in England, a little close adjoining to a dwelling-house, and inclosed for pasture, or arable, or any particular use. Tomlins' Dict., h. t.

Crop. The landlord has a hypothec over the crop, for the rent of the year of which it is the crop; and so long as that crop remains in the tenant's possession, the right continues in force. The landlord, under his right of hypothec, cannot sequester the crop of any one year, in security or payment of the rent of a preceding or following year, although, of course, the crop on the ground, like any other moveable property belonging to the tenant, although it may not be hypothecated, may be open to the diligence of pointing at the instance of the landlord, as an ordinary creditor. Bell's Princ. § 1239; Bell on Leases, i. 362, et seq. 430, 499, 513; ii. 25; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 370. See Hypothec. Currente termino. Waygoing Crop. Furniture.

Cropping. An important clause, termed the clause of management, is now generally inserted in leases, providing, among other things, for the rotation of crops, and prohibiting the taking of certain crops in succession. It varies according to the soil, climate, and other circumstances of the farm. But, even in the absence of such a clause, there is an implied obligation on the tenant to cultivate according to the rules of good husbandry; and, by the common law, a tenant is restrained from deteriorating a farm by mislabouring or over-labouring it. It is generally provided, that white corn-crops (i.e., crops which are allowed to ripen) shall never be taken from the same land in immediate succession; and that a certain proportion shall be under turnips, or plain fallow, every year, and be sown to grass, with the first corn-crop after turnips or fallow. This clause is usually enforced by additional rents or penalties in case of contravention; as to which the general rule is, that the tenant is not entitled to pay the penal rent, and thereupon to mis-crop. Bell on Leases, i. 246; ii. 161; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 369; ii. 461. Crown Debts. By the English law, debts due to the Crown have a preference over all other debts affecting the personal estate; and as long, therefore, as the property remains in the debtor, the Crown's execution excludes that of a subject. The act 33 Henry VIII., c. 39, gives this preference in every case where the other creditors have not obtained judgment for their debts before the commencement of the Crown's process; and the Act 6 Anne, c. 26, which established the Court of Exchequer in Scotland on the model of the English Court of Exchequer, introduced the English revenue laws, and provided that the same forms of process for the recovery of Crown debts should be followed in both countries. But this statute excepted heritable property in Scotland, as to which the Scotch law is left on its former footing, according to which, in competitions between the diligence of the Crown and the diligence of a subject, the preference is determined by the same rules which regulate competitions between subject and subject. Hence, the Crown will be altogether excluded from ranking on the heritable estate, unless the proper diligence of the law of Scotland for attaching that estate has been used; and where the Crown has used such diligence, the ordinary rules of ranking will apply. In competitions between the Crown and a landlord under his right of hypothec, it seems to be settled—1st, That the general right of the landlord, although preferable to the diligence of subjects, is not available against the Crown; and, 2dly, That even after sequestration of the effects by the landlord, and a warning to sell, there is no pledge thereby constituted in favour of the landlord; and the Crown will be preferable, if its claim be made before the sale of the effects is reported, and the landlord's process finally closed; until which time there is not a "judgment," in the sense of the English law. But, in order to secure the Crown's preference over the moveable estate of the debtor, it is necessary, under the statute of Henry VIII., that the Crown's process shall have commenced before judgment has been given in favour of the competing creditor; and, in interpreting the term judgment, as used in that statute, it is held in Scotland to signify a final order of execution, which requires no farther judicial interference to render it complete; Robertson v. Jardine, 6th July 1802, Mor. p. 7891. Mercantile sequestration, under the Bankrupt Act, has no effect against the Crown's claims; and consequently, a discharge under that statute is not effectual against the Crown. But where, on bankruptcy, a writ of extent is anticipated, it has been suggested, as an expedient to defeat the Crown's diligence, that the Court of Session should, on application, pronounce an adjudication of the estate and effects in favour of the sheriff-clerk, with an order on the bankrupt to assign the effects; and such an adjudication, followed by a transference of the possession, it has been thought, might defeat the Crown's preference, without being exposed to any legal objection, as being a mere device to accomplish this purpose. The sanctuary of Holyroodhouse affords no protection to the King's debtor. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 25; Bell's Com. ii. 356, 453, 572; Bell on Leases, i. 404, et seq. As to the manner in which Crown debts are made effectual, see Extent. More's Notes to Stair, p. lxxxv.; Bell's Princ. § 1241, 1247, 2291, et seq. See Extent. Exchequer.

Crown Agent. The agent or solicitor who, under the Lord Advocate, takes charge of criminal proceedings, is usually called the Crown agent. This functionary receives from the procurators-fiscal in the different counties the precognitions taken when crimes have been committed; lays these precognitions before the Crown lawyers, that they may determine whether the evidence is sufficient to warrant a prosecution; expedes indictments or criminal letters; and, in general, discharges the various duties of agent, in preparing for and conducting criminal trials before the High Court of Justiciary. The appointment to this agency is with the Lord Advocate for the time, and the office is not held ad vitam aut culpam. See Criminal Prosecution.

Crown Lands. The annexed property of the Crown cannot be alienated unless under certain statutory limitations. See Annexation. The Crown's right is complete without sasine; and hence, when lands holden of the Crown fall to the Crown by forfeiture, they are eo ipso consolidated with the superiority. But when the Sovereign succeeds in a feudal right to any of his subjects, he must be served heir in special to the deceased—a service which, after being retoured, establishes of itself a perfect right in the Sovereign. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have the administration of the Crown lands. With regard to the liability of Crown lands to public taxes, it is held that the original annexed property of the Crown is exempt, unless when held as a beneficiary possession by a subject; that property of the Church annexed in 1587 is liable to such taxes as the clergy were liable to pay; and that property acquired by the Crown is liable as if it still remained in the hands of a subject, but exempt in so far as it has been increased in value by meliorations for the public service. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 14 and 44; Bell's Princ. §§ 667 to 673, 1145, and authorities there cited; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 113. See Eschequer.

Crown, Pleas of. The crimes of murder, robbery, rape, and wilful fire-raising, according to our ancient practice, were cognizable by the justice and his deputies only, and are now cognizable by the Court of Justiciary; hence they are called the four pleas of the Crown. But, even by our ancient law, the jurisdiction of the sheriff in regard to the crimes of murder and robbery interfered to a certain extent with the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Justiciary in the trial of those crimes. Hume ii. 59. See Sheriff.

Cruires and Zaires; a contrivance used in salmon fishings. They consist of an inclosure made in a river by stakes or hecks, so as to allow the young salmon or fry to pass through, and only to confine the larger fish. There is an entry into the cruires; but the salmon, having once entered, are confined there, and are thus easily caught by the fishers. The width of the hecks is regulated by several old statutes; and there must be what is called the Saturday's sloop; i.e., the hecks must be drawn up the height of an ell from the bottom of the river from Saturday evening at sun-set until Monday morning at sun-rise. This mode of fishing is prohibited in that part of a river where the sea ebbs and flows. The statutes are—1424, c. 11; 1477, c. 73; 1489, c. 15; 1581, c. 111; 1685, c. 20; and the oldest of those statutes refers to preceding regulations on the same subject. *Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 70; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 15; Bank. vol. i. p. 574; Bell's Princ. § 1116; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 271; Watson's Stat. Law, voce Fishery. See the existing statutory regulations, voce Salmon Fishing. Cujus est Solum, Ejus est Usque ad Cælum; a Roman law maxim, importing the unlimited height to which the right of property reaches, unless restrained by a servitude altius non tollendi, or, within burgh, by the regulations of police. It is because letting the eavesdrop fall upon a neighbouring proprietor's ground would be an infringement of this principle, that the liberty to do so requires the constitution of the special servitude of stillicide. Ersk. B. ii. t. 9, § 9. See Altius non tollendi. Stillicide. Edinburgh.

Cujus est Commodum, Ejus Debet esse Incommodum; a Roman law maxim, importing that the person who reaps the advantages ought also to be subjected to the disadvantages of any legal rule. Kames' Equity, 188, 210.

Cujus est Dare, Ejus est Ordinare; a Roman law maxim, importing that the bestower of certain gifts has a right to regulate the disposal of them. Thus, in England, the founder, his heirs or assignees, are the visitors of a lay corporation, whether civil or eleemosynary. Blackstone, B. i. c. 18.

Culpa Lata, Levis, et Levissima. These are the terms by which, in the Roman law, the three degrees of negligence or omission were distinguished. Culpa lata is gross or supine carelessness or omission, which the law construes into dolo. Culpa levis is that degree of negligence which a person attentive to his own affairs may be supposed to fall into; and Culpa levissima is that slighter degree of neglect which may be fallen into by a man who manages his affairs with consummate prudence. Where a contract is entered into for the mutual benefit of the contracting parties, each party is bound to exercise the middle degree of diligence, the neglect of which is called culpa levis, or culpa. Where only one party is benefited by the contract, as in commodate, the party benefited is bound to exercise the utmost degree of diligence in regard to the subject of the contract, the neglect of which is called culpa levissima; while the other party, who has no benefit by the contract, is accountable only for gross omissions, amounting to dolo or culpa lata. Where the contract implies exuberant trust, as deposit, the depositary will be accounted guilty of dolo if he bestows less care on the subject than he is known to bestow on his own affairs, even although the diligence he has actually employed be as exact as a man of ordinary prudence would have used. The equitable rules of the Roman law on this subject have been adopted in the law of Scotland; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 21; Bank. vol. i. p. 469. In the criminal law, culpa lata equiparatur dolo. Hence a judge, for example, who condemns a man to death through gross and inexcusable ignorance of the law, will be held guilty of murder. *Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 9; tit. 13, § 2; More's Notes, p. lxxi. et seq., lxxv. et seq., xcv. et seq.; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 453, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 233; Bell's Illust. § 234; Hume, vol. i. p. 26. Culpable Homicide; is chargeable in four different cases:—1, When death has taken place through the panel's want of caution ; 2, When the panel has committed slaughter while prosecuting an illegal act ; 3, When the panel had intent to do some bodily harm, from which it was not probable that death would follow ; and, 4, When the killer was actuated by a mortal purpose, arising, not from hatred to the deceased, but from sudden resentment for high and real injuries sustained, accompanied by such terror and perturbation of spirits as, in a certain sense, deprived him of the use of reason. The punishment of culpable homicide is arbitrary, varying from imprisonment for a few weeks to transportation for life. Scourging was, in a few instances, formerly added. Hume, i. 191-3, 233-52 ; Alison, 92, et seq. ; Burnett, 6, 14 ; Syme, 255, 321 ; Steele, 76.

Curatory. To persons who of themselves are incapable of managing their affairs, the law affords the means of doing so by the appointment of curators. The powers and duties of curators differ according to the nature of their appointment, and the condition of the parties to whom their curatory extends. Their several denominations may be classed under these heads,—1. Curator to a minor. 2. Curator to an idiot. 3. Curator bonis. 4. Curator ad litem.

1. Curator to a minor. A minor, until he arrives at the age of puberty, has no persona standi in judicio ; and, therefore, during his pupillarity, both his person and his property are placed under the guardianship of tutors. See Pupil, also Tutor. At the age of puberty, which in males is fourteen, and in females twelve years, a minor, although he becomes invested with certain powers in the management of his own affairs, is still held to be a proper object of the protection of the law against deception on his inexperience. The father, while alive, is the natural guardian and administrator-in-law for his lawful children who are minors ; the father's guardianship comprehending the characters of tutor to his children while they are pupils, and of curator to them after they become puberes, and until their majority, which, in both sexes, is fixed at twenty-one years of age. The natural guardianship of the father, however, is restricted by the Scotch law to those children who are not forisfamiliated. See Forisfamiliation. It vests in the father without any form of legal process ; and he is exempted from the observance of certain formalities, as well as from the strict responsibility required of other curators. 1st, He is not bound to take the oath de fidei administratione ; nor, 2dly, to make up inventories ; nor, 3dly, to find caution, unless where he is in embarrassed circumstances ; and, 4thly, he is not held liable for omissions. Although the curatory of the father may, with his own consent, be superseded by the minor pubes making choice of other curators, in the manner to be afterwards explained, yet this cannot be done by the minor without the concurrence of his father as curator. But the father's office of administrator-in-law is excluded where property has been left to the minor under other administrators, or exclusive of the father's administration ; and upon the marriage of a daughter, the curatorial office is by law transferred from the father to the husband, if he be major, although it will revert to the father if the husband die before his wife attain majority. When the minor has a claim against his father, a curator ad litem may be appointed to him. The father's powers of administration have been extended by the statute 1696, c. 8, by which a father is empowered, while in liege pousitie, to name tutors and curators to act for his children after his own death. The powers conferred on curators so nominated are as extensive as those possessed by the father himself ; but the curators accepting the office subject themselves to the same formalities and responsibilities which are required of other curators, except that they are not bound to find caution ; and under the statute, their nomination may contain a declaration that they shall not be liable for omissions nor singuli in solidum, but each for his own actual intromissions only. But this power of dispensation is limited by the statute to the means and estate descending from the father himself. The effect of the statute being to confer authority upon the father to delegate and continue his own curatorial power, a nomination by him precludes any choice of curators by the minor himself, unless with the consent of the curators named by his father ; Pitcairn, Feb. 1731, Mor. p. 16339 ; Drumore, 27th Jan. 1744, Kilk. p. 586 ; Mor. 16349 ; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 11. A father, however, has not the same power to name curators to his natural children, who are in law regarded as strangers to him ; Wilson, 10th March 1819, Fac. Coll.

A minor whose father has not named curators may take the management of his estate upon himself, or put himself under the direction of curators, in the manner prescribed by the act 1555, c. 35. This act, as it has been judicially interpreted, requires that the minor shall cite at least two of his nearest of kin on the father's side, and two on the mother's side, personally, or at their dwelling-places, and all others having interest, edictally, at the head burgh of the jurisdiction within which the minor's lands lie, to appear before his own judge ordinary; Wallace, 29th July 1674, Mor. p. 16290. In case the minor has no heritable property, the publication of the edict is made at the head burgh of his own domicile. On the day of appearance, the minor, in presence of the judge, chooses his curators; and such of them as are willing to undertake the office, sign their acceptance, take the oath de fidei administratione, and give security to account for their intromissions. Upon this being done, the judge interposes his authority to the appointment, and an act of curatory is thereupon extracted, which is sufficient to vest the legal powers in the curator. Curators, whether nominated by the father, or chosen by the minor, are required, by the act 1672, c. 2, to make up a complete inventory of the minor's estate, of which inventory, three copies, all signed by the curators and the next of kin on both sides, must be judicially produced before the minor's judge ordinary; and after being signed by the clerk of court, one copy is given to the next of kin by the father, another to those by the mother, and a third to the curators. See Inventory. In case of neglect to comply with this requisite, the statute declares,—1st, That the curators shall not be allowed credit for any expense incurred in the minor's affairs, which, by Act of Sederunt, 25th Feb. 1693, has been explained to mean, such expenses as have been laid out in lawsuits and legal diligence; 2d, That they shall be liable for omissions, a liability to which, it may be observed, that they are at any rate subject at common law; and, 3d, That they may be removed from their office as suspect. The statute farther declares that curators shall have no power to act until the inventories be made up. Yet a payment made to a curator, who had not made up inventories, was sustained; Logan, Dec. 1772, cited in Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 23. When a minor names curators, he sometimes declares them exempt from liability singuli in solidum; but it has been held that curators cannot be so exempted from liability for omissions; Watson, 16th July 1773, Fac. Coll., M. 16369; and the efficacy of an exemption from any of the legal responsibilities of the office by the minor's declaration, when he appoints them, is extremely questionable.

There is still another mode by which minors, in the management of their property, may be put under the direction of administrators, which, although it does not appear to fall properly under the character of curatory, has yet been treated in our law books under that title. A person making a gratuitous conveyance of property to a minor is held to be entitled to appoint curators for him, to the effect of managing, on his behalf, the property so conveyed. Such an appointment can only infer a partial power of administration, which, although it excludes the management of ordinary curators as to the property so conveyed, is not incompatible with the existence of proper curators, either by the father's nomination or the minor's choice. A stranger has no power, either at common law or by statute, to appoint curators to a minor; but, on the other hand, any one in gifting his property is entitled to annex to the gift whatever legal conditions he may think proper as to the administration or management of it. And as the deed under which administrators appointed in this manner are to act, must itself show the extent of the property placed under their management, it seems not to be clear that curators so appointed (if they can be called curators), are bound to make up inventories, or to comply with the other statutory requisites. It rather appears that they are to be regarded as ordinary managers, liable to be called to account by the proper curators of the minor. Accordingly, it has been held that a nomination of this kind does not prevent the minor from choosing curators for himself. This was decided in a case where the nomination of administrators was made by the reputed father; Wilson, 10th March 1819, Fac. Coll.

Although, after curators have been appointed, their consent is essential to the validity of every act of the minor, yet, a minor to whom no curators have been nominated, and who has not chosen curators for himself, may do every act which the consent of curators, if he had any, would warrant; and the interposition of curators will not protect the acts of the minor, from any challenge to which they would have been liable, had they flowed from a minor without curators. Thus, in both cases, the deeds of a minor may be reduced on the head of lesion. See Minor. Curators, whether nominated by the father or chosen by the minor, must be governed as to their manner of proceeding by the tenor of their appointment. In general, the majority are entitled to act, unless a certain number has been declared to be a quorum, or one of the curators named sine quo non; and in these cases, the quorum, or sine quo non, must accept and continue to act, otherwise the nomination falls. A curator sine quo non cannot act by himself, but he has a negative on the acts of the other curators; Vere, 1st June 1791; Mor. 16,378; Bell's Princ. § 2064. See Quorum. Sine quo non.

The object of the curatorial office being the control and management of the minor's affairs, it is the duty of the curators to advise with the minor as to all deeds required to be granted by him, and to concur with him in such as are proper; and any deed granted, or contract entered into, without their consent, is null by way of exception, in so far as the minor is concerned; although, if beneficial for the minor, it may be held obligatory on the other contracting party. For a minor, even without the consent of his curators, may better his condition, although he may be reposed against transactions which make it worse; Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 33; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 33. On the other hand, the curators cannot act for the minor, who is himself vested in the right of his own property; they can merely authorize his acts by their consent. If, however, the minor will not act as his curators advise, they may apply for exoneration from their office. It is not the duty of curators to dispose of the minor's property, unless under circumstances of necessity, or where the transaction is for the manifest advantage of the minor; and, in such circumstances, curators have frequently applied to the Court of Session for their sanction to any extraordinary step of this kind; but the Court have refused to interpose their authority as "unnecessary," on the ground that "the minor and his curators could sell without judicial authority, and that no decree of the Court could prevent a reduction by the minor;" Wallace, 8th March 1817, Fac. Coll. See Judicial Factor. Such is the rule of law, so far as relates to the disposal or transference of the minor's property; but, in the general management of the minor's affairs, a wider power seems to be intrusted to curators. Thus, although they cannot by themselves grant discharges for money, which has been invested on behalf of the minor, it rather appears that they may of themselves receive the interest; and further, when the money has been uplifted, they are intrusted with the disposal and reinvestment of it. In like manner, they are entitled to uplift rents falling due from the minor's estate, and even to grant leases. There is this distinction, however, to be observed, that a lease granted by curators alone, necessarily determines with their office, Resolutio enim jure dantis resolvitur jus accipientis; while a lease by a minor himself, with consent of his curators, will be as effectual for the whole stipulated period of endurance, as it would be, if granted after a majority, provided there be no objection on the head of lesion; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 16. It is the duty of curators to see that the title-deeds and writings belonging to the minor are preserved, and his titles completed. Such of his moveables as cannot be preserved must be disposed of; and the curators will be liable for any damages, arising from neglect in either of those points. The curators must pay off all burdens affecting the estate of the minor, and perform the acts which the minor is bound to perform. They must see the minor's money lent out on good securities, and draw the interest of the money and rents of the heritage regularly as they fall due; and, in so far as those exceed the annual expense of the minor, the surplus must be lent out on proper securities; and where the minor has received interest, rents or principal sums from his debtors, without the curators' consent, they must prosecute the debtors for payment, as if no such payments had been made to the minor, unless the money has been profitably employed for the minor's use; Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 33; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 33. The rule with regard to the laying out of money recovered by the curators, seems to be this: When the money arises from moveables sold, a year is allowed for recovering the price, and procuring proper securities; where rents are payable in grain, the same period is allowed; where the rent is payable in money, half a year only is given; but although the accruing interest on money lent, over and above what is necessary for a pupil's annual expenses, must be brought into a capital sum, either before or at the expiration of the office of tutory, curators are under no such obligation. It is sufficient that the money remain in the hands of the debtors, undrawn by the curator; if it have been drawn, it ought to be laid out within a reasonable time. Curators may better the minor's condition, by converting moveable debts into heritable; but they cannot, by any act in which the minor does not take a part, make any change on the nature of the succession to the minor. Such debts will remain moveable as to succession; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 18. See also Ross, 31st Jan. 1793, Mor. p. 5545; Graham, 6th March 1798, Mor. p. 5599; and Morton, 11th Feb. 1813, Fac. Coll. Curators are allowed to employ, not only the annual income of the minor's estate on his education and maintenance, but, should it be requisite, they may encroach on the principal, in order to put the minor into a profession, or to establish him in life; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 24. Curators have no control over the minor's person. A minor pubes may marry without the consent of the curators, but cannot make any conventional provisions by marriage-contract without their concurrence. A minor may also bequeath his moveable estate by testament, without the consent of his curators; but he cannot, even with their consent, make a settlement of his heritage; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 14 and 33. Curators are liable singuli in solidum for their intromissions and for diligence, unless where this responsibility is restricted in the manner already explained. They are entitled to no salary or allowance for their trouble; but it has been held, that they may appoint a factor with a proper salary; Ersk. ib., § 16; Lord Macdonald, 13th Nov. 1780, Mor. p. 13437. In no case can a curator be auctor in rem suam; Ersk. ib. § 19. Any one of full age may competently be appointed to the office of curator, excepting married women, who, by law, are themselves placed under the curatory of their husbands; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 12. Hence, where an unmarried woman has been nominated, and has acted, her office falls on her marriage. Procurators,—that is, persons who, without any legal title, have taken upon themselves to act in the capacity of curators,—are, by act of Sederunt, 10th June 1665, subjected to the same liability in all points, with proper curators; Ersk. ib. § 28. See on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 29, et seq.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 11, et seq.; Ersk. Princ. 12th edit. 90–91; Bank. vol. i. p. 174, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 2087, et seq.; Shand's Prac. 141, 560, et seq.; Brown on Sale, p. 194. See also Minor.

2. Curator to an idiot or to an insane person. Idiots or insane persons are another class to whom the law of Scotland provides curators. It does not appear, however, that the parents of such persons have, ipso jure, any right of administration for them after they attain majority. Neither is there any instance of a testamentary nomination of such curators, although Erskine seems to think this competent in our law, as it was in the Roman law; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 49. The method pointed out by our law, for declaring fatuity or furiosity, is by a breve issuing from Chancery, directed to the judge ordinary of the territory within which the person resides. The judge is directed to hold an inquest, for inquiring—1st, Into the state of mind of the person; and 2d, Who is the next male agnate on whom the office of curator may be conferred. The person to be cognosed must be brought before the inquest; Decar, 25th Feb. 1809, Fac. Coll.; and, by the act 1475, c. 66, the verdict of the jury must state, not only his present condition of mind, but how long he has been fatuous or insane. The same statute declares that no alienation made by him, after the time fixed by the inquest as the commencement of his distemper, shall be valid. It may be observed, however, that the verdict of the inquest, fixing retrospectively the date of the insanity, will not preclude a person interested in any deed, falling within the period, from proving that, at the date of that particular deed, the granter was of sane mind. The only effect of the verdict seems to be, to reverse the ordinary presumption of sanity, and to lay the burden of proving the sanity of the granter on the person who founds on the deed. The next male agnate of twenty-five years of age, who is himself capable of managing his own affairs, is the person entitled to the office; 1474, c. 52, and 1585, c. 18. The guardianship of insane persons, although generally treated of under curatory, seems rather to correspond with tutary. The curator to an idiot is intrusted with the charge of the person, as well as the estate of his ward; and a person under such guardianship, being incapable of will or consent, the curator must transact everything in his own name. In every other respect, the powers and duties of the office are similar to those which have been already explained in treating of curators to a minor. The persons entitled to institute proceedings for having a curator appointed to an insane person, are his next of kin; and the curator-at-law is the nearest male agnate, except where a wife is fatuous, in which case the husband, as her administrator-in-law, excludes agnates; Haliburton, June 1791; Mor. p. 16379. Curators to insane persons are subject to the provisions of 12 and 13 Vict., c. 51. See also Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 50; Bell's Princ. § 2104, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 308.

3. Curator bonis. Where an heir is deliberating whether or not he shall enter,—or where an infant is without tutors,—or where a succession opens to one who is resident abroad,—or where a person is labouring under some temporary incapacity to conduct his own affairs,—and in other cases of a similar description,—the Court of Session may appoint a curator bonis to manage and preserve the property, until the person to whom it belongs is in a situation to act either for himself or by means of other managers. Curators bonis are also named for the management of trust-estates, where the trustees have all declined to accept, or cannot legally do so. The office of curator bonis is conferred by the Court on a summary application, when unopposed, on the production of medical certificates; but if opposed and counter medical certificates are produced, inquiry will be requisite. See Lockhart v. Ross, July 17, 1857, 19 D. 1075. The curator so appointed is subjected to all the rules prescribed by the act of Sederunt, 13th Feb. 1730, relative to judicial factors; and a curator bonis for imbecile or absent persons is subject to the provisions of 12 and 13 Vict., c. 51. See Ersk. B. ii. tit. 12, § 58; Bank. vol. i. p. 179; Kames'

Princ. of Equity (1825), 12414. See Judicial Factor.

4. Curator ad litem. Judicial proceedings, in which a minor is interested, may be of so serious importance to him, that, in every case, our law requires that a curator for the minor be made a party. Where the minor has already curators, they are his proper advisers in the law-suits in which he may be engaged, and must be cited along with him; M Turk, 7th Feb. 1815, Fac. Coll. Where the minor has no tutors or curators, it is necessary not only that tutors and curators be cited edictally, but also, when appearance is made for the minor, that a curator ad litem be appointed for him; and, if this be omitted, any decree in foro against the minor may be opened up as a decree in absence; Sinclair, 15th Jan. 1828, 6 S. and D. 336; Dick, 15th May 1828, 6 S. and D. 798, and 5th Feb. 1829, 7 S. and D. 364. In like manner, if a minor be engaged in a law-suit with his tutors or curators, or a wife in a suit with her husband, a curator ad litem must be appointed to conduct the process. The appointment is made, on the motion of either party, by the judge before whom the process already depends. The Court will not appoint a curator to concur in raising an action. The appointment is confined to the particular suit in which it is made; and the curator ad litem appears at the bar, and takes the oath de fidei administratione, of which proceeding a minute is made by the clerk of Court, which completes the curator's title. A curator ad litem having no authority to intromit with the minor's estate, is not under the necessity of finding caution; nor is he liable for the expenses of Process; Fraser, 9th March 1847, ix. D. 903. Where a motion for the appointment of a curator ad litem is not made by either party, the judge ought to make the appointment ex proprio motu; Ersk. B. i. tit. 7, § 13. See also Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 31, and Bank. vol. i. p. 175. See, on the subject of curatory generally, More's Notes to Stair, pp. xvi. xxxviii., et seq., lxxvi.; Bell's Com. 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 2087, et seq.; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t.; Kames' Princ. of Equity, (1825), 467, 490.

Curatorial Inventory. See Inventory.

Curfeu; in England, a bell which rang at eight o'clock in the evening, in the time of William the Conqueror; on hearing which every person was obliged to rake up or cover over his fire, and put out his light. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Curia; a court civil or ecclesiastical. Skene, h. t.

Curialitas; the courtesy of Scotland. Skene, h. t. See Courtesy.

Currente Termino; in reference to leases, means "during the currency of a term." Poining currente termino may be warrantably stopped by sequestration under the landlord's hypothec, unless the creditor offers consignation, or sufficient security for the hypothecated rent. In the general case, the landlord cannot apply for sequestration currente termino, or before the rent falls due; but he may do so on cause shown. It has been doubted whether the furniture of a dwelling-house can be sequestrated currente termino, even although the tenant be vergens ad inopiam, since a dwelling-house cannot be possessed without furniture. Bell on Leases, i. 369, 389; ii. 25; Hunter, ii. 377, 404.

Cursing of God. Those who, "not being distracted in their wits," rail upon, or curse God, or any of the persons of the Blessed Trinity, are, by 1661, c. 21, punishable with death. Hume, vol. i. p. 568.

Cursing of Parents. The statute 1661, c. 20, provides the punishment of death for every child above the age of sixteen years, who, not being distracted, shall curse or beat a parent. Children under that age, and past pupilarity, who may be guilty of this offence, are punishable arbitrarily. It seems to be a good defence against the capital charge, that the parent has provoked the injury by treating the child with unreasonable harshness and severity. Hume, i. 324.

Cursing and Swearing. The offence of profane cursing and swearing is punishable by certain pecuniary penalties, proportioned to the rank of the offender; and, on failure to pay, by imprisonment, or setting in the stocks, or, in cases of obstinate perseverance in the offence, by banishment. The statutes imposing the penalties are, 1551, c. 16, and 1581, c. 103. The more recent statutes are, 1661, c. 19, and 1661, c. 38, § 25, by which the execution of those laws is particularly committed to justices of the peace; and, by 1696, c. 31, it is made competent for any person to pursue. Hume, vol. i. p. 572; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. iii. p. 332, 2d edit.

Cursing, Letters of. Letters of excommunication were anciently termed letters of cursing. Those letters passed on the decrees of Church courts; and, if the person against whom they were directed remained for forty days contumacious and unrepentant, letters of caption were issued against him at the King's instance, not on account of his failure to pay or perform in terms of his obligation, but as a punishment for his impious contempt of the censures of the Church. At the Reformation, letters of cursing were abolished, along with the ecclesiastical system, of which they formed a part; and afterwards, on the establishment of the commissary courts in 1563, the place of letters of cursing was supplied by letters of horning and caption, which the Court of Session was directed by Queen Mary to award on the decrees of the commissaries. Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 100 and 269; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. iii. 570. See also Balfour's Practicks, p. 564.

Custom or Customary Law; is the unwritten law of the country, founded on immemorial custom, in contradistinction to the statutory or written law, as it is termed. Customary law derives its force from being considered as the implied ordinance of the legislative power. Uniform custom has, in some respects, the same effect with express statute; thus, it will afford a rule in interpreting statutes contrary to the words of the enactment; and an immemorial and uniform custom to the contrary will even have the effect of abrogating a statute. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 30, 43, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 24; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 433, 5th edit.; Brown's Synop. tit. Consuetude, and pp. 308, 1105; Shaw's Digest, tit. Consuetude. See also Desuetude. Usage. Decisions.

Customs; are duties imposed by authority of Parliament on the importation and exportation of certain commodities. Those duties depend upon the particular statutes in force at the time, and vary with the exigencies of the state, or with the views of policy which may render it expedient to encourage or discourage particular exports or imports. By the Treaty of Union, the laws in relation to customs are made the same in Scotland as in England. In 1845 a consolidation of the whole laws relative to the customs was effected by eleven separate acts of Parliament, which form 8 and 9 Vict., c. 84 to c. 94 inclusive. See Barclay's Digest, h. t.

Custos Rotulorum; the keeper of the rolls or records of the county; the officer intrusted with the custody of the rolls of the sessions of the peace, and also of the commission of the peace. He is always a justice of the peace of the quorum of the county, and generally some person of quality. He is appointed by a writing, signed by the Sovereign, which is a warrant to the Lord Chancellor to put him on the commission. He may execute his office by deputy, and has power to appoint the clerk of the peace; Tomlins' Dict. This office is not now in use in Scotland, although it is mentioned in the statutes 1617, c. 18, and 1661, c. 38, and also in Cromwell's instructions to the justices of the peace. Hutch. Justice of Peace, B. i. c. 1, § 10.

Daily Council. By the act 1503, c. 58, the power which had been formerly vested in the Session was transferred to a new court, to be named by the King, called the Daily Council, which was appointed to hold its sittings at Edinburgh, or where the King should direct, for the purpose of deciding in civil causes, daily as they should occur. This was the court which immediately preceded the institution of the College of Justice, and from which the present court derives its title of "Council and Session." Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 18; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 11. See College of Justice. Session, Court of.

Damages. In legal phraseology, the term damages is usually applied to the pecuniary reparation due for loss or injury sustained by one person, through the fault of another. Every illegal, unwarrantable, or malicious act, whether fraudulent or not, by which another is injured, either in his patrimonial interests, or in his person or feelings, founds a civil claim for damages against the person who has caused the loss or injury. This claim may be grounded on a breach of contract, or on a crime or delict, or quasi delict, or on any blameable omission or neglect of duty; the civil claim for reparation, at the instance of the private party who has suffered, not being incompatible with proceedings ad vindictam publicam, at the instance of the private party, or of the public prosecutor. Damages for breach of contract are due only where it is impossible to enforce specific performance; for it is not optional to the obligant to perform his obligation, or to pay damages; and even where a specific penalty is annexed to a failure in performance, so long as performance is possible, the debtor in the obligation is not entitled to pay the penalty, and so to get quit of his obligation. The damages cover the loss, together with the expense of the proceedings necessary for obtaining reparation; but, where there is no fraud or delinquency, remote or consequential damages will not be given. Where, for example, the claim is founded on a failure to pay a sum of money, the principal sum, with the legal interest, is all that can be demanded as damages; not the possible profit, which the creditor might have derived, from the use of the money, had it been paid in terms of the obligation. In the same manner, where a particular subject has been lost, destroyed, or injured, without fraud or criminality, the person who has sustained the loss, in claiming reparation, must estimate the subject at its real value, and not at the pretium affectionis, or imaginary value, which he may himself put upon it. Where, on the other hand, the loss or injury has arisen from fraud or delict, the sufferer is not only entitled to demand a pretium affectionis, but may insist for consequential damages, subject to the modification of a judge or of a jury. Culpable neglect or ignorance, without any positive criminality, is also a ground for damages. Thus, a jailer who, through negligence, allows an imprisoned debtor to escape, will be liable for damages; which will be estimated at the full amount of the debt, even although the debtor may have been utterly bankrupt. In like manner, a clerk of Court will be liable in damages if, through carelessness, he lose the documents produced by a party in a process. So also, if a coal-pit be left improperly fenced, or if an opening be made in the streets of a town, without due precautions being taken to guard against accidents, the proprietor of the coal-pit, or the magistrates of the burgh, will be liable in damages for any loss or injury which may arise from such neglect; Black, 9th Feb. 1804, Mor. p. 13905; affirmed on appeal, 20th Feb. 1812; Innes, 6th Feb. 1790, Mor. p. 13189. A professional person, or an artist, or a tradesman, on the same principle, is liable for damages occasioned by his ignorance or want of skill in his calling. As to injuries done by domesticated animals, or by animals which have been appropriated, our law is not so well digested as the Roman law was. By that law, when cattle were driven illegally into pastures, the driver was responsible for the damages: when they strayed in, of their own accord, the action lay against their owner. He who provoked an animal until it hurt him, had no claim for reparation; but if the excited animal injured some one else, the provoker was liable. The owner of an animal which, unprovoked, inflicted bodily injury on some one, was liable in damages. In case of a scuffle between two animals in a pasture, in which one of them was slain, no action was competent, either when it was not ascertained which of them was the aggressor, or when it was known that the slain animal was the aggressor. But if the aggressor killed his opponent, the owner of the slain animal had an action against the aggressor's owner. If a savage dog had been let loose in a court, and bit one coming in, the sufferer had an action, but not if the dog was chained. One who was leading a dog, which made its escape and injured any one, was liable, if he were at all careless, or were leading it where it should not be. The tenor of these actions generally allowed the defender the alternative of delivering up the animal, or paying the damages. The distinction between an animal which was, and one which was not previously known to be vicious, is not recognised in the Roman law. In the law of Scotland, these rules have not been uniformly adopted; but they are valuable, as suggesting the principles which govern such cases. Dogs and cattle are the animals from which injury is most frequently sustained in this country, and the general rule appears to be, that where the animal is vicious, the owner is answerable; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 47, et seq.; Turnbull, 6th Dec. 1735, Elchies, Reparation, No. 1. In Fleming v. Orr, 5th March 1853, 15 D. 486, the Court found that the owner of a dog which had destroyed sheep was liable, although it was not proved that the owner knew the dog to be vicious; but the judgment was reversed by the House of Lords, April 3, 1855; 1 Macqueen.

A master is civilly liable for the negligence of his servants, or others employed by him. Thus, the proprietors of stage-coaches will be subjected in damages for injuries arising from careless driving; Drummond, 26th Feb. 1813, Fac. Coll. This liability, however, may be said to arise ex contractu, since such persons engage to convey passengers in safety. But, independently of any express contract, a master has been found liable for damages done by those employed by him, although he was absent, and they were acting against his orders; Lord Keith, 10th June 1812, Fac. Coll. The correctness, however, of that decision was questioned in a more recent case, in which a landed proprietor was held not to be liable in damages, for an accident which occurred from cutting a tree on his estate, through the negligence of those employed by him, while he was residing at a distance, and not aware that the operation which led to the injury was going on; Linwood, 14th May 1817, Fac. Coll., affirmed in the House of Lords. A person is also liable in damages for the negligence of persons employed by him; e.g., a creditor will be responsible for the illegal proceedings of a messenger-at-arms, whom he has employed to execute diligence against his debtor; and one messenger was held liable for a loss arising from the insolvency of another messenger, to whom he had committed the duty assigned to himself; Hamilton, 14th Feb. 1817, Fac. Coll. By the law of England a master is not liable to a servant for damages occasioned by a fellow-servant, if he has taken reasonable care to protect his servants from the risk of injury, by associating them only with servants of ordinary skill and care—a servant being held to run the risk arising from negligence of his fellow-servants. See the case of Priestly v. Fowler, 3 Mees. and Wels. 1; also the case of Hutchinson v. York and Berwick Railway Company, May 22, 1850, 19 L. J. Ex. 296. A different rule, however, prevails in the law of Scotland. See the case of Gray v.

Brassey, Dec. 1, 1852, 15 D. 135; also 3 Ross, L. C. 296, et seq.; see also the cases of Reid v. Bartonshill Coal Company, July 3, 1855, 17 D. 1017, and M'Naughton v. Caledonian Railway Company, Jan. 15, 1857, 19 D. 271. Shipowners are liable, to the extent of the value of the ship and freight, for injuries done to goods on board, through the negligence of the master or mariners, with the exception of losses by fire in the ship, and the loss of gold, silver, precious stones, &c., unless entered as such; 7 Geo. II., c. 15, § 1; 26 Geo. III., c. 86, §§ 1, 2, 3; 53 Geo. III., c. 159. Special statutes have introduced certain responsibilities in the reparation of particular injuries; such, for example, as the statutes about destroying plantations, and the damages done by rioters. See Planting and Inclosing. Riots.

A principal is not liable for any damages occasioned by the acts of a sub-agent; Quarman v. Curmett, 1840, 9 M. and W.; Ropson v. Cobitt, April 2, 1842, 6 M. and W. 716; M'Lean v. Russell, March 9, 1850, 12 D. 887. See 3 Ross, L. C. 266. A principal is not liable for damages occasioned by his agent on any matters beyond his agency; nor is a master liable for the wilful and malicious acts of his servant, although committed by him while acting in the service of his master; M'Manus v. Crickett, 1 E. 106; Croft v. Allison, 4 B. and Ald. 590. See 3 Ross, L. C. 291.

By the Jury Court Act, 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 1, actions of damages, where the title was not in question, and where the conclusion was for damages and expenses merely, were directed to be remitted to the jury court as soon as defences were lodged. But this enactment was so far repealed by the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, which provides that the following actions shall be held as appropriate to the jury court, viz., "All actions, on account of injury to the person, whether real or verbal, as assault and battery, libel or defamation; all actions on account of any injury to moveables, or to land, where, in this last case, the title is not in question; all actions for damages on account of breach of promise of marriage, or on account of seduction or adultery; all actions founded on delinquency, or quasi delinquency of any kind, where the conclusion shall be for damages and expenses; all actions on the responsibility of shipmasters and owners, carriers by land or water, inn-keepers or stablers, for the safe custody and care of goods and commodities, horses, money, clothes, jewels, and other articles, and in general all actions founded on the principle of the edict, Nautæ, cauponæ, stabularii; all actions brought for nuisance; all actions of reduction, on the head of furiosity and idiocy, or on facility and lesion, or on force and fear; all actions on policies of insurance, whether for maritime, or fire, or life insurance; all actions on charter parties and bills of lading; all actions for freight; all actions on contracts for the carriage of goods by land or water; and actions for the wages of masters and mariners of ships or vessels." By 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 49, the Court may allow a proof by commission in any of the above enumerated causes, where the action is not one for libel or nuisance, or properly and in substance an action of damages. See Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 27, et seq.

Actions for damages are also competent before the sheriff-court, and other inferior courts. With regard to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justiciary in such actions, it seems to be settled, that if the libel raised in that Court embrace both the public and private interest, although the prosecution for the public interest should be disappointed by the plea of res judicata, or by a pardon, yet the process may be proceeded in to the effect of recovering the damages and expenses due to the private party. But there is no instance of a prosecution in the Court of Justiciary, with a conclusion for pecuniary reparation merely, to the private party, without regard to the punishment of the offender; Hume, ii. 33 and 34. All the parties concerned in committing a wrong are liable, singuli in solidum, for the pecuniary reparation to the party injured; and, although no criminal prosecution for a delict can be instituted after the death of the offender, yet the civil claim for damages, at the instance of the private party, is not affected by the delinquent's death, but may be made effectual against his representatives, like an ordinary civil debt; and this, whether the action for reparation has been commenced before or after his death; Morrison v. Cameron, &c., 25th May 1809, Fac. Coll. and note to the report of that case. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 3, et seq.; More's Notes, pp. lvii. lxi. xcii.; Brodie's Supp. 1003; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 12, et seq.; Bank. vol. i. p. 252; Kames' Equity, 41, 62, 211; Shand's Prac., passim; Bell's Princ. § 29, et seq., 545, et seq. See Malice. Jury Trial. Defamation.

Damnum; in the Roman law, signified any loss sustained in person or property. Damnum was either injuria datum or absque injuria. Damnum injuria datum, was any loss occasioned by a free person, versans in illicito, and consequently guilty either of dole or culpa. Damnum absque injuria, meant a loss which a person sustained through no illegal or unjust act on the part of another free and responsible being; e.g., loss inflicted by an animal or a slave, or happening accidentally, or occasioned by a free person in the prosecution of a justifiable act. The loss inflicted by a slave was called noxia, by an animal pauperies, and for these the proprietor was responsible. But with us, although perhaps incorrectly, the expression, Damnum absque injuria, is sometimes applied to those losses for which the sufferer can make no legal claim for reparation against any one. An illustration given of such a loss, is the establishment of a rival school which draws away the scholars from a school previously established; Tomlins, h. t. Damnum infectum was a term used to express loss not yet suffered, but only apprehended; as, for instance, if persons were mining below a house, or heaping up materials against a wall, or had threatened some one, the prætor was accustomed to demand from them cautio damni infecti. See Damages. Suspension and Interdict.

Damnum Fatale; is a loss arising from inevitable accident, such as no human prudence can prevent;—such, for example, as the losses occasioned by storms or tempests, lightning, floods, over-blowing with sand, or, in general, by any calamity falling within the legal description of an act of God. Bell's Com.; Bell on Leases, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 429; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 989. See Act of God.

Date of a Deed. It is the invariable practice to insert the date of the deed, in the testing clause, either by specifying the day on which the deed has been signed, or by referring to the date prefixed to the deed, or mentioned in the course of it. But although this is now the practice, the date is not a statutory requisite, and the want of it would not, of itself, be fatal to the deed. Yet, if there be circumstances of suspicion attending the omission of the date, every presumption will be admitted against the deed; or, at least, it will be held to be of the date most unfavourable to its validity. If the date be fraudulently falsified to serve a purpose—as, for example, to secure a preference in a competition—such a fraud will be fatal to the deed; Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 19; More's Notes, p. cccvii.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 18; Bank. vol. ii. p. 634; Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 132; Bell's Com. 6th edit.; Dickson's Evidence, passim; Thomson on Bills; Menzies's Lectures on Conveyancing; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing; Duff on Deeds. See also Testing Clause. In questions of reduction on bankruptcy, under the act 1696, c. 5, all deeds relating to heritable rights which require to be completed by infeftment, are reckoned of the date of the registration of the sasine following on them; and all dispositions, assignations, and venditions, which do not require sasine, but to the completion of which, as transfers or securities, intimation or delivery is requisite, are held to be of the date of the intimation, delivery, or other act requisite for completing the right under them; without prejudice to the validity of all such deeds in other respects; 54 Geo. III., c. 137, §§ 12 and 13. By 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, § 6, it is enacted that the date of a deed under that act (the new Bankruptcy Act), or under the act 1696, c. 5, shall be the date of recording the sasine, where sasine is requisite, and, in other cases, of registration of the deed, or of delivery, or of intimation, or of such other proceeding as shall, in the particular case, be necessary for rendering such deed completely effectual. See Bankrupt. Holograph deeds without witnesses do not prove their own dates, where the date is of consequence, as in questions under the law of deathbed, or in competitions, but the date may be proved, aliunde, by adminicles (Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 22); or by two unexceptionable witnesses (Bank. vol. i. p. 333). And in re mercatoria, holograph writings will prove their date, to the effect at least of throwing the onus probandi on the objector. Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 29; More's Notes, p. cccxvi.; Bell's Com. p. 53, 6th edit. See also Holograph Writings.

Day. The day is either natural or artificial. The artificial day is the time from sunrise to sunset. The natural day consists of twenty-four hours; which period is also termed the astronomical day, or the civil day. The astronomical day begins at noon; the civil day is reckoned by some nations from sunrise, by others from sunset, and by others from midnight. By the Roman calendar, the civil day commenced at midnight; and the British and most other European nations reckon in the same manner. All the days of the week except Sunday, or the fast-days appointed by Government, are called lawful days; and no legal diligence, either against person or property, can be executed except on a lawful day. But criminal warrants, and warrants for apprehending a debtor, as in meditatione fugæ, may both be granted and executed upon a Sunday, or upon a fast-day, as well as on a lawful day. Bell's Com. 6th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 431; Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 329.

Day-Writ or Day-Rule—in England, a rule or order of Court, permitting a prisoner in custody in the King's Bench prison, &c., to go without the bounds of his prison for one day. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Days of Grace of a Bill; a prolongation of the time of payment of a bill formerly granted as a mere indulgence, but now as a matter of legal right, wherever the bill is drawn payable at a certain distance of time after date, or after sight. The number of these days differs in different countries. In Scotland, three days of grace are allowed. When the bill is drawn payable at sight, or on demand, there are no days of grace. A bill may be protested for non-payment on the day after the nominal day of payment; but the practice is to present the bill for payment on the last day of grace, or, if that should fall upon a Sunday, on the Saturday preceding, and if not then paid, to protest it for non-payment; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 33; Bell's Com. p. 324, 6th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 327; Thomson on Bills, p. 405, et seq.; Menzies's Lectures, p. 354. See Bill of Exchange.

Deacon. Before the passing of the Burgh Reform Act, the deacons of the crafts formed a constituent part of the town council in royal burghs, and represented the trades. They were elected by their respective incorporations, generally, if not universally, under the control of the town council. The subordinate incorporations, prior to the election of deacons, made up a list of six of their members, which they presented to the council, who struck off three from the number, and returned the remaining three names to the incorporation, as a leet or list, out of which the incorporation should elect their deacon for the ensuing year. The election, when made, was reported to the council, and approved of; after which the new deacon entered upon the duties of his office; or, if any dispute arose as to the election, the council had power, in the first instance, to hear and determine it; their decision being subject to review by summary complaint to the Court of Session, provided the complaint were presented within two calendar months after the annual election of magistrates and councillors; 16 Geo. II., c. 11. But by the Burgh Reform Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76, § 19, it is enacted, that the deacons shall no longer be recognised as official and constituent members of the town council; but the rights of the crafts to elect their deacons and other officers, for the management of their affairs, in such form as they were in use to adopt, are preserved, and are exercised, without control on the part of the town council. The deacon-convener of the trades in Edinburgh and Glasgow still continues a constituent member of the town council. The deacon is preses of his own incorporation; and signs the record of its acts. Some of our older statutes confer on deacons a mastership or jurisdiction over the rest of their trade, and a power to essay their work; but at present they exercise no such power or jurisdiction. *Bank. Dead Body. The offence of disinterring a dead body, or crimen violati sepulchri, is punishable arbitrarily, by fine, imprisonment, whipping, or transportation, according to the circumstances attending the commission of the crime. This offence is not regarded properly as a theft, but as a great indecency, and a crime of its own nature. The stealing of a corpse before interment seems to be punishable on the same principle. In England, if the shroud or other apparel be carried off with the body, an indictment lies for theft; but the carrying away of the body itself, is not held to be theft either by the English or Scotch law. Hume, i. 85; More's Notes to Stair, p. cclxxxvii; Tomlins' Dict. voce Corpse. See also the Anatomy Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 75, which provides regulations as to bodies intended to be made use of for anatomical purposes, which must be observed under sentence of fine or imprisonment.

Dead Freight. A merchant who freights a whole ship is liable to pay freight for the goods transported, and a compensation for any loss arising from his failure to supply a full cargo. The sum paid for the unoccupied space is called dead freight; it is not, however, properly freight, but, strictly speaking, a claim of damages for the loss of freight; and, therefore, the shipmaster has no lien over the goods on board, entitling him to retain them against the consignee in security of this claim, which must be made effectual by a personal action against the freighter. But, although there be no such lien by implied contract, it may be constituted by an express stipulation to that effect, in the charter-party. Bell's Com. p. 430, 6th edit.; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 918.

Dead's Part; is that part of a man's moveable succession which he is entitled to dispose of by testament. If a man have neither wife nor children, or is not survived by either, his whole free moveable estate (with the exception of heirship moveables), is called dead's part, and he may bequeath the whole of it. If he leave a widow and no children, the widow is entitled to one-half of the free moveables, as her jus relictæ; and the other half is dead's part. If he leave a child or children but no widow, the one-half of the free moveable estate is dead's part, and the other goes to the child or children as legitim. Where, again, he leaves both a widow and a child or children, the widow has a third as her jus relictæ; the child or children a third as legitim; and the remaining third is the dead's part. But this legal distribution of the moveable estate may be affected by special provisions in a contract of marriage, which may increase or diminish the share of the moveable estate at the father's disposal by testament; or the same consequence may result from renunciations or discharges of their legal rights by the wife or the children. On the father's death, the jus relictæ and legitim vest, ipso jure, in the wife and in the children, without confirmation; but it is otherwise with the dead's part, which, in so far as undisposed of by testament, must be taken up by the next of kin by confirmation. Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 24, and tit. 8, § 54; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 18, et seq., and § 30; Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, vol. ii. pp. 379 and 407. See also Confirmation of Executor. Jus Relictæ. Legitim. Goods in Communion. Contract of Marriage.

Deaf and Dumb. Persons who had been deaf and dumb from their birth, were held by the Roman law to be incapable of consent, and consequently unfit to enter into a legal obligation or contract. But, by the law of Scotland, such persons may contract, if they have the use of reason, and if it appear that they understand the nature of the engagement which they are undertaking, and that they have expressed their consent by the usual signs. The law provides tutors to such deaf and dumb persons as are incapable, from that infirmity, of managing or understanding their own affairs. Those tutors are appointed in the same manner as tutors to idiots or insane persons. Stair, B. i. tit. 6, § 25, and B. i. tit. 10, § 13; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 16; Bank. B. i. tit. 7, § 11; Fraser's Domestic Relations, ii. 133. In one instance, a woman born deaf and dumb was subjected to a criminal trial for murder, proof being offered that she knew right from wrong, and that punishment is the consequence of guilt, and that she was able to conduct herself properly in all the ordinary affairs of life. She pleaded not guilty by signs; and the evidence on the trial having turned out favourably for her, she was acquitted; Hume, i. 45, ii. 278, note; Alison's Princ. 667. It is almost superfluous to observe that it is a valid objection to a jurymen that he is deaf or dumb; Hume, ii. 310. By the law of England, a man born deaf, dumb, and blind, is looked upon in the same light as an idiot. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Dean of Guild; the head of the Guild-brethren or Merchant Company. By 1593, c. 180, power was conferred on the dean of guild to judge, in mercantile and maritime causes, within burgh; but it is long since he ceased to exercise that branch of his jurisdiction. The proper duty of this magistrate now is, to take care that buildings within burgh are sufficient; that they are erected agreeably to law; and that they do not encroach either on private or public property. He may order insufficient buildings to be taken down; but in other respects, his jurisdiction is strictly confined to possessory questions. Although the dean of guild was formerly a magistrate of a royal burgh, and, indeed, in certain of the burghs still continues to be so, his jurisdiction is unconnected with the baillie court. His judgments are liable to review in the Court of Session, by advocacy, suspension, or reduction. By the Burgh Reform Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76, it is declared, that while the right of the gildry to elect their dean shall be preserved, he shall no longer be recognised as an official and constituent member of the town council, and that his functions shall be performed by a member of the council, elected by the majority of councillors. But the deans of guild in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, and Perth, elected as heretofore, are continued as constituent members of the council, to perform all the functions of their office. Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 24; Bank. B. iv. tit. 22; Bell's Princ. §§ 2176, 2184; Jurid. Styles, iii. 678, 756. See Burgh Royal.

Dean of Guild Court. In Edinburgh, the dean of guild court consists of the dean of guild, the old dean of guild, and a council of merchants and tradesmen annually chosen. The law assessors of the magistrates of Edinburgh act as assessors, and the usual practitioners before the court are the members of the society of solicitors-at-law. The jurisdiction of the court is confined to the regulation of buildings within the royalty; to the prevention of obstructions in the streets; to the removal of old and ruinous tenements; and, in general, to such matters of police as have any connection with buildings; including the enforcement of the act 1698, c. 8, as to the height and structure of houses in Edinburgh. No building can be erected, demolished, or materially altered, within burgh, without a warrant from this court, after all parties interested have been cited. The court has also a jurisdiction in regulating weights and measures. Where not moved in by private parties, these matters, so far as regards the public interest, are brought under the notice of the dean of guild court by the procurator-fiscal of that court. The jurisdiction is confined to possessory questions; and the decrees of the court may be enforced by letters of horning, obtained on a bill at the Bill-Chamber, as in the ordinary case of the decrees of magistrates of royal burghs. The dean of guild courts in other royal burghs, of sufficient size, have an analogous jurisdiction; and the form of process before the dean of guild is similar to that in other inferior courts; except that, in processes of lining, the action may proceed on the original petition alone, without any farther written pleadings; the parties or their procurators being heard viva voce. The facts, and the rights of the parties, may also be ascertained, when it shall appear proper, by judicial inspection of the premises, or by judicial remits to skilful tradesmen, who may be put on oath if required, and by the exhibition of plans. See authorities as in preceding article. See also Boyd's Judicial Proceedings, B. v. tit. 3; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 24,

Dean of Faculty. The corporation of advocates or barristers in Edinburgh is called the Faculty of Advocates, and the Dean of Faculty is one of their number elected annually to preside at their meetings, and to sign the acts of the Faculty. Bank. B. iv. tit. 3, § 8. See Advocate.

Dean; is an ecclesiastical dignitary in the Church of England, next in degree to a bishop. See Tomlins' Dict.

Deans of the Chapel-Royal. The Chapel-Royal in Scotland was a collegiate church, founded by the Scottish kings for their own use, the superior of which was called Dean of the Chapel-Royal. This benefice was, after the Reformation, conferred first on the Bishop of Galloway, and afterwards annexed to the see of Dunblane. Since the abolition of Episcopacy, the revenues of the benefice have been in the Crown; and the Sovereign bestows them on one or more clergymen of the Church of Scotland, who are denominated deans and chaplains, and who hold the appointment during pleasure. The patronage of the churches which belonged to the ancient deanery is now in the Crown, unless expressly conveyed to the chaplains, in their gift of the profits and emoluments of the deanery. Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 101.

Death, Punishment of. See Capital Punishment.

Death; is either natural or civil. Natural, is when life is actually extinct; civil, is when a person is adjudged dead by the law. Death has various effects, according to the circumstances in which it takes place. The death of the person behaving as heir purges vicious passive titles. The death of a partner dissolves a company, in absence of agreement to the contrary. Death obliterates crimes as to the punishment; but the right arising to the superior in the fee, from the delinquency, as a resolutive condition, is not excluded by the vassal's death. The case of the death or sickness of any of the judges of the Court is provided for by 2 Will. IV., c. 5. See Shand's Prac. p. 54. Where either of the parties to a process dies, the proceedings must stop till his representatives are cited; for any judgment pronounced in an action against a party previously dead is null. Formerly an action of transference was necessary, in case of either the pursuer's or defender's death; but the necessity was taken away in the case of the pursuers by 1693, c. 15, which allows his "heir, executor, or assignee, upon production of his service or retour, or confirmed testament, or special assignation, though not intimate, to insist in the principal cause;" and successors or purchasers may proceed with the action on producing their title, and being assisted by a minute. On the defender's death, however, and on the refusal of his representative to sist himself, an action of transference is necessary, and the principal cause cannot be proceeded in till decree of transference is pronounced. Provision is made for the substitution, at some future day, of services and notices in lieu of actions of transference, by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 54. A forthcoming may be raised on an arrestment, notwithstanding the death of the arrester, arrestee, or common debtor. For the rules on this subject, see Arrestment. A presumption exists in favour of life for a reasonable number of years, so as to throw the onus probandi upon the party alleging death. But this presumption may be overcome by a counter presumption of death, arising from the circumstances of the case. No general rules can be given upon this point; but a number of decisions will be found cited in Dickson on Evidence, p. 183, et seq. The registration of deaths, as well as of births and marriages, is regulated by 17 and 18 Vict., c. 80, which contains provisions for making registration compulsory. Deathbed, Law of. By the law of deathbed (which is peculiar to Scotland), the heir in heritage is entitled to reduce all voluntary deeds granted to his prejudice by his predecessor, within sixty days preceding the predecessor's death; provided the maker of the deed, at its date, was labouring under the disease of which he died, and did not subsequently go to kirk or market unsupported. Such deeds, granted in lecto, as it is called, are contradistinguished from deeds granted by a person in what is termed liege poustie, (legitima potestate); that is, where the grantor is legally presumed to have been of a sound and disposing mind. But deathbed deeds, although challengeable by the heir, are effectual, unless challenged by way of reduction, and are not null ope exceptionis. The law of deathbed, which is part of our ancient common law, is of uncertain origin; but some interesting speculations concerning the principle on which it is supposed to rest, will be found in the following authorities:—Reg. Majestatem, tit. ii. c. 18, §§ 7 and 9; Craig de Feudis, lib.

i. dieg. 12, § 36; lib. ii. dieg. 1, § 28; Dirlotson's Doubts, voce Legitima Liberorum; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 28; More's Notes, cccxiii. et seq., and B. iv. tit. 20, § 41; Mackenzie's Inst. B. iii. tit. 8; Bank. B. iii. tit. 4, § 32; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 95, et seq.; 1696, c. 4; A. S. 29th Feb. 1692. The leading rules of the doctrine, as now settled, may be thus arranged:—

1. Nature of the disease. It is not sufficient to invalidate the deed, that death has happened within sixty days after its date, if the granter was then in good health, although he may have afterwards died from accident or supervening disease. Neither is it sufficient that, at the date of the deed, the granter was ill of one disease, if he died of a different disease (see Mackay v. Davidson, 17th Jan. 1828, 6 S. 368, affirmed on appeal, 1831); provided the latter disease was completely distinct from, and not a manifest sequel of, that under which he was labouring at the date of the deed, or so connected with it as to have been accelerated or increased by it. If, however, the disease existing at the date of the deed has been clearly the immediate or ultimate cause of death, its character is immaterial. Thus, it is of no consequence whether it have been slow or acute, constant or recurring, local or general; and even, extreme old age alone, if attended with appearances obviously indicating the approach of death, is sufficient. Nor is it necessary that the disease shall have confined the party to bed or to the house, and still less, that it shall have affected his judgment, or incapacitated him for managing his affairs, the meaning of the law being to exclude such investigations by a general presumption of incapacity.

2. Exception of kirk or market. The deed will not be reducible ex capite lecti, if it can be proved that after the date of the deed the granter appeared publicly at kirk or market; it being absolutely presumed, that if he was able to do so, he was not in such a state of weakness as to fall within the reason of the law. And as, on the one hand, this exception of kirk or market is admitted (although Erskine seems to state a contrary doctrine, B. iii. tit. 8, § 96), whatever may have been the state of health at the time; so, on the other hand, the want of this act cannot be supplied by proof of capability to execute the deed. It is declared, by Act of Sederunt, 29th Feb. 1692, that in order to be effectual, the act of going to kirk or market must be performed “in the day-time, and when people are gathered together in the church or churchyard for any public meeting, civil or ecclesiastic;” or, “in the market-place for public market;” and that no instrument taken on the fact shall bear faith, unless it expressly set forth “that it was taken in the audience and view of the people gathered together as aforesaid.” This public appearance, besides, must be proved satisfactorily to have been such as to indicate a certain degree of bodily ability; for the person must have gone to church or market, and returned unsupported. But the circumstance of his having been on horseback is not regarded as support, unless he has been helped on and off. If he have continued in the kirk or market long enough to afford evidence of his having been there, it is unnecessary that he shall have continued for any definite time, or that he shall have transacted business in the market. Neither is it required that he shall have exhibited the appearance of recovery, the act not being legally regarded as symptomatic of re-convalescence, but as affording an insuperable presumption of capability to execute the deed. On this point the following cases may be consulted:—Faichney, 9th July 1776, Mor. App. Deathbed, No. 1; Maitland, 16th May 1815, Fac. Coll.; Rait, 27th Nov. 1818, Fac. Coll., and other authorities infra cit.

3. Period of sixty days. If the granter survive for sixty days after the date of the deed, that alone, by stat. 1696, c. 4, “shall be a sufficient exception to exclude the reason of deathbed.” In computing this period, the day of signing the deed is not reckoned; but it is sufficient, on the other hand, that the granter has survived until the running of any part of the sixtieth day. See Computation of Time. If the deed have been ante-dated to provide against the objection of deathbed, it seems to be subject to reduction, whatever may have been its true date; Merry v. Howe, 6th Feb. 1801, Mor. App. voce Writ, No. 3; affirmed in the House of Lords. Holograph deeds not tested do not prove their dates in questions under the law of deathbed. See Holograph Deeds. Some authorities mention the cases of deeds granted by persons under sentence of death, and by persons who have fallen in duels within the sixty days, as subject to this law, but without any good reason, so far as regards the latter class of deeds; and with regard to the former, they may be reducible, but obviously not on the head of deathbed. See Bank. B. iii. tit. 4, § 33; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 87, et seq. 5th edit.

4. Deeds affected by this law. These are in general all deeds to the heir's prejudice, and all deeds done in consequence of them; such, for example, as a sale by trustees under a deathbed settlement. Generally speaking, the deeds struck at by the law of deathbed, are settlements and alienations, onerous or gratuitous, in property, or in security, or subjects heritable ex sua natura, or by destination; conveyances for a tract of years of the profits of such subjects; leases of extraordinary duration, or for unusually low rents, or for grassums; but leases for adequate rents, and in the ordinary course of management, are not reducible, although granted in lecto; Sample, 1st June 1813, Fac. Coll. Alienations of heirship moveables made in lecto are also under the law; likewise gratuitous discharges or renunciations of heritable rights or claims; gratuitous bonds or obligations to the prejudice of the heir, whether taken payable by the heir in heritage, or by heirs in general, if the granter's moveable funds are insufficient to discharge them; gratuitous bonds of corroboration of prior debts creating an obligation on the heir, in which he would not have been otherwise liable, and legacies and bequests made a burden on him; voluntary provisions to his prejudice in favour of wives or children; and generally, all such alterations in the nature of the subject as prejudice the heir's interest. If the effect of the deed be injurious to the heir, it is of no consequence whether it has been granted by the deceased, or to him, in a form dictated by himself, or whether the subjects were vested in the deceased, or in a trustee for his behoof, and who has acted in obedience to his directions given in lecto. Even a deathbed alteration of a previous nomination of curators is reducible. Crawford, Feb. 1751; Mor. 3230. On the other hand, it is necessary that the deed be strictly of a voluntary kind, and such as the party could not have been compelled to grant. Thus a disposition executed on deathbed, in implement of missives executed in liege poustie, is not struck at; because, even had no disposition been granted by the ancestor, the heir would have been bound, as his representative, to implement any liege poustie obligation incumbent on his ancestor.

5. Tiile to pursue. "The right of reduction ex capite lecti is introduced in favour of that heir who was alioqui successurus, in the subject alienated by the deathbed deed." Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 100; provided always that the heir has done nothing to ratify or homologate the deed. Such homologation, however, will not be inferred from his having previously accepted a provision of other property from his ancestor, as in full. The privilege of reducing a deathbed deed may be exercised by an apparent heir; and it is not limited to the immediate apparent heir at the time of the granter's death, if that heir die without ratifying or homologating the deathbed deed, and if the deed be to the prejudice of the next heir also. That next heir's right, however, is excluded by the prior heir's liege poustie ratification or homologation; if the prior heir be legally capable to ratify or homologate, and that even although the deed should have been to the prejudice of the remoter heir only, and not to that of the heir homologating. The privilege is also competent to the creditors of the heir possessing it, who may, according to Erskine (B. iii. tit. 8, § 100), exercise it without any previous adjudication of the faculty to reduce, if the heir himself have not homologated the deathbed deed. The privilege of reducing ex capite lecti is also competent to the Crown as ultimus hæres, or to the Crown's donator; Brock, 2d Feb. 1809, Fac. Coll. Wives and children have the privilege of setting aside deathbed settlements of moveables, in so far as such deeds affect their legal provisions of jus relictæ and legitimæ; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 16. See Legitimæ Jus Relictæ.

It is incumbent on the pursuer of a reduction ex capite lecti to show that the prejudice to him arises from the particular deed sought to be reduced, and that such prejudice would be removed by the reduction, otherwise he has no interest to challenge it. On this subject, it is sufficiently plain that no mere disponent (not being heir alioqui successurus) under a deed executed in liege poustie, has a right to challenge a deathbed exercise of a faculty of revocation, contained in the disposition. But questions of more difficulty have occurred regarding the effect of deathbed revocations, of prior liege poustie deeds to the heir's prejudice, when the deeds containing such revocations also exclude the heir. In cases of this kind one difficulty is founded on the doctrine of approve and reprobate, it having been at one time thought that the heir could not challenge the deathbed deed, in so far as it was to his prejudice, while, at the same time, he took the benefit of the revocation contained in it. Another difficulty arose from the supposed want of interest in the heir, to reduce the deathbed deed, since by doing so he would revive the prior liege poustie deed which excluded him. The result of a good deal of discussion on this subject, both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords, seems to be, that the heir is entitled to take the benefit of the deathbed deed, in so far as it revokes prior deeds, while he may reduce it in so far as it is to his prejudice; and this even where it appears to have been the granter's meaning, that if the deathbed deed should prove ineffectual, the liege poustie deed should revive. The following cases may be consulted:—M'Kean, 16th Jan. 1740, Mor. p. 3277; Rowan, 22d Nov. 1775, Mor. p. 11371; Finlay, 29th July 1779, Mor. p. 3188; Crawford v. Coutts, 17th Nov. 1795, and 3d Feb. 1801, Mor. p. 14958; and App. Deathbed, No. 3; Signet Cases, p. 207, reversed in the House of Lords, 14th March 1806; Lockhart Muir, 1st June 1813, Fac. Coll.; Batley, 2d Feb. 1815, Fac.

Coll. ; Duke of Roxburghe, 13th Dec. 1816, Fac. Coll. ; Moir, 2d March 1820, Fac. Coll. ; S. vol. xi. p. 612 ; xii. 569. See 1 Ross, L. C. 594, et seq. With regard to the various devices by which it has been attempted to elide the law of deathbed,—as, for example, by reserved powers to dispoise, etiam in articulo mortis ; by trust-deeds, with directions to the trustees, given in lecto ; by dispensations with the law in Crown charters, and similar expedients fraudem legi facere,—it may be observed in general, that all such devices have proved unavailing. This salutary provision of the law cannot be evaded either directly or per ambages ; for it has been justly held that one might as well think of reserving a power to dispoise after he shall have become non compos mentis, as attempt to secure to himself, during a mortal disease, a capacity which the law holds one in that extremity not to possess. See Fountainhall, vol. i. p. 479 ; vol. ii. p. 324, and Mor. p. 3254 ; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 29 ; Dirleton and Steuart, voce Reduction ex capite lecti, and Faculty to alter ; and Davidson, 17th Nov. 1687, Mor. p. 3255. Sometimes the heir himself has been prevailed upon to approve of a deed already executed by his ancestor, or, prospectively, to renounce his right to reduce any deed to be made by the ancestor even in lecto. In such cases the rule seems to be, that although the heir may be barred, personali exceptione, from challenging a particular deed which he has seen and approved of, yet no antecedent general renunciation of his right to reduce ex capite lecti will deprive him of that privilege ; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 99. See also Murray, 21st Jan. 1826, 4 S. 374. The title to pursue a reduction ex capite lecti is lost by the currency of the long negative prescription. The Scotch law of deathbed has been extolled by some of the highest authorities in the law of England, and ridiculed by others ; and certainly it presents this anomaly, that, while a dying man may dispose of his moveable property, so far as subject to his testamentary disposal, and however valuable, within the last hour of his life, he cannot prejudice his heir-at-law quoad his heritage, no matter how trifling its value may be, by any deed done in lecto agnitudinis. See Lord Chancellor Eldon's encomium on the Scotch law of deathbed, in Crawford v. Coutts, 2 Bligh's Reports in House of Lords, 660 ; and see, on the subject of this article generally, Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 27, et seq. ; B. iv. tit. 20, § 37, et seq. ; More's Notes, p. cccxiii. et seq. ; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 95, et seq. ; Bank. B. iii. tit. 4, § 32, et seq. ; Bell's Com. p. 1050, et seq., 6th edit. ; Bell's Princ. § 1182, 1786, et seq. ; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. i. p. 81, et seq. ; Kames' Equity, 282, 462.

Debating Societies. Debating societies or clubs, whose ostensible object was the reform of pretended political abuses, but which, in reality, aimed at the subversion of the existing form of government, had become so numerous in this country about the time of the French Revolution, and threatened consequences so alarming, that it became necessary to strengthen the common and the older statutory law, by several enactments for the suppression of those associations. By 36 Geo. III., c. 7 ; 37 Geo. III., c. 137 ; 39 Geo. III., c. 79, and 52 Geo. III., c. 104, the members of clubs or societies in which unlawful oaths are administered, or seditious engagements entered into, are punishable with transportation. The stat. 39 Geo. III., c. 79, contains the regulations under which a lawful society may be formed ; and persons entering into the combinations prohibited by that act, may be proceeded against, either summarily before one justice of the peace, or by indictment before the Court of Justiciary, and punished by fine or imprisonment. See Sedition.

De Bene Esse. In English law, to take or do any thing de bene esse, is to admit it as well done for the present, on the understanding, that when it comes to be more fully examined or tried, it shall stand or fall according to its own merits. Thus, in Chancery, upon motion to have one of the defendants in a cause examined as a witness, the Court, not then thoroughly examining the justice of it, or before answer, as we should say, will often order such a defendant to be examined de bene esse ; that is, his deposition will be taken, and allowed or suppressed, at the hearing of the cause, as the Court shall think fit ; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. The analogous Scotch law expression is, "Before answer," which see.

Debenture ; an instrument of the nature of a bond or bill to charge Government, &c. "The forging of custom-house debentures is felony." Tomlins' Dict.

Debitor Non Præsumitur Donare. A debtor is not presumed to make a gift to his creditor while his debt remains unextinguished. Thus, where a debtor gives money or goods, or grants a bond or an assignation to his creditor, without assigning any special reason for so doing, the legal presumption is, that he has done so in payment or extinction of his debt. This, however, is merely a præsumptio juris, which will yield to contrary proof, or to stronger presumptions the other way. Where, for example, the obligation expresses a special cause of granting, as where a bond bears to be for borrowed money, without mentioning the former debt, it will not be presumed to have been granted in extinction of that debt, but will constitute a new and separate obligation against the borrower. In like manner, bonds of provision by a father to a child, are, from the presumption of paternal affection, presumed to be granted, not in satisfaction of former bonds, but as an addition to the child's patrimony. Even this presumption, however, may be overcome by circumstances proving the father's intention to include the first bond in the last. Thus, a settlement on a daughter in a contract of marriage, is held to be granted in full of all former provisions in favour of the daughter, although it should not bear to be in satisfaction, &c., "because, provisions granted by fathers in marriage-contracts, are generally intended to comprehend the whole estate that is to be expected by the husband from the wife or her father in name of tocher." Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 93. But such provisions will not be presumed to be in extinction of any undetermined general claim, such as legitim or a clause of conquest, which is merely in hope. Dows, 24th June 1681, Mor. p. 11478; Gibson, 4th Feb. 1726, Mor. p. 11481, voce Presumption. See also Kippen's Trustees v. Kippen, 3d July 1856, 18 D. 1137.

Debitum Fundi; is a real debt or lien over land, which attaches to the land itself, into whose hands soever it may come. Such a burden is constituted either ex lege, or by paction. Thus, feu-duties, and arrears of feu-duties due to the superior, and the relief and non-entry duties before declarator, are, by law, real debts, or debita fundi, which the superior is entitled to make effectual, not only by a personal action against the vassal, but by an action of pointing of the ground. In the same way, an annualrenter, or a creditor by heritable bond, or under a reserved burden, whose right is feudally constituted, is, by paction, a real creditor; and such debts also are termed debita fundi, and may, in like manner, be made effectual by pointing of the ground. See Pointing of the Ground. All debita fundi, so long as they remain undischarged, are effectual against the land, preferably to the rights of the proprietor, and all deriving right from him. In competition amongst themselves, the superior, for his feu-duties and casualties, is ranked in the first place, his right being founded on the original grant to the vassal; and conventional debita fundi are preferable according to the dates of the registration of the infeftments, by which they are made real. See Burdens. Rents, tithes, the land-tax, the expense of repairing churches, mansees, &c., and similar burdens, although all claims connected with land, are not debita fundi. Stair, B. iv. tit. 35, § 24; More's Notes, p. clxxii.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 11; Bank. B. ii. tit. 5, § 18, et seq.; Bell's Com. p. 735, 786, 945, 6th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 699; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 392, et seq.; Shand's Prac. See Absolute Disposition.

Debts, Small. See Small Debt. Imprisonment.

Deceit. Any subtle trick or artifice, including all kinds of craft or collusion, used to defraud another, called in the Roman law, dolus malus. Deeds or obligations obtained by deceit are reducible on the head of fraud, at the instance of the party imposed upon, but not at the instance of the deceiver; for, in such a case, the maxim, "Deceptis non decipientibus jura subveniunt," is applicable. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 16; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 62, and B. i. tit. 7, § 80; Kames' Equity, 56. See also Fraud. Circumvention. Collusion.

Decern. To decern is to decree. Before the judgment or interlocutor of any court in Scotland can be extracted, to the effect of warranting execution, it must import a decree. Hence, all extractable judgments close with the word "decern." Barclay's M'Glash. Sheriff Court Prac. 297; Shand's Prac. pp. 347, 594, note. See Extract. Interim-decree. Decree.

Decimæ Rectoriæ; parsonage tithes; i.e., the tithes formerly payable to the parsons of parishes, and which are due from all species of grain produced by culture. See Teinds.

Decimæ Garbales; teind-sheaves; i.e., the tenth sheaf of the cut corn which the rector of the parish had a right to draw, or lead off from the ground. See Teinds.

Decimæ Vicariæ; vicarage tithes; i.e., the tithes formerly payable to the vicars of parishes, which are due only according to use and wont, from such articles as wool, grass, flax, hemp, fish, eggs, &c. See Teinds.

Decimæ Inclusæ; teinds which have never been separated from the stock, and which are not demandable by the titular or minister. Stair, B. iv. tit. 24, § 8; More's Notes, p. cccxxix.; Bell's Princ. § 1149; Connell on Tithes; Ersk. Inst. iii. 10, §§ 10-13. See Teinds.

Decimæ Debentur Parocho. The meaning of this maxim is, that teinds belong to the minister of the parish, where the subject from which they arise was produced; and that, consequently, he cannot be deprived of them by any species of alienation; which is to have a permanent effect to his prejudice. More's Notes to Stair, p. ccxli.; Connell on Tithes. See Teinds.

Decisions. The decision of a court is the judgment pronounced in a cause depending before it; but, in Scotland, the term Decisions is usually applied to the printed reports of cases decided in the Court of Session. It has been said, that a uniform tract of decisions of that Court is to be held as law; Mackenzie's Inst. B. i. tit. 1, § 10. But even Mackenzie admits that the judges are not absolutely bound to receive the judgments of their predecessors as law ; and all that can safely be said seems to be, that, although those decisions are not to be held as equal in authority to our customary or unwritten law, yet they serve to explain the law, and to ascertain ancient usages ; and a series of them, uniform upon the same point, is held to have the force of law, more especially where the practice or the conveyancing of the country has been regulated by such precedents. In such cases, two or more solemn and consecutive decisions of the Court of Session, not altered by the House of Lords, appear to be held as absolutely fixing the law. Where, again, there is not the same uniformity in the course of decisions, or where the precedent has fixed no rule on which the country has acted, a greater latitude will be taken, agreeably to the maxim, Non exemplis sed legibus judicandum ; Stair, B. i. tit. 1 ; § 16 ; Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 47 ; Bank. B. i. tit. 1, § 74. It appears that in England the decisions of courts of law are of greater authority ; that they are the evidence of what is common law ; and that, in order to give permanence and consistency to the law, it is an established rule to abide by precedents, unless the former determination be evidently contrary to reason ; Blackstone's Introd., § 3, vol. i. p. 69, et seq.

Declaration ; in the law of England, a legal specification, on record, of the cause of action, by a plaintiff against a defendant ; Tomlin's Dict. h. t. ; Wharton's Lex. h. t.

Declaration. In criminal proceedings the account which a prisoner, who has been apprehended on suspicion of having committed a crime, gives of himself on his examination, is taken down in writing, and called a declaration. It is the duty of the magistrate to take the declaration immediately on the prisoner being brought before him ; but, before doing so, he must ascertain that the prisoner is in a fit state of mind to undergo an examination ; that he is not intoxicated nor disordered in his intellect, nor under the influence of promises or threats. A declaration runs every chance of being cast, if the prisoner was induced by the magistrate to emit it, when he would otherwise not have done so, though neither promises nor threats were used ; Wilson's case, noted in Hume, ii. 331. The magistrate's proper duty is distinctly to inform the prisoner not only that it is optional for him to make a declaration or not as he pleases, but also that what he says may be afterwards used against him on his trial. After those preliminaries, without attending to which the declaration will be of no value, the examination will be proceeded with in the presence of the magistrate. It is in practice generally conducted by the fiscal, who knows the particulars of the case more fully than the magistrate ; but the latter must of course see that the questions are confined to the particular charge, and are made intelligible to the accused ; and so a declaration, not emitted, but only adhered to, before the magistrate, is inadmissible evidence. The declaration must be taken down at large in writing, as given by the prisoner. It ought to be written by a neutral person appointed by the magistrate for the purpose, and not by a clerk or apprentice of the party conducting the prosecution. It ought to contain the name, designation, and age of the declarant ; and the parish and county in which the crime is said to have been committed should be distinctly and carefully specified. The declaration itself should be written on a sheet or sheets of paper distinct from the rest of the precognition ; and after it is written out it must be read over to the declarant, who, along with the magistrate, must sign every page of it ; or, if the declarant cannot or will not write, the magistrate signs the declaration in his stead. All this ought to take place in the presence of two or more creditable witnesses who have heard and seen the whole examination, and who must sign each sheet as witnesses, not to the subscriptions merely of the prisoner and the magistrate, but in order that, if necessary on the trial, they may be able to authenticate the declaration, and bear testimony to what passed on the occasion. A formal testing clause with the writer's name is not required ; but the declaration ought to conclude with a docket, mentioning the names and designations of the magistrate and witnesses, the number of pages, and any alterations by way of marginal addition, deletion, erasure, or otherwise. If the prisoner does not understand English, the use of a sworn interpreter is necessary, and the witnesses must also understand the foreign language, because they must know all that is taking place. It frequently happens that more than one declaration is emitted by the prisoner. This is quite competent ; and such declarations may be taken even after commitment for trial, but not after the libel has been served. Care, however, should be taken that all the prisoner's previous declarations are read over to him before another is taken ; and the previous declarations ought to be referred to in the last declaration. All the declarations must be preserved. The declaration will not be allowed to be produced on the trial, if the magistrate have delegated the taking of it to the clerk or to any one else not a magistrate.

With regard to the use to be made of the declaration on the trial, it is settled, that although a confession made by the prisoner out of the presence of the jury is not of itself a sufficient ground of conviction, yet it does not follow that a solemn and deliberate acknowledgment of guilt, proved to have been made before a magistrate, is to have no effect when corroborated by the other evidence adduced; and, accordingly, the panel's declaration is now invariably received as an article of evidence on his trial, although it will have no effect as evidence against any other person whom the declarant may have named as participating in his guilt. Further, the prosecutor can, as he chooses, put in the declaration or not at the trial, while the declarant cannot call for it; Kennedy, 1 Broun's Rep. 497. But if one of several declarations is laid before the jury, all the others must, if the panel wishes it, be produced also. Hume, vol. ii. p. 324, et seq.; Burnett, Cr. Law, 488; Alison's Prac. 557; Bell's Notes to Hume, 239; Dickson on Evidence, p. 711. See Criminal Prosecution. Confession.

Declaration, Dying. The law of Scotland properly rejects hearsay evidence, i.e., the testimony of a witness to that which he has heard from another. But to this rule there is a general exception in cases where the person whose statement is narrated was admissible when he spoke, but died before the trial; Bell's Princ. p. 2259. Such evidence is especially necessary to secure the ends of justice in criminal cases, where a party has died from the result of injuries made the subject of trial. Thus, in cases of murder, the dying declaration of the sufferer as to the circumstances of the mortal injury, is always admitted as evidence on the trial of the person charged with the murder, provided the declaration has been deliberately emitted while the deceased was in the possession of his faculties, and that it is proved by creditable witnesses. Where the declaration has not been committed to writing, its import may be proved by parole evidence; but much more weight will be given to it where it has been written down at the time it was made, in the presence of those who heard it, and who can swear to the circumstances under which it was emitted. In committing such declarations to writing, it is not necessary to observe the same formalities which are required in the authentication of the declaration of a prisoner. On the contrary, it is enough that the dying declaration be proved to have been freely given and fairly taken down in the presence of the witnesses, and that the witnesses can identify the writing produced on the trial as that which was drawn up on the occasion. Evidence of this kind may be adduced for as well as against the accused; and there are several instances on record in which the dying declarations of persons who have met their death by accident, have been successfully used to exculpate from a charge of murder. Hume, ii. 406, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 515; Bell's Notes, 291; Dickson on Evidence, p. 66. See Hearsay.

Declaration, Judicial. In civil causes, both in the Court of Session and in the inferior courts, it sometimes happens, that where the statements of the parties in point of fact are at variance, the judge ordains one or other of them to be judicially examined as to the particular facts on which the case rests. This form of proceeding is not confined to any particular class of cases, but may be resorted to wherever the circumstances are such, in the opinion of the judge, as to render that mode of investigation expedient. It is a matter solely within the discretion of the judge; and is only resorted to when he has solid ground for suspicion of the undue concealment of material facts within the knowledge of the party. A party failing to appear may be held as confessed; but no one is forced to undergo a judicial examination in any matter on which he may be criminally prosecuted. A declaration made in this way can never be regarded as any thing more than the deliberate declaration of the party making it. It is not given upon oath; nor is it exclusive of other proof; and it is in the power of the opposite party to rebut the statement of the declarant, if he can, by legal evidence. The examination in the ordinary case is taken down in writing by the clerk of Court as commissioner, the judge not being present. In practice, the interrogatories are usually put by the counsel or agent for the adverse party. Judicial examinations are regarded unfavourably by the Court; and are now of less consequence than formerly, since the enactments under which a party to a cause may now, in general, be examined as a witness. Dickson on Evid. 705. See Calumny, Oath of.

Declaration. In English judicial proceedings, the declaration is a legal specification, on record, of the cause of action by a plaintiff against a defendant. Tomlins' Dict.

Declarator; a declaratory action. This is a form of action by which some right of property, or of servitude, or of status, or some inferior right or interest, is sought to be judicially declared. Such are—declarators of property, where the property of one person is illegally in the possession of another,—of trust and denuding, where a trustee holds property by titles ex facie absolute, and illegally refuses to divest himself in favour of the real proprietor (see Trust),—of contravention under an irritancy in an entail,—of irritancy ob non solum canonem,—of non-entry,—of tinsel of superiority,—of servitude,—of expiry of the legal,—of marriage,—of bastardy, and many others. Declaratory conclusions are generally, though not necessarily, followed up by petitory or possessory ones, to give effect to the right declared. Declarators of property of heritable subjects, by persons in petitorio, are now rare; an action of reduction-improbation being in that case a more effectual method of attaining the object. But it frequently happens that a person in possession, who is doubtful of his right, has it ascertained by a declaratory action; and such an action may be brought, although there be no one disputing the right, and even although no immediate interest to challenge it has emerged. In order, however, to entitle a party to bring an action of declarator, he must show that he has a substantial interest to insist in the declaratory conclusions, and that it is an interest of which the Court of Session can competently judge. It is not competent to ask the Court to declare a fact or a right in the abstract, without pointing out the consequent right to the party who concludes for such declarator; Gifford, 8th July 1829, 7 S. 854; Lyle, 17th Nov. 1830, 9 S. 22. Under the class of declaratory actions may be comprehended such rescissory actions as merely conclude that the deed or right libelled may be declared null, without any conclusion against the defender himself. Decrees upon actions properly declaratory confer no new right, but only declare that a right exists in the pursuer; and, consequently, such decrees have a retrospective operation to the period at which the right commenced. Declaratory actions, properly so called, are not competent except in the Court of Session. But it is competent for a party to ask an inferior court to pronounce declaratory findings, leading to the conclusions in law deduced in the summons; for declaratory findings do not necessarily infer a declaratory summons, so as to render the action incompetent in an inferior court; Hall, 19th May 1831, 9 S. 612. It would appear that a declarator of servitude, or immunity from servitude, is competent before the Sheriff under 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 15; and an action equivalent to a declarator of irritancy ob non solum canonem, under 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 32. Declaratory actions, although they form a great and valuable class of actions in the law of Scotland, are unknown in the English practice. Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 47; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 19; B. iv. tit. 1, § 46; Bank, B. iv. tit. 24, § 21; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 751, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. §§ 706, 735, 830, 905; Jurid. Styles, iii. p. 135, et seq.; M'Glashan's Sher. Court Prac. 16–18, 175. See Marriage. Commissaries. Irritancy.

Declaratory Adjudication. See Adjudication, Declaratory.

Declinature; is the term applied to the privilege which a party has, in certain circumstances, to decline judicially the jurisdiction of the judge before whom he is cited. A judge may be declined,—1st, On account of incompetency to decide the particular action brought before him. Thus, a sheriff may be declined in an action of declarator of property in heritage, such an action being competent only in the Court of Session. 2d, A judge may be declined where the party is exempted by special privilege from his jurisdiction. Thus, members of the College of Justice formerly might decline the jurisdiction of all courts inferior to the Court of Session; but this privilege was abolished as to small debt courts by 6 Geo. IV., c. 48, § 24, and 1 Vict., c. 41, § 35; and as to sheriff courts generally, by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 48. It may be observed, however, that there is a distinction between the former and the latter ground of declinature. In the former case, where the judge is incompetent to decide, his proceedings are null, whether the party appears and pleads the declinature or not; whereas, if the declinature be founded on a special personal privilege, the privilege must be pleaded before it can operate. Thus, formerly, a decree of an inferior court, pronounced in absence, against a member of the College of Justice, would be effectual, the declinature not having been pleaded; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 24. A judge may also be declined ratione suspecti judicis,—1st, Where he bears capital enmity to one of the parties, such enmity being qualified and proved by facts and circumstances importing it; Bank, B. iv. tit. 2, § 37. 2d, Where either the judge or his near kinsman has an interest in the cause. But, although a judge who is a partner in a private trading company may be declined in a question where the interest of that company is concerned, yet, where the company is a public one, constituted either by patent or by act of Parliament, it is no ground of declinature that the judge is a proprietor, director, or shareholder; see A. S., 1st Feb. 1820; and Blair, 26th Feb. 1814, Fac. Coll. App. to vol. for 1814-15. In certain cases, indeed, even where the interest of the judge was more of a private nature, the Court repelled the declinature, on the special ground, that, if it were sustained, there would not be a quorum of the judges left to decide the cause. See A. S., 22d July 1774, and 22d Jan. 1789; Printed Acts, p. 644. 3d, The relationship of the judge to one or both of the parties is a ground of declinature. By the law of Scotland, no judge, supreme or inferior, can judge in the cause of his father, brother, or son, whether by consanguinity or affinity; nor in the cause of his uncle or nephew by consanguinity; 1594, c. 212, and 1681, c. 13.

Some authorities hold that this ground of declinature is removed, where the judge stands in the same degree of relationship to both parties (Stair, B. iv. tit. 39, § 14); but the statutes make no such exception; and were a case of that kind to occur, no doubt the statutes would be taken as the rule. See Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 26, and Bank, B. iv. tit. 2, § 38. It is no ground of declinature that the defender's wife is the sister of the judge's wife, the relation there being only affinitas affinitatis; Binny, Dec. 1687, Mor. p. 3420; Goldie, 16th Feb. 1816, Fac. Coll. and A. S., 16th Feb. 1816. But, in a competition of briefs as to the succession of an entailed estate, a declinature of one of the judges of the Court of Session was sustained in one of the Divisions of the Court, on the ground that the second son of one of the claimants had married the judge's daughter; Sir M. Shaw Stewart, 30th May 1820, Fac. Coll. In this case, however, as to which the whole judges were consulted, eight of the fifteen (which was at that time the number of the judges) were of opinion that there was no ground of declinature. But, according to the regulations then in force, the decision of the Division of the Court in which the case occurred, differed from that of the majority of the whole judges. See Session, Court of Consultation of Judges. It seems to be quite understood, that where there is ground for a declinature of this kind, it cannot be waived by consent of parties (see Sir M. Shaw Stewart's case, ut supra, note); and where ground for declinature of a judge has existed, the proceedings before him are null, though the objection be not taken at the time; Omanney, 13th Feb. 1851, 13 D. 678. A judge, it is said, may be declined, si foveat consimilem causam; that is, if the judge have a cause of his own, to be decided by the same rule which is applicable to the case brought before him; Bank, B. iv. tit. 2, § 37. With regard to the declinature of a deputy, in a cause where the principal judge is a party concerned, the rule appears to be, that the deputy may be declined as suspected, where the principal is a party (1555, c. 39); except in certain cases, in which the deputy is authorized to judge by special statute; 1579, c. 84. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. iv. tit. 39, § 14, et seq.; Mor's Notes to Stair, p. cccxxxvi.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 24, et seq.; Bank, B. iv. tit. 2, § 37, et seq.; Kames' Stat. Law Abridg. h. t.; Shand's Prac. 59, et seq. See Small Debts. College of Justice. Advocation.

Decree. A decree or decret is the final judgment or sentence of a court, whereby the question at issue between the parties is decided. Decrees are said to be either condemnator or absolutor: the former term being applied where the decision is in favour of the pursuer, the latter where it is in favour of the defender. The decree, of course, partakes of both characters, when the defender is absolved in part and condemned in part; Bank, B. iv. tit. 36, § 3. Decrees of the Court of Session are pronounced either by a Lord Ordinary, or by one or other of the Divisions of the Court; and a decree pronounced by a Lord Ordinary, if allowed to become final, is as effectual as one pronounced by either of the Divisions; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 5. See Appeal. Decrees are either in absence, or in foro contradictorio, as they are termed. A decree in absence is a decree pronounced against a defender who has not appeared, and pleaded on the merits of the cause. Such a decree may be opened up, or, if the decree has been extracted, the defender or his representative has the remedy of suspension or reduction, at any time within the period of the long prescription of forty years, unless the party entitled to reduce or suspend, or the person through whom he derives right, has deprived himself of his right of challenge by homologation, or is otherwise barred from insisting in the action. A decree in foro contradictorio or contentioso is a decree in a cause which has been litigated by both parties. Decrees in foro of the Court of Session operate as res judicata, and cannot be reduced or suspended, or submitted to review, reversed, or altered, unless by appeal to the House of Lords, except on the ground,—1st, That the decree is ultra petita; or, 2d, That it is disconform to its warrants; or, 3d, That it is founded on an error calculi; or, 4th, That the party against whom the decree is obtained has, after its date, recovered evidence sufficient to overturn it, of which he knew not before; Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 44, 50, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 3. See also Competent and Omitted. Questions have sometimes arisen, as to what sort of appearance for the defender in an action will be sufficient to render the decree pronounced a decree in foro; and it seems to have been settled,—1st, That the mere act of taking out a summons to see for the defender, and returning it without a defence, is not sufficient. 2d, That putting in a dilatory defence is not sufficient; Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 12; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 69; and Ibid. tit. 3, § 6; but now both dilatory and peremptory defences are stated above; Shand's Prac. p. 311. 3d, It is not even sufficient that an interlocutor refusing a short representation for the defender, has been allowed to become final, if the cause has never been argued on its merits; Young, 10th Feb. 1803, Mor. voce Process, p. 12178. See also Litis contestation. Res judicata. Decrees of inferior courts, whether in foro or not, have so little the character of res judicata, that a competent defence, although omitted through negligence in the inferior court, may be the ground, in the Court of Session, of reversing the inferior court decree; because it is said there is not presumed to be a copia peritorum in inferior courts, and parties are not to suffer from employing ignorant procurators in a court, where perhaps no better are to be had; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 7; Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 50. In the Court of Session, and also in inferior courts, after any judgment has been pronounced (prior to the judgment which, according to the forms of proceeding in the particular court, must be the final one), a certain time is generally allowed for submitting the judgment to the review, either of the judge by whom it was pronounced, or, if it be the judgment of a Lord Ordinary in the Court of Session, to the review of the Division of the Court to which he belongs; and, if such judgment be not submitted to review within the time allowed, it becomes the final judgment in the cause. In the Court of Session, the time allowed for this purpose is twenty-one natural days for interlocutors disposing, in whole or part, of the merits of the cause, and ten days for other interlocutors (13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 11); and, if the judgment be not reclaimed against within that period, or (if the days expire in the vacation) against the first box-day in the vacation, the judgment becomes a final judgment of the Court of Session. See Reclaiming Days. Reponing. When it becomes necessary to enforce implement of a decree, the proper and only regular warrant under which legal execution can be obtained, is an extract of the decree, authenticated according to the forms of the particular court in which the decree has been pronounced. The extracts of the decrees of the Court of Session formerly contained a minute detail of all the steps in the process from first to last, with the pleadings and various interlocutors engrossed verbatim; and although this cumbrous and expensive practice was reprobated by Lord Stair (B. iv. tit. 46, § 27), it was not until the 50 Geo. III., c. 112, that those long extracts were abolished, and certain abridged forms of extracts substituted, in which the object and conclusions of the action are shortly narrated, followed by the decree ordaining execution to follow in terms of the judgment of the Court. Those extracts were formerly authenticated by the subscription of one of the principal clerks of Session; but now, by 1 and 2 Geo. IV., c. 38, § 17, extracts of decrees are authenticated by the signature of the extractor by whom they are prepared. A final decree of the Court of Session was always extractable, but an interim decree formerly could not be extracted without a judicial warrant to extract it, which, however, was rendered unnecessary by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 28. Under 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, extract decrees now contain warrant to charge, arrest, poind, and imprison, upon which diligence may proceed as formerly on letters of horning and caption. See Caption; Tait on Evidence; Dickson on Evidence; Jurid. Styles, vol. iii. p. 233, et seq. See Diligence. Interim Decree. Execution. Signet Letters.

Decree of Registration; is a decree fictione juris of the Court of Session, or of any other competent court, interposed without the actual intervention of a judge, in virtue of the party's consent to decree going out against him in terms of his obligation. This consent is expressed in the clause of registration usually inserted in all formal deeds importing an obligation, and an extract of the deed from the Court books is tantamount to an extracted decree of the Court in the books of which it has been recorded. See Extract. By this expedient, the expense and delay of an action for constituting the obligation is avoided, and summary execution obtained at once. Such decrees have not the effect of decrees in foro, and they may therefore be brought under review of the Court of Session by suspension. It is upon the principle of the decree of registration that the benefit of summary execution has been extended in Scotland to bills of exchange and promissory notes; 1681, c. 20; 1696, c. 36; 12 Geo. III., c. 72; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 54, et seq., and B. iii. tit. 2, § 35; Bell's Princ. § 68. See this subject more fully explained, under the article Registration.

Decree; in English law, the judgment of a court of equity on any bill preferred. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Decree-Arbitral. See Arbitration.

Decree Cognitionis Causa. See Cognitionis Causa.

Decree-Dative; is the technical name given to the decree of the commissaries conferring on an executor (not being an executor-nominate) the office of executor. See Executor. Confirmation of Executor.

Decree of Modification; is a decree of the Teind Court modifying a stipend to the clergyman, but not allocating it upon the different heritors. See Teinds.

Decree of Locality; is a decree of the Teind Court allocating the modified stipend on the different heritors, in the proportions in which they are to pay it. See Teinds.

Decree of Valuation of Teinds; is a decree of the Teind Court, determining the extent and value of an heritor's teinds. For the rules according to which this is done, see Teinds.

Decree Conform. Decrees conform were decrees of the Court of Session, formerly in use to be issued, when diligence under the

Signet was required on the decrees or precepts of inferior courts. The Royal Signet in Scotland is under the control of the Court of Session; and all diligences, as they are termed, —that is, letters under the Signet authorizing execution, either against person or property,— must proceed on a warrant from the Court of Session, interposed either in the shape of a decree of that Court, or of a deliverance on a bill,—i.e., a petition to the Court praying for the letters. Sheriffs, and other inferior judges (the magistrates of royal burghs, and justices of the peace, or sheriffs under the small debt acts, excepted), have no power to grant execution against the person of the debtor: they can only authorize poinding and arrestment within their own jurisdictions. But the Court of Session has always been in the practice of interposing its authority in aid of the decrees of inferior judges; and this was formerly done upon a second summons against the debtor, citing him to appear in the Court of Session, and show cause why that Court should not authorize all legal execution to follow on the inferior court decree. The decree issued by the Court of Session in aid of the inferior court decree, was called a decree conform—i.e., a decree in the precise terms of the former decree, with the additional sanction of the Court of Session, which warranted all execution competent upon a decree of the Supreme Court. This practice yielded long ago to the shorter course, of bills presented to the Court of Session, through the Bill-Chamber, which pass of course, and the deliverance on which authorizes diligence under the Signet, on the same principle with the ancient decrees conform; Ross's Lect. vol. i. pp. 237 and 270. This practice has, in its turn, been practically superseded by the Personal Diligence Act 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114. Sheriff-court decrees now contain warrant to charge, arrest, poind, and imprison; and when the decree is to be executed in a different territory, a warrant of concurrence is obtained in the Bill-Chamber. See Caption; see also Bills of Signet Letters. Bill-Chamber. Diligence. Act of Warding. Small Debt Court.

It was also the practice, formerly, for the minister of a parish, whose predecessor had got a decree of locality for payment of his stipend, to obtain a decree conform from the Court of Session, in order to authorize execution at his own instance on the decree in favour of his predecessor. But by the Act of Sederunt, 22d June 1687, this practice was abolished; and it was provided, that the succeeding minister, upon presenting a bill at the Bill-Chamber, in the ordinary way, and producing his presentation, collation, and institution, with the decree of locality obtained by his predecessor, may have a warrant for letters of horning against those liable to pay the stipend. See Teinds. Locality.

Decretum et Decretalia. The body of the canon law consists, first, of the Decretum, which is a collection of the opinions of the fathers, popes, and church councils made by a Benedictine monk, towards the close of the twelfth century, in imitation of the Roman Pandects; and, secondly, of the Decretalia, which were collected by Pope Gregory IX., nearly a century afterwards, from the decretal rescripts or epistles of the popes; as Justinian's code was from the imperial constitutions; to which decretals new collections were made by succeeding popes. Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 28.

Deed Poll. In the law of England a deed poll, as contradistinguished from an indenture, is a unilateral deed, executed by a party whose consent or act alone is sufficient to complete the right or obligation, and testifying accordingly that the party has put his seal to the deed. The etymological derivation of the term is, that a deed poll is close cut, or shaved, as it is expressed; whereas an indenture is indented at the top. Tomlins, voce Deed; also, voce Poll. See Indenture.

Deeds. In law language, a deed is a formal written instrument, executed and authenticated according to certain technical forms, setting forth the terms of an agreement, contract, or obligation, whether in relation to persons or things, and comprehending every description of formal writing required for the voluntary constitution, transmission, or discharge of rights or obligations inter vivos or mortis causa, relating either to heritable or moveable property; with all the modifications, qualifications, and combinations of which such documents are susceptible, in order to fit them for the various and complicated transactions to which they may be applied. The particular deeds known in the law of Scotland will be more appropriately treated of under their respective heads; but there are certain essentials common to all deeds, to which it may be proper here shortly to advert. Thus, 1st, Every deed requires a party or parties capable of contracting obligation, and subject to no legal disqualification, either actual or presumed. See Consent. Idiot. Pupil. Minor. Marriage. Deathbed. Bankrupt. Con-junct and Confident. Fraud. Force and Fear. 2d, It is essential to a deed, whatever be its nature, that it contains a definite and distinct obligation or agreement, capable of explication, either judicially or otherwise; that the subject-matter of the deed be legally in the possession, or at the disposal of the party who contracts in regard to it; and that neither party be bound to do an act which is fraudulent, or contra bonos mores, or otherwise inconsistent with established law. See Pactum Illicitum. 3d, Every deed must be legally authenticated as the deed of the party or parties who become bound by it. The rules prescribed for the authentication of deeds are partly statutory and partly consuetudinary; and, in practice, those rules have been found exceedingly well adapted to the object in view. See Testing Clause. With regard to delivery, considered as essential to the validity of deeds, see Delivery. In Scotland we have not the technical distinction recognised in the law of England between deeds poll and deeds by indenture; the former being unilateral deeds, or deeds by one party, whose consent or act alone is sufficient, as is the case in our charters, dispositions, bonds for borrowed money, and the like; the latter being deeds in which two or more parties become bound to each other, as in the contract of lease or of copartnership. Neither is it necessary, in Scotland, that, in every case, a deed should be granted for a valuable consideration. If there be no fraud, or illegal preference in contemplation of bankruptcy, or if the maker of the deed be not otherwise incapacitated from granting it, the circumstance of its being gratuitous will have no effect on its validity. See Gratuitous Deed. Conjunct and Confident. Apparent Heir. Except in deeds relating to heritage, or by which an obligation is constituted, we have not in our deeds any settled and precise clauses of form. Wherever words are used sufficiently explicit to bind the party, and to confer a right known and acknowledged in law, the deed will constitute a valid obligation, effectual until set aside on legal grounds; the burden of reducing or setting aside an ex facie regular deed being laid on the party who calls it in question. And, in general, it may be observed, that all our deeds are appropriate and simple in their structure and phraseology, and comparatively free of the technicalities and redundancies, which are remarkable in the conveyancing of other countries. The clause of registration, which is introduced in all formal deeds importing obligation, is a valuable expedient, peculiar to the law of Scotland, for giving summary execution, without the expense or delay of a regular action. See Decree of Registration. The deeds of greatest nicety in our practice, and the construction of which have most frequently required the intervention of courts of law, are deeds containing destinations of heritable property, particularly contracts of marriage, family settlements, and deeds of entail. But even as to those the legal rules of interpretation are not complicated, nor, in the ordinary case, difficult of application, although the haste or negligence with which deeds of this kind are sometimes prepared, combined with the difficulties inseparable from every attempt to regulate prospectively the various conflicting interests which may emerge in the course of a destination, or which a marriage-contract or family settlement may create, naturally give rise to questions which can be solved only by judicial interposition. Holograph deeds—that is, where the whole deed is in the handwriting of the granter—are exempted from the rules with regard to the authentication of ordinary deeds. Thus, holograph deeds do not require to be executed before witnesses, although, without witnesses, they do not prove their own dates. See Holograph Deed. So also bills of exchange, and other documents or writings in re mercatoria, are, by the usage of trade (which, from favour to commerce, has to this extent become part of our common law), exempted from the statutory regulations as to authentication. See Bills of Exchange. Evidence. And even deeds possessing none of those privileges, and defective in the legal solemnities, or otherwise informal, may acquire all the efficacy of regular deeds by a rei interventus, or by homologation on the part of the person entitled to call them in question. Bell's Com. i. 323; Bell's Princ. § 18, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 128, 154, 168; Ross's Lect. i. 94, et seq. See Homologation. Rei Interventus.

Deemsters; are a kind of judges in the Isle of Man, who elect their successors, and who, without process, or any charge to the parties, decide all controversies in that island. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Deer. The hunting or killing of deer seems to be inter regalia, except as to those who have the deer within proper inclosures. But although one is not entitled to kill deer found trespassing upon his property, he may drive them off; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 68; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 14. The offence of breaking into a deer park, whether belonging to the Crown or to a private party, and shooting or stealing deer, is punishable as theft. The shooting of stray deer without the owner's consent seems to be punishable by fine, but not as theft. The statutes relating to offences of this description are, 1503, c. 69; 1535, c. 13; 1579, c. 84; 1587, c. 59; and 1607, c. 3. See also Hume, vol. i. p. 81; Bell's Princ. § 1290.

De Facto; signifies a thing actually done; that is, done in deed. It also signifies in fact. A king de facto, as contrasted with a king de jure, is a king in the actual possession of the crown, which of right belongs to the other. Tomlins, h. t.

Defamation; is the uttering of reports injurious to the good name and reputation of an individual, whether they affect his life, liberty, estate, character, trade, or profession; or are calculated or intended merely to render him ridiculous or contemptible. This offence may be the ground either of a criminal prosecution, or of a civil action for reparation, or of a combination of both. If a criminal prosecution be resorted to, the libel may conclude not only for punishment ad vindictam publicam, but also for damages to the private party. In the Court of Session, or in any other civil court, the conclusion is usually for reparation or damages to the private party only. Prosecutions for verbal injuries occur but rarely in the Court of Justiciary. The verbal injuries which seem to be properly cognisable before the Supreme Criminal Court are, — 1st, Defamation of magistrates or judges, such as charging them with neglect of duty, corruption, partiality, or oppression. 2d, Defamation in the shape of false and malicious prosecutions for crimes, or defamatory and calumnious information of crime, such as falsely and maliciously charging one with a crime of which he is not guilty. Lastly, The Court of Justiciary will take cognisance of the offence where the defamatory words are uttered in presence of the injured party, and accompanied with circumstances of outrage or violence likely to be productive of farther mischief; Hume, i. 333, et seq. The punishment for this offence is arbitrary, and generally consists of fine or imprisonment, according to the condition of the parties and the circumstances of the case. In the commissary court (now abolished), it was usual to conclude also for a palinode (see Palinode); and in a late case it was held that the sheriff, as coming in place of the commissary, under the statute 4 Geo. IV., c. 97, might competently entertain an action for slander, concluding, with concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, for damages, fine, and palinode; Turner, 21st June 1831, 9 S. 774. The animus injuriandi, which is the essence of this crime, must necessarily be matter of inference, and will, in the ordinary case, be presumed from the injurious words themselves; although that is a presumption which may be weakened or elided, by special circumstances indicating the absence of any deliberate intention to injure. But although the offender may be thus freed of the criminal charge, it does not necessarily follow that he is discharged of his obligation to repair the injury done to the private party; for, if what is said be injurious, mere petulance or indiscretion in uttering it, without positive malice, may be the ground for awarding damages; Hume, i. 340; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 80. The question of greatest difficulty, in prosecutions or actions on account of defamation, relates to the defender's right to prove, in bar of the action, the veritas convicii, or truth of the offensive words which he has uttered. In England, if the party defamed resort to a civil process for damages, the defendant may prove what he has said to be true, and if he succeed in doing so, the action falls; for, although damage may have been suffered, the law of England holds it to be a damage, for which no reparation can be claimed. If, on the other hand, the defamer be proceeded against by a criminal prosecution, it was formerly the law, that what he had said, being criminal in its nature, and calculated to create animosities, and to disturb the public peace, he was not entitled to prove its truth; Blackstone, B. iv. c. 11, p. 150, and B. iii. c. 8, p. 125. This, however, has been modified by 6 and 7 Vict., c. 96. In Scotland the veritas convicii, or even a probable ground of suspicion, is a justification, and may be pleaded as a defence in bar of the action, wherever the injury has been done by the defender in the discharge of a public duty, or in a bona fide endeavour to detect malversation or crime; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 31; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 80; Thomson, 16th May 1810, Fac. Coll. Where the words said to be injurious are uttered by a party in a process, and appear to have some foundation in fact, an intention to defame will not be presumed; for statements made in a court of law, however injurious they may be to another, if they be pertinent to the cause, and not imputable to malice against the party who is the object of them, are privileged, and found no action for defamation; Ersk. ib.; Forteach, 18th Nov. 1819, Fac. Coll.; Davidson, 12th May 1821, 1 S. and D. 7. At one time, it appears to have been thought that a party not in a privileged position was not entitled to plead the veritas convicii in bar of an action for reparation. But it is now settled, that an issue in justification on this ground is competent. See Taylor v. Anderson, Mar. 19, 1844, 6 D. 1026; M'Neill v. Robison, Nov. 12, 1847, 10 D. 15; and M'Rostie v. Ironside, Nov. 14, 1849, 12 D. 75. By the Jury Court Act, 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 1, actions of defamation were specially included in the list of actions which were to be remitted de plano to the Jury Court; and under the Judicature Act, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 28, actions on account of libel or defamation are enumerated as appropriate for jury trial. Macfarland's Practice, pp. 18, 23, 70. See Injuries. Scandalum Magnatum. Leasing-making. Veritas Convicii.

Default; is an English law term, commonly taken for non-appearance in Court at a day assigned; though it extends to any omission of that which we ought to do. If a plaintiff makes default in appearance in a trial at law, he will be non-suited; and where a defendant makes default, judgment will be had against him by default. In judicial procedure in Scotland, similar consequences result from failure in compliance with the rules or orders of Court. Thus in the Court of Session, where a party fails to lodge papers against the day appointed, or where he improperly refuses to close the record, judgment may in general be pronounced against him. In these and similar cases the party may be reponed against the judgment by default, on presenting a reclaiming note, with the requisite paper, or stating his readiness to comply with the order. But this indulgence is not granted except on payment of such expenses as may be thought reasonable; and in the particular case of failure to lodge Cases, where they have been ordered, the party cannot be reponed but on payment of the whole previous expenses. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See A. S. 11th July 1828, §§ 57, 60, 62, 112. Shand's Prac. 961. See also Decree. Absence. Reponing. Reclaiming Note.

Defences. The term Defences is a general name given to the pleas offered for the defender, in order to elide or exclude the action, and comprehending all exceptions, objections, or allegations of whatever kind, which may be stated against the conclusions of the libel. Those pleas are generally all stated in the first paper which is put into process on the part of the defender; and in the judicial procedure in all ordinary actions, that paper is called the Defences. Defences are either dilatory or peremptory. Dilatory defences are those which have the effect of absolving the defender without cutting off the pursuer's right to bring a new action: such are all objections to the competency of the action as laid, or to the title of the pursuer, or to the formality of the execution of the summons, &c. Peremptory defences, on the other hand, are positive allegations which enter into the merits of the cause itself, and have the effect either of taking away the ground of action, or of extinguishing its effects. Such are the exceptions of payment,—of compensation,—of homologation or rei interventus,—of res judicata,—of lis alibi pendens,—of prescription,—of fraud, force or fear. These, and all similar defences, if established, not only absolve the defender from the action as laid, but totally extinguish the pursuer's right of action on that claim. It may be observed, however, that the exception of fraud, or force and fear, is not relevant against all actions; for, if the pursuer's title be a right to land, or other heritable right, which is alleged to have been fraudulently obtained, it is not competent to plead fraud by way of exception, but only by reduction, unless where the deed is ex facie incomplete. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 21. Correctly speaking, no defence ought to get the name of an exception which does not expressly, or by implication, admit the relevancy of the libel and the justice of the conclusion, if it were not elided by the exception pleaded. All other pleas, such as incompetency, irrelevancy, want of title, and the like, ought properly to be called allegations, objections, or answers; but, in the judicial proceedings in our Courts, this is a distinction not much attended to; although, with a view to accuracy and precision in pleading, it seems deserving of attention; see Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 15; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 68, et seq. See Decree. Stair classes declinatures among dilatory defences; but it is observed by Erskine, that a declinature is not a defence at all, but, on the contrary, an express refusal to state defences; Stair, B. iv. tit. 39, § 44; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 67. See Declinature. The time within which defences must be lodged, according to the regulations of the Court of Session, is mentioned, voce Calling of a Summons; and in the defences, the defender, according to the directions of the judicature and Court of Session acts, must state, in explicit terms, every defence, both dilatory and peremptory, on which he means to rely. In particular, he must meet the statement of facts, and the conclusions deduced from them in the summons, by either denying or admitting the alleged facts in articulate answers to the condescendence, by setting forth, in explicit terms, the facts on which he founds his defence in an articulate statement of facts, and by subjoining a note of pleas in law, and producing the writings, if any, founded on, so far as in his custody or within his power. If the defences are improperly prepared, they may be ordered to be amended; the defender being subjected in the expenses thence resulting. Admissions made in defences will not be easily allowed to be retracted; and where falsehood or forgery is alleged in defence, exceptio falsi est omnium ultima; so that if the defender propone improbation, and fail in this defence, he cannot make any other objection against the writing,—e.g., that it was extorted, or the like. This rule, however, applies only where forgery is pleaded as a defence, or reply; for, when brought forward in the form of an action of reduction-improbation, the pursuer, though he fail, may plead other nullities. When a number of defenders are called in separate actions relating to the same matter, and where they have all precisely the same defences, one defence should be lodged, containing the defence which is applicable to the whole, and separate pro forma defences lodged for each defender; and where, after defences have been lodged, one of several pursuers withdraws, the defender is entitled to lodge additional defences applicable to the altered circumstances of the case. If there be dilatory defences, they must be disposed of before the record is closed, unless they require probation; and if the dilatory defences are sustained, the action will be dismissed, and the question of expenses decided. If the dilatory defences are repelled, it is not competent to pronounce any decision at that stage of the cause on the question of expenses, unless the defender announces his intention of reclaiming, in which case the Lord Ordinary will award expenses against him; and if, after such notice, the defender should not reclaim within the usual period (see Reclaiming Days), the decree for expenses, and for the expense of extract, will be allowed to go out and be extracted as an interim decree. On the other hand, if the defender reclaim, and if the Court adhere, such adherence now carries with it a finding of the additional expenses under the note; the clerks being authorized to insert a finding to this effect in the interlocutor adhering. Where the action is not dismissed on the dilatory defences, no appeal to the House of Lords against the judgment can be taken without the leave of the Court; but the effect of the defence is reserved in case of an appeal after a final decision on the merits; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 51. Dilatory defences in jury causes are disposed of in the same manner. When a dilatory defence has neither been repelled nor expressly reserved, but has been repeated in the pleas in law in the closed record on the merits, it is held as reserved. But it is for the interest of both parties, and particularly of the pursuer, to have all dilatory defences disposed of before incurring the expense of making up a record on the merits; which record, if the dilatory defence is ultimately sustained, may prove useless. Such dilatory defences, however, as require probation, may be reserved until the record is made up; and when there are no dilatory defences, or when they have been all repelled or otherwise disposed of, in practice, the record is either closed on the summons and defences, and decided in the usual way, or (which is by far the most frequent course) the record is made up by revised condescendence and revised defences, in the manner explained, voce Record. In the special case of actions of reduction (which are peculiar to the Court of Session), if the defender is to object to the title of the pursuer, or to plead on an exclusive title, or to state any other objection against satisfying the production, he must return defences confined to these points; but otherwise, no defences need be given in before the production is satisfied. It is competent, however, to the Lord Ordinary, on cause shown, and even although no defences should have been given in before satisfying the production, to reserve all objections to the title till the cause is heard on the merits. These defences against satisfying the production, are usually called preliminary, not dilatory defences; and if no such defences are lodged, it is held, that the production is to be satisfied, and that, if the defender is to make any defence at all, it is to be a defence on the merits of the reduction, after the production is satisfied. In such cases, accordingly, the practice is, in the first place, to get the production satisfied in the manner elsewhere explained, and then to take an order for defences against the reasons or summons of reduction, which defences may be both dilatory and peremptory; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 5, 27, 50; A. S. 11th July 1828. See Reduction. In the inferior courts, where the record is not closed on the Sheriff's minute, the regulations concerning defences are similar to those of the Supreme Court. See, on this subject, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120; A. S. 11th July 1828, A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, and A. S. 10th July 1839, as to inferior courts; also Shand's Prac. 287, 317, et seq.; M'Glashan, 198, et seq.; Barclay's Notes, p. 15, et seq.; and for the older regulations, see A. S. 11th Aug. 1787, 7th Feb. 1810, 11th Mar. 1814; Stair, B. iv. tit. 39 and 40; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 66, et seq.; Bank. B. iv. tit. 25.

Procedure in the Court of Session is now regulated by the act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36., 1850, and in the Sheriff Courts, by the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, 1853. See also Record. Condescendence. Replies. Calling of a Summons. Defender.

In a criminal prosecution before the Court of Justiciary, when the panel, besides the general plea of not guilty, means to maintain some special defence, the statute 20 Geo. II., c. 43, No. 41, requires that, on the day before the trial, he shall lodge with the clerk of Court a written statement, signed by himself or his counsel, setting forth the facts he alleges, and the heads of the objections or defences he means to maintain. In practice, however, instead of lodging written defences, it is usual for the counsel for the panel, in the outset of the trial, orally to explain to the Court the course of defence which is to be followed. Were the panel or his counsel, in the hope of gaining some advantage, to withhold this explanation, and not to lodge written defences, the Court, or the public prosecutor, might insist for a written defence in terms of the statute, the departure from which is an indulgence to the panel. Hume, ii. 283. See Criminal Prosecution.

Defender; is the party against whom the conclusions of a process or action are directed.

Where a minor is called as a defender, his father, or, if the father be dead, the tutors or curators of the minor, must be cited along with him, otherwise any decree pronounced against him in the action will be reducible on that ground. See Curatory. Pupil. Tutor. In like manner, when a married woman is sued (where that is competent), her husband must be cited for his interest. See Marriage.

Where a pursuer is abroad, or a foreigner, his mandatory who conducts the action for him in this country is personally liable for the expenses of process, in case they may be awarded to the defender; O'Haggen, 31st July 1761, Mor. p. 4644. A different rule was at one time recognised in the case of the mandatory of a defender abroad, or a foreigner; Leigh, 19th Dec. 1792, Mor. 4645. Now, however, it is settled that the mandatory of a defender is, in this respect, in the same situation with the mandatory for a pursuer; Shand's Prac. 160, and cases there cited. If the defender die in the course of a process, the action must be transferred against his representatives. See Transference. No more than six defenders, with separate and distinct interests, can be sued in one and the same summons (Art. of Reg. 2d Nov. 1695, § 28); and the same rule applies in inferior courts; A. S. 12th Nov. 1825. See Summons. Mandatory. Foreigner. Forum competens. In a criminal prosecution, whether against a minor or a married woman, there is no occasion to call either the tutors or curators, or the husband (Hume, vol. ii. p. 162); and where such an action concludes for a fine, and is purely criminal, it falls by the death of the defender, and cannot be transferred against his representatives, even after litiscontestation; Gray, 18th Feb. 1773, Mor. p. 10361. But the civil claim for damages at the instance of the private party is transmitted to representatives, like an ordinary debt, whether the action has been raised before or after the death of the delinquent. See Damages. Delict.

Defender of the Faith; is a title peculiar to the King or Queen of England. It was first conferred by Pope Leo X. on Henry VIII. in 1521, as a reward for writing against Luther; and it has been used by the Kings of England ever since. Tomlins' Dict.

Defending Forcibly. Forcible defence, or resistance against the execution of personal diligence by horning and caption, is one of the equivalents to imprisonment, mentioned in the act 1696, c. 5, and also in 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, 1856, in specifying the requisites of notour bankruptcy. See Bankrupt. And by the said statute of Victoria, such resistance will entitle a creditor, to the requisite extent, to apply for mercantile sequestration of the estates of his debtor, provided the debtor fall within the description of persons against whom sequestration may be awarded. See Sequestration. The fact of forcible resistance can hardly be ambiguous; and the proper evidence of it is the attestation of the messenger and witnesses, contained in an execution or return. But a general proof will also be admitted. Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 172-6-7, 5th edit. See Imprisonment. Apprehending a Debtor.

De Fideli. The oath de fideli administratione is an oath taken by persons on entering on the duties of professions or offices of public trust. Thus, this oath is administered to the judges and other members of the College of Justice, including all practitioners before the Court of Session. The takers of the oath simply swear to be faithful in the discharge of the duties of the office. A breach of the oath de fideli does not amount to the crime of perjury. See Hume, vol. i. p. 371. See Oaths.

Deforcement; is an act of contempt of the law, consisting of a violent opposition and hindrance to an officer of the law in the execution of his official duty. The officer must be a lawful officer, either a messenger-at-arms, or other officer to whom the execution of the diligence, or other warrant or order, may be legally intrusted; and the resistance must be offered to him while engaged either in the formal execution of the official act, or after he has assumed the official character, and is in immediate preparation (in actu proximo) to enter on the formalities. The officer must notify who he is, and the purpose of his errand; and, if required, he must exhibit his warrant, although he need not part with it. A messenger-at-arms must also exhibit his blazon, and an inferior officer his baton or other badge of office; and, in the attempt to execute his duty, he must have been himself proceeding, in every other respect, in a lawful manner. The obstruction offered must relate to the duty in which the officer is engaged; and it must be such an act of violence as to create either an actual impediment, or to excite a well-grounded alarm for his personal safety. It must be an actual hindrance; for, if the officer proceed and accomplish his object, the offence will amount to no more than an attempt to deforce, or an assault. All parties concerned in the resistance, whether the party against whom the proceeding is directed, or others, are guilty of the deforcement; Hume, vol. i. p. 386, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 33, et seq. The statutes relating to the punishment of this offence are—1581, c. 118, which provides that those convicted be punished by escheat of moveables, the creditor being preferable for his debt, expenses, and damages; 1587, c. 84, which provides that persons guilty of deforcement be prosecuted, either civilly or criminally, at the option of the pursuer, and that their lives and goods be at the King's will; and 1592, c. 150, which makes deforcement an officer of the law, or molesting him to the effusion of his blood, punishable by forfeiture of moveables, one-half to the King, and the other to the pursuer. It does not appear, however, that, under these statutes, anything more than an arbitrary punishment has ever been inflicted. The ordinary punishment is fine or imprisonment, accompanied with damages to the private party. It might be inferred, from the words of the act 1592, c. 150, and from Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 34, that the deforcement must be accompanied with effusion of the officer's blood, before it can be the ground of a prosecution ad vindictam publicam; but, from a more recent authority, it appears that this is not necessary. See Hume, i. 394. The competent prosecutors for deforcement are either—1st, The Lord Advocate; or, 2d, The messenger-at-arms and the Lord Lyon, even without the concurrence of the party employer; or, 3d, The party employer. The competent court is either the Court of Justiciary or the Court of Session; and inferior courts may also protect their officers from injury in the execution of their duty; Hume, i. 399. The statutes referred to recognise the jurisdiction of the Court of Session in cases of deforcement; but, according to the present practice, when the action is brought in that Court, the conclusion is not for the statutory pains, but merely a civil action for payment of the debt, with interest, damages, and expenses; although, were an aggravated case to occur before the Court of Session, the Court might no doubt remit it to the Lord Advocate, with a view to his instituting proceedings ad vindictam publicam. Formerly, the employer of the officer who had been deforced could not be a witness, even in a prosecution by the public prosecutor, unless he discharged his interest in the escheat, and for the recovery of his debt; but all objections to the admissibility, as witnesses, of the employer, and of near relations of the party prosecuting, have been removed by the recent Evidence Amendment Acts. It would appear, that although the defender be assolvied in the criminal process, yet he may be pursued civilly, and the fact of the deforcement referred to his oath; Mackenzie, B. iv. tit. 2, § 39. See also Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 64. The deforcement or forcible resistance of revenue officers in the execution of their official duty, or such resistance offered to any of Her Majesty's naval or military forces, or to any other person or persons acting in aid of the revenue officers, is, in some cases, a capital crime, as to which there have been various statutes. By the statute 52

Geo. III., c. 143 (which appears to be still in force), it was provided that where a person has been killed in the execution of this duty, if any individual shall be charged on oath, before a justice of peace or other competent person, with having been concerned in the resistance which led to the death, Her Majesty's Council may issue an order on the person so charged, to surrender himself within sixty days; and if, after due publication of this order, in the manner pointed out by the act, he fail to do so, "he shall then be adjudged, decerned, and taken to be convicted of a capital crime, and shall suffer the pain of death and confiscation of moveables, as in the case of a person found guilty of a capital crime, and under sentence for the same; and it shall be lawful for the Court of Justiciary, or the Lords of Justiciary, in their circuits in Scotland, to award execution against such offender, in such manner as if he had been found guilty and condemned in the said Court of Justiciary, or Circuit Courts respectively;" 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 13, § 2. See also Hume, vol. i. p. 488, et seq. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 29, and B. iv. tit. 49; Mackenzie, B. iv. tit. 4, § 17; *Ersk. Defrauding of Creditors. Creditors may be defrauded by the funds of their debtor being concealed, or illegally diminished, or by their being conveyed to favourite creditors, to the prejudice of the rest, or by the undue increase of debts or claims against the debtor's estate. Wherever any of those objects has been fraudulently accomplished, redress may be had either at common law or under the bankrupt statutes. If debts be improperly increased, or if any other fraudulent device be fallen upon, either to conceal the debtor's funds, or to confer undue preferences (where the case does not fall within any of the statutes), the common law affords a remedy; the burden of proving the fraud being laid, in common law actions, on the person objecting to it. But besides an action for fraud at common law, the several bankrupt statutes have introduced certain legal frauds, or presumptions of fraud, which either have the effect of annulling entirely the transactions in which they occur, or which lay the onus probandi on the person favoured by the deed. Thus, the act 1621, c. 18, provides that all alienations granted after the contraction of debt in favour of a conjunct or confident person, without necessary cause or a just price, shall be null; the burden of proving an onerous cause being laid on the person founding on the deed. See Conjunct and Confident.

Another branch of this statute entitles a creditor, who has begun diligence against his debtor's person or estate, to reduce any voluntary security or payment subsequently made, in fraud of the begun diligence, unless there has been undue delay, or mora in the prosecution of the diligence. See Diligence. Mora. And the act 1696, c. 5, which was intended to guard against fraudulent alienations by bankrupts, to the prejudice of their creditors, provides that all voluntary alienations or other deeds (whether fraudulent or not), granted, either directly or indirectly, by a bankrupt, within sixty days of his bankruptcy, in favour of a creditor, either for his satisfaction or further security, in preference to other creditors, shall be void and null. See Bankrupt. Sequestration. Fraudulent Bankruptcy.

Defrauding the Revenue. Any fraudulent contrivance, by which the payment of a tax or duty imposed by Government is evaded, falls under the general description of a fraud against the revenue. The penalties inflicted upon persons guilty of such offences are regulated by the particular statute imposing the tax or duty. It does not fall within the plan of this work to attempt a summary of the numerous revenue statutes; but it may be observed—1st, That the laws upon this subject, and the forms under which they are administered, are, by the Treaty of Union, made the same in Scotland as in England, with certain unimportant exceptions specified in the treaty; 2d, That the question, whether a fraud has been committed, must, of course, depend upon the terms of the particular statute imposing the tax, and the circumstances under which an evasion has been attempted; and, 3d, That the Supreme Court in Scotland for the trial of offences against the revenue is now the Court of Session; the Court of Exchequer being now merged in the Court of Session. But particular statutes sometimes confer a subordinate jurisdiction on commissioners to be appointed under the statute; and the power of summary conviction is also vested by some of the statutes in justices of the peace, as to certain offences, particularly in the case of offences against the laws relating to the excise and customs. In such cases, the statute commonly prescribes rules, both as to the form of the prosecution and the evidence necessary for a conviction. See Smuggling. Excise. Revenue. Exchequer. Justice of the Peace. Quarter Sessions.

Defunct; a deceased person; see Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 21. See Confirmation.

Degradation; a term used in English law to signify an ecclesiastical censure, by which a clergyman is divested of his holy orders. There are two sorts of degrading by the canon law,—one summary, by word only; the other solemn, by stripping the party degraded of those ornaments and rights which are the ensigns of his order or degree. Analogous to the latter form of degradation is the degradation of a nobleman, or of a knight, at common law, when attainted of treason. A similar degradation may also be inflicted by act of Parliament. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Degrees of Kindred. Persons standing in certain degrees of relationship to each other cannot lawfully intermarry. Thus, that connection cannot be formed between parties nearer in degree to each other than cousins-german, whether by consanguinity or affinity. See Marriage. In like manner, a judge who stands in certain degrees of relationship to a party is disqualified to judge in his cause. See Declature. So also, under the bankrupt statutes, gratuitous alienations in favour of relations are, in certain circumstances, reducible. See Conjunct and Confident. As to degrees of kindred considered in relation to succession, see Succession. Heir. Executor. Consanguinity. Affinity.

Deism; is the opinion of those who acknowledge the existence of a God, without admitting the truths of Christianity. Any attempt to propagate this doctrine would be punishable as an offence against the established religion. See Atheism. Blasphemy. Religion.

Delay. See Mora.

Del Credere; is an Italian mercantile phrase, similar in import to the English term guarantee. It has been adopted in this country, and is used amongst merchants to express the obligation undertaken by a factor, broker, or mercantile agent, when he becomes bound, not only to transact sales, or other business for his constituent, but also to guarantee the solvency of the persons with whom he contracts. On account of this guarantee, a higher commission, called a del credere commission, is paid to the factor. The most ordinary examples of this obligation occur in cases of sales made by a factor or agent to whom goods have been consigned for sale. The usual commission paid to the factor for his trouble in effecting sales and remitting the money, or procuring bills for the price, is two-and-a-half per cent. on the price, and two-and-a-half per cent. more is generally paid as del credere commission, where the factor guarantees the solvency of the purchasers. The obligation thus undertaken by the factor is not a cautionary obligation, in the ordinary sense of that expression; for the factor is liable directly, and without the benefit of discussion. Neither is it properly a delegatio debiti; for, if the factor fail, the principal is entitled to recover from the purchaser. In cases of insolvency, the following seem to be the rules of ranking:—

1st, If the factor continue solvent, he is entitled to claim on the bankrupt estate of the buyer, or other person, whose solvency he has guaranteed, provided, however, that the principal do not himself rank on the buyer's estate for the same debt; 2d, If the agent or factor be insolvent, the principal may claim on the estate of the proper debtor, unless the proper debtor has already paid the price to the factor; and, 3d, If both the factor and the purchaser be insolvent, the principal may rank for the whole debt, both on the estate of the factor, who stands del credere, and on the estate of the purchaser; so, however, as not to draw more than twenty shillings in the pound on his whole debt; see Bell's Com. i. 377. See also Ranking. As to the cases in which payment to the factor discharges the purchaser, see Factor. See also Brodie's Supp. to Stair, p. 921, 941; Bell's Princ. §§ 222, 286; Bell's Illust. § 286.

Delectus Personæ; is the choice or selection, either express or presumed, of a particular individual, on account of some personal qualification. Thus, in the case of an agricultural lease of ordinary endurance, the landlord is presumed to have chosen his tenant with a special view to his personal qualifications; and although the delectus personæ does not now exclude the tenant's heirs, yet, without the landlord's consent, either express or implied, such a lease cannot be voluntarily assigned or sublet. But an express exclusion of assignees is required in order to prevent the creditors of the tenant from adjudging the lease. The delectus personæ, however, is not presumed, if the lease exceed the ordinary endurance (nineteen or twenty-one years); and in leases, however short, of urban subjects, it is never presumed. In the same manner, under the contract of society, there is an implied delectus personæ inseparable from the nature of the contract, which bars the admission of new partners, either by succession or by alienation, unless the contract contain an express stipulation entitling the heirs of partners to succeed to their predecessor's share in the concern, or empowering the partners themselves to assign their shares. See Society. So also offices in which there is a personal trust reposed, are neither saleable or adjudgeable for debt, although, in the ordinary case, the emoluments of an office are attachable by diligence. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 31, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 75, et seq. 126; Bell on Leases, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 180, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i. 171, 203, 222; Bell's Princ. § 358, 1215; Bell's Illust. § 358; Ross's Lect. ii. 481. See Offices. Lease.

Delegate; a person deputed to act for another, or for others. The delegate of a royal burgh, under the old election law, was a person appointed, according to certain statutory forms, by the town council of the burgh, to meet with the delegates from the other burghs of the district, and to vote in the election of a member to represent the district of burghs in Parliament. See Wight on Elections, B. iv. c. 2, p. 362; Bell's Election Law, p. 509. See also Election. Laws.

Delegated Jurisdiction. Delegated jurisdiction, as contradistinguished from proper jurisdiction, is that which is communicated by a judge to another, who acts in his name, called a depute or deputy. One named by a deputy, who has himself the power of deputation, is called a substitute. Jurisdiction being an office implying certain qualifications personal to the judge, cannot be delegated without an express power of delegation contained in the grant. Such a power is given in all personal grants of sheriffship or stewartry, admiralty, &c.; but justices of the peace and magistrates of burghs have no power of delegation. Before the abolition of heritable jurisdictions, it frequently happened that the inheritor of a jurisdiction was unfit to discharge his judicial duties in person; hence the act 1424, c. 6, empowered those possessing patrimonial jurisdiction to appoint deputies, for whom they should be answerable, and to whom they communicated the entire jurisdiction which was vested in themselves. The sheriffs of counties in Scotland, appointed under the Jurisdiction Act, 20 Geo. II., c. 43, are improperly called deputies in that statute: for they have not a delegated but a proper jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Sovereign, not by the high-sheriff of the county, and are authorized to appoint deputies, who are called substitutes, to exercise jurisdiction over the whole, or over particular districts of the county. It is of importance to observe, that delegated jurisdiction is not held in law to be the jurisdiction of the substitute, who has no proper jurisdiction, but of the judge who appoints him. Hence the acts of the substitute are held to be the acts of the principal judge, who is responsible for them; 1424, c. 6; 1469, c. 26. Here also the maxim, Delegatus non potest delegare applies, the substitute having no power to delegate his duties to another. In delegated jurisdiction the appeal must not be from the substitute to the principal judge; for the decree of the depute is held to be the decree of the principal; and no inferior judge, without express powers, can review his own decrees. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 13, et seq.; Kames' Stat. Law, voce Jurisdiction. See Appeal. Jurisdiction.

Delegation; is a method of extinguishing an obligation by substituting one debtor for another, with the creditor's consent, and thereby discharging the first debtor; as where the debtor in a bond substitutes a third party, who becomes bound in his place to the creditor. But an arrangement of this kind requires the express consent of the creditor; for no debtor can relieve himself of his obligation without the creditor's consent, except by actual payment or performance; and no creditor can be compelled to accept of one debtor for another. Delegation is not presumed; for a creditor cannot lose his right by implication; hence the new obligation will, in dubio, be accounted merely corroborative of the old; although, if the new obligation bear to be granted in satisfaction of the former, this will be construed to be a discharge of the first obligant. Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 8; More's Notes, p. cxxxvi.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 22; Bank. B. i. tit. 24, § 38; Bell's Princ. § 577; Bell's Illust. § 576. See Novation. Innovation. Expromissor.

Delegatus non Potest Delegare; a law maxim, importing that a party to whom any office or duty is delegated cannot lawfully devolve the duty on another. This maxim applies especially in matters of jurisdiction; and although jurists have differed on the point, the principle of the maxim is universally applicable; e.g., in the case of mandate and the like. See Stair, B. i. tit. 12, § 7. See also Delegation. Jurisdiction.

Delict and Delinquency. These terms, used comprehensively, include all wrongs of the nature of crimes or offences, inferring punishment ad vindictam publicam, in contradistinction to mere civil wrongs. A person guilty of a delinquency is held to have incurred an obligation to atone for his offence against the public, by suffering punishment, and at the same time to repair the injury he may have done to the private party, by paying damages. Delinquencies, considered as the grounds of civil claims for reparation, are divided into delicts and quasi delicts,—the former being offences committed with a malicious or criminal purpose, the latter including injuries arising from a degree of culpable negligence, amounting almost to crime, and inferring an obligation to repair the injury, although there may be no ground for a criminal prosecution. If more persons than one have been guilty of the crime or delinquency, they are all held as co-obligants, liable singuli in solidum for the civil debt of reparation; although he who pays seem to have an equitable claim for a proportional relief from his accomplices. But where a fine is imposed ad vindictam publicam, the co-delinquents are only liable pro rata for their proportions of the penalty, unless the fine be otherwise allocated by the judgment of the Court. On the same principle the obligation to repair the injury, considered as a civil debt, transmits to representatives, whether proceedings have been commenced during the delinquent's life or not; whereas all proceedings ad vindictam publicam, fall by the death of the delinquent. The civil claims for reparation on account of delinquencies have been classed by law authorities under the following heads:—Assythment, Claims arising from Injuries verbal or real, Damage, Extortion, Circumvention, Spuilzie, Intrusion, Ejection, Molestation, Contravention of Lawburrows, Battery pendente lite, Breach of Arrestment, Deforcement, Escape of a Prisoner, Excessive and deceitful Gaming, Forgery of Writing, and Perjury. Delivery. Delivery, either actual or constructive, or symbolical, is the test of the transfer of property, whether heritable or moveable. Actual delivery of heritage is impracticable; but the law of Scotland has recognised a symbolical delivery, which is indispensable in the transference of such property, and the want of which cannot be supplied by acquiring actual possession. See Sasine. Moveables, on the other hand, may be actually delivered; and without actual delivery, or a delivery which the law holds equivalent to actual delivery, the property of moveables cannot be effectually transferred. In the Roman law, delivery was of two kinds, traditio vera, or true or actual delivery, and traditio ficta, or constructive delivery; and the same distinction is recognised in the law of Scotland. Thus, under the contract of sale, actual delivery, in our acceptation of the term, consists in giving real possession to the purchaser, or his servants, or special agents who represent him; and constructive delivery comprehends, generally speaking, all those acts which, although they do not confer on the purchaser the actual possession of the thing sold, have been held, constructione juris, equivalent to acts of real delivery. The following are examples of actual delivery:—1. Delivery de manu in manum. 2. Delivery into the hands of the buyer's clerks or servants, or special agents, or into his warehouse, or his carts or vessels, under the direction of his servants, or of others hired by him. 3.

Delivery into a wharfinger's warehouse, which the buyer has been accustomed to hold as his own. 4. Delivery of goods into the king's warehouse for behoof of the buyer. 5. Delivery of the key of the cellar or other repository where the goods are deposited. And, in general, all deliveries analogous to any of those now specified. The examples of constructive delivery are,—1. Marking or setting apart the goods for the purchaser; e.g., marking trees or cattle purchased by him with his peculiar mark, or setting apart the goods for the buyer in the seller's warehouse, and charging the buyer with warehouse rent for them. 2. Intimating a delivery order to the custodian of the goods. 3. Transferring the goods in the custodian's books from the name of the seller to that of the buyer; and similar acts. While the parties remain solvent, the distinction between actual and constructive delivery is not of much consequence, since it is at least quite certain that, if the price be paid, either the one delivery or the other is sufficient to transfer the property. But questions of considerable difficulty have arisen out of the seller's right, in case of the buyer's insolvency after the sale, but before the transfer, to retain the undelivered goods, or to stop them on their way to the buyer, or in transitu, as it is termed, until he either pays the price, or gives security to pay it at the stipulated time. The English law doctrine of stoppage in transitu was introduced into the law of Scotland by a judgment of the House of Lords in 1790, reversing the judgment of the Court of Session in Allan v. Stewart and Company, 4th Dec. 1788, Mor. p. 4949. Our law writers, in endeavouring to give a systematic classification to the decisions which have been pronounced in questions of actual and constructive delivery, seem to be in some danger of falling into a controversy. According to one authority, stoppage in transitu is absolutely barred by actual delivery; but constructive delivery completes the transfer, so as to prevent stoppage in transitu, only where the price has been paid; Bell's Com. i. 166, et seq. On the other hand, a very able writer on the subject holds that constructive as well as actual delivery completes the transfer, whether the price has been paid or not, and absolutely bars the seller's privilege of stoppage in transitu, or of retention; Brown on Sale, p. 451, et seq. The latter doctrine is perhaps more consonant with principle; and Mr Brown's illustration of it may have the effect of giving to future determinations more of a systematic character; but it is obvious, from the authorities cited by him, that the law upon this subject has been only progressively acquiring consistency, and that the decisions hitherto pronounced are not easily reducible to one uniform principle. See 2 Ross, L. C. 92, et seq.; also p. 585 and p. 784, et seq. See Sale. Stoppage in transitu. With regard to false credits raised by apparent or reputed ownership, after constructive or symbolical delivery of moveables, see Possession. On the subject of this article, see Stair, B. i. tit. 1, § 15; More's Notes, p. lxxxix.; Brodie's Supp. p. 875, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 19; Bell's Princ. §§ 108, 114, 120, 1300, et seq.; Bell's Illust. §§ 108, 120, 1299, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 325, 387.

Goods sold but not delivered are not now attachable by the seller's creditors; and a seller is not now entitled to retain goods sold, against any subsequent purchaser on account of any separate debt or obligation due to him by the original purchaser, but must make delivery on the price being paid, and the conditions of the contract of sale being performed by the subsequent purchaser. See 19 and 20 Vict., c. 60, 1856.

Delivery of Deeds. While a deed or writing remains in the custody of the grantor or of his agent undelivered, it is not obligatory; for, so long as it remains within the grantor's power, he cannot be said to have finally resolved to be bound by it. In order to render the deed effectual, it must have been delivered either to the grantee or to a third party; and where it has been put into the hands of a third party, the presumption of law rather seems to be, that it has been delivered to him unconditionally for the grantee's behoof. But this presumption may be elided by the grantee's writ or oath, and, in special cases, even by the evidence of the writer of the deed, and the instrumentary witnesses; Drummond, 5th July 1662, Mor. p. 12309. And where the deposition is either acknowledged by the grantee, or otherwise sufficiently verified, the conditions under which the deed is to be delivered, if not stated in writing by the grantor, may be proved by the oath of the depository. Where the deed is gratuitous, and deposited with a person who is a stranger both to the grantor and the grantee, it appears that it will be held to have been deposited under the implied condition, that it is to be returned to the grantor, if he require it during his life, but that if he do not, the depository shall deliver it to the grantee; Ker, 25th Jan. 1677, Mor. p. 3249. A deed put by the grantor into the hands of a person who is agent for both grantor and grantee, will be presumed to have been delivered for behoof of the grantee; Ramsay, 15th Jan. 1828, 6 S. 343. And if the deed be found in the custody of the grantee himself, the presumption of delivery cannot be elided but by the writ or oath of the grantee. Deeds so found in the hands of the grantee are presumed to have been delivered at their dates, especially where they are onerous or rational. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 43. The following are exceptions to the rule with regard to delivery:—1st, Where the deed contains a clause dispensing with delivery, it is effectual although found in the granter's repositories after his death. 2d, No deed of a testamentary nature requires delivery; because such deeds take effect only at the period of the granter's death. 3d, Bonds and other writings by parents in favour of their children require no delivery, because parents are the natural custodiers of their children's writs. Children, although forisfamiliarized, and even natural children, have the benefit of this exception. On the same principle, postnuptial settlements by a husband in favour of his wife do not require delivery, the husband being the legal custodian of the writings belonging to his wife. 4th, A deed in which the granter himself has an interest requires no delivery, e.g., a reserved liferent; because the presumption there is, that the granter holds the deed, not because his mind is not made up in regard to it, but in order to secure his own reserved liferent. 5th, Deeds which the granter lies under an antecedent obligation to execute require no delivery. 6th, A mutual obligation or contract, signed by two or more parties for their respective interests requires no delivery; because such a deed, when executed, becomes a common right to all the contractors; the mere subscription of the several parties proving the delivery, by the other subscribers, to him in whose hands the deed is found; and if the holder of the deed can use it as effectual to him, it must be effectual to the rest of the contracting parties. Lastly, If the granter inserts the deed in a public record, it is held to be equivalent to delivery; Ersk. ibid. § 44. Lord Kames attempts to deduce the doctrine of the delivery of deeds from the granter's right of property in the paper or other material on which the deed is written; but there is no occasion for resorting to a subtlety of this kind, the principle of which, if introduced into conveyancing, would be attended with very pernicious consequences. See Kames' Elucidations, art. iv. Delivery renders a deed obligatory on the granter; but, in order to bind the grantee, the deed must be accepted. See Acceptance. Demand; a call upon a person for anything alleged to be due. This term can hardly be said to have any technical meaning in the law of Scotland different from its ordinary acceptance. In England it is a legal term, and may either be in deed or in law. Demand in deed is an express demand; in law it is implied, as by distress for rents, taking of goods, &c. See Tomlins' Dict.

Demembration. This term, as used in law, is applied to the offence of maliciously cutting off, or otherwise separating any limb, or member, from the body of another. Demembration was at one time regarded as a capital crime (1491, c. 28); but there appears to be no instance on record of a capital conviction. The punishment has long been arbitrary, and depends upon the circumstances attending the commission of the offence, and the degree of injury inflicted. Besides a prosecution ad vindictam publicam, an action for damages at the instance of the injured party is competent. By the former practice, a prosecution for demembration could not be instituted until year and day after the date of the injury; but such a delay is not now required. Hume, i. 330, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 50.

De Minimis Non Curat Prætor; a Roman law maxim, importing that courts of justice do not take trifling and immaterial matters into account. Stair applies the maxim to the case of an appraising, where the debt has been extinguished, to all but a trifle, during the legal, by the creditor's intromissions with the rents; and observes, that in such a case, even under the old law, a small remainder, or balance, outstanding after the expiry of the legal, would not have been sufficient to exclude the debtor's right of redemption; Stair, B. iii. tit. 2, § 39. See Legal.

Demise of the Crown. In law, the Sovereign never dies; for, immediately on the decease of the reigning monarch, the royal dignity is, by the act of the law, vested in his successor, who is eo instante Sovereign to all intents and purposes; or, as it is expressed in the law of England, the kingdom is demised, or transferred to the heir to the Crown, so that the royal dignity remains perpetual; Blackstone, vol. i. 249. See King.

Demission. A clergyman of the Established Church of Scotland may voluntarily demit his charge; and, in such cases, the presbytery judges whether or not the demission ought to be accepted. If the minister has pursued schismatical and divisive courses, the presbytery cannot competently accept his demission, but may consult the commission of the General Assembly, and, if necessary, proceed against the minister by libel, censure, or even deposition; Hill's Prac. 56, and authorities there cited. See Deposition.

Demurrage; is the allowance or compensation due to the master or owners of a ship, by the freighter, for the time the vessel may have been detained beyond the time specified, or implied, in the contract of affreightment or charter-party. In charter-parties, there is usually a clause regulating the time during which the master shall be obliged to remain with his ship, for the purpose of receiving a cargo, or sailing with convoy, or of unloading at the port of delivery. In the ordinary case, it is stipulated that the vessel shall remain for so many days, called lay days, the number being fixed according to the customary time required for receiving or delivering the cargo; and also, that it shall be in the power of the freighter, or his correspondents or assignees, to detain the vessel for so many days longer, called days of demurrage, at a certain rate of demurrage for each day. The following points with regard to the claim for demurrage seem deserving of attention:—1st, If the ship be improperly detained, demurrage is due, not only under the express or implied contract of charter-party, but on the principle of damage, arising to the owners from the undue detention. 2d, If the charter-party or bill of lading contain no stipulation of lay days, or if it be merely provided that the usual time for loading and unloading shall be allowed, the customary, or a reasonable time, or (where a delay arises from no fault of the freighter) the time necessary for loading or unloading, will be given. After the elapse of that time, the master will be entitled to sail, if no demurrage has been stipulated; or, if he be detained longer, he may claim damages. It follows, from this rule, that no demurrage will be due where the delay has been occasioned by the crowded state of the docks, or where the customary mode of delivery of the particular cargo requires more time than an ordinary delivery. But, whenever the delay is imputable to any fault of the freighter or the consignee, demurrage will be due. 3d, If a specific number of lay days be allowed, the days of demurrage will commence on the expiration of the lay days, however blameless the freighter or consignee may have been. As to this, the rule is, that, during the loading or unloading of the ship, the freighter runs all the risk of necessary, or of accidental, interruptions; but, after the loading or unloading is complete, the risk of interruptions is transferred to the shipmaster or owners. 4th, The indorsee of a bill of lading will have no defence against a claim for demurrage, on the ground that he got no notice of the arrival of the vessel; for it is the duty of the indorsee or consignee to watch the arrival. But if the ship's name be incorrectly entered at the customhouse, so that the consignee, after due inquiry, cannot discover the arrival, that will liberate him from any claim for demurrage arising out of such inaccurate entry. 5th, In settling the lay days and the days of demurrage, the charter-party specifies "working days" or "running days." The former stipulation excludes Sundays and customhouse holidays; under the latter, the days are reckoned as in a bill of exchange. Where the expression used is "days" merely, running days are presumed; but special usage may overcome this presumption. 6th, If there be no stipulation for demurrage, the master may sail on the expiration of the lay days stipulated or reasonable; or if he stay voluntarily, or otherwise, he will be entitled to damages of the nature of demurrage. 7th, If the days of demurrage be limited, and the ship be detained beyond them, the sum fixed for demurrage will be taken as the best measure of the compensation due for the damage arising from longer delay. But it will be open to the shipowners to show, that greater damage has been sustained; and to the freighter, to show that an allowance, at the rate of the stipulated demurrage, will do more than compensate the damage. 8th, Demurrage is due even in the case of a general ship. This may arise from the delay of a merchant who has engaged freight in a general ship, and has failed to bring forward his goods in due time. Or it may arise where, in the delivery of the cargo from a general ship, delay has arisen in consequence of the several parties to whom the goods are addressed not being ready to receive them. In either of those cases, demurrage is sometimes stipulated; and, in such a case, where the demurrage is incurred in unloading the cargo, it seems to be settled that the merchant whose goods are last delivered, or lowest in the hold, is liable for the demurrage, even although the delay may have been occasioned by no fault whatever of his. The person who pays the demurrage, however, will be entitled to recourse against the parties in fault. 9th, Demurrage stipulated to be paid, for the time spent in waiting for convoy, ceases as soon as the convoy is ready to depart; and, in the ordinary case, after the ship is laden, and has got the necessary clearances, the claim for demurrage stops. 10th, A protest on account of demurrage, although not indispensable, ought always to be taken. The protest ought to set forth the circumstances attending the delay, and such other facts as are material, and indisputable at the time, although the want of an instrument of this kind may render the proof of them difficult afterwards. Lastly, The doctrine of the law of England, which is of high authority with us in such cases, seems to be, that the freighter is responsible for all the various risks, vicissitudes, or casualties which may prevent him from returning the vessel to the owners within the stipulated time, including the case of the vessel being frozen up. The shipmaster has no implied lien over the goods for demurrage; but a lien may be created for this claim by an express and unambiguous stipulation. Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 981; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 575, et seq., and vol. ii. p. 100, 5th edit.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Holt on Shipping, ii. 13, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, ii. 539 and 552, 2d edit.; Bell's Princ. § 431, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 431. See Charter-Party.

Demurrer; is an English law term, signifying a pause or stop put to any action upon a point of difficulty in law, which must be determined by the Court before any farther proceedings can be had. A demurrer, therefore, is an issue in point of law. Conceding the fact as stated by the opposite party, it denies the legal inference thence deduced. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Denial. Denial in law imports no more than not confessing. It does not amount to a positive assertion of the falsehood of that which is denied. In the judicial procedure of the Court of Session, where a fact is, or ought to be, within the knowledge of his opponent, is averred by one party, and not explicitly denied by the other, he is held as confessed, and the fact taken as definitely proved against him. Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 1; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 16; A. S. 1st Feb. 1715, § 6; 7th Feb. 1810, and 11th July 1828, § 105. See Calumny, Oath of Condescendence, Confession.

Denizen; is an alien born, who has obtained from the Sovereign letters of denization, in virtue of which he is entitled to purchase and transmit lands, although he cannot take by inheritance. The right to grant letters of denization is a high and incommunicable prerogative of the Crown. Bell's Princ. § 2136; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. See Act 7 and 8 Vict., c. 66; Menzies' Conveyancing, p. 46. See also Alien.

De Non Apparentibus et Non Existentibus Eadem Est Ratio; a maxim, importing, as usually applied in law, that deeds or writings founded on by a party, but not produced or recovered, or the loss of which cannot be supplied, in the manner which the law has prescribed, are to be treated precisely as if non-existent. See Proving of Tenor.

Denunciation; is the act by which a person who has disobeyed a charge is proclaimed a rebel. The act was performed, before the recent Diligence Act, by a messenger-at-arms, who proceeded to the cross of Edinburgh, or to the market-cross of the head burgh of the county within which the party charged resided, and there, in presence of two witnesses, cried three several oyesses with an audible voice, and then read publicly the letters of horning and the execution of charge, and thereafter denounced the debtor rebel, and put him to the horn, as it is termed, by three blasts of a horn. If the debtor was furth of the kingdom, the denunciation was proclaimed at the cross of Edinburgh and the pier and shore of Leith. The execution returned by the messenger detailed this solemnity as having been actually gone through; and should the execution not specify the several formalities, the omission could not be supplied by parole proof that they were observed. The denunciation was declared null, if the letters of horning and the execution were not registered within fifteen days after the denunciation, in the sheriff-court books of the jurisdiction within which the debtor resided, or in the General Register at Edinburgh; 1579, c. 75; 1597, c. 265; 1600, c. 13; and where the registration had been omitted, the practice was to denounce of new, and register the second execution. Denunciations may also proceed against persons cited to the Court of Justiciary on account of crimes.—1st, Where they appear there with more followers than are permitted by 1555, c. 41; or, 2d, Where, in consequence of a failure to appear, sentence of fugitation has been pronounced against them. In the first case, the denunciation must take place at the market-cross of the head burgh of the shire where the court is held, and must be registered, either in the books of the shire of the rebel's domicile, or in the books of adjournal of the Court of Justiciary. In the case where denunciation has followed a sentence of fugitation, it is as effectual if it be made at the market-cross of Edinburgh within six days after the sentence of fugitation, as if it had been made at the county town of the domicile; 1584, c. 140; 1592, c. 126. The chief, and almost the only purpose to which denunciation on account of a civil debt was applied, was to warrant the issuing of letters of caption against the party denounced. See Caption. But the consequences of denunciation, whether on account of civil or criminal matters, were formerly highly penal. Thus,—1st, The rebel's single escheat fell,—that is, his whole moveable effects were forfeited to the Crown, and his liferent escheat fell to the superior, if he remained a year and a day unrelaxed (see Escheat); 2d, Prior to 1612, persons denounced, even for a civil debt, might be put to death with impunity; and, 3d, After denunciation, the rebel had no persona standi in judicio. But the severity of those provisions has been much mitigated, both by legislative enactments and by the progress of civilization. By the statute 20 Geo.

II., c. 50 (1748), escheat upon denunciation for civil causes is entirely abolished. The act 1612, c. 3, provides that denunciation for a civil cause shall be no justification for any personal injury to the party denounced; and the provision, that the rebel shall have no persona standi in judicio, is not now favoured by the law. It is merely personal, and cannot be pleaded against the rebel's assignee, even although the assignation should be dated after the commencement of the action; and it is probable that, if pleaded against a person denounced on account of a civil debt, the plea would be repelled; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 60. If no denunciation be made within year and day of the date of the execution of the horning, the charge falls, and the horning must be executed of new. By 1621, c. 20, it is provided, that after denunciation, the sum in the horning shall bear interest until paid; and the construction put on this statute is, that denunciation operates as an accumulation of the principal and interest due at the date of the denunciation into a principal sum bearing interest. But, in order to produce this effect, the denunciation must have been performed precisely in terms of the statutes; for, although a denunciation at the cross of Edinburgh, even where the debtor resides beyond the county, will be sufficient to warrant letters of caption; yet, in order to accumulate principal and interest, the denunciation must be made at the head burgh of the debtor's residence, or at the market-cross of Edinburgh and the pier and shore of Leith, if he be furth of the kingdom; Cochran, 7th July 1743, Mor. p. 494; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 652-653, and vol. ii. p. 543, 5th edit. Registration of the extract, and execution of an expired charge in the register of hornings, has now the same effect as if the debtor or obligant had been denounced rebel in virtue of letters of horning, and has the effect of accumulating the debt and interest into a capital sum on which interest shall become due; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, §§ 5 and 10. This statute has practically superseded the procedure for recovery of civil debt by horning, denunciation, and caption, though that is still competent. See Caption. Denunciation on account of crimes is still followed by escheat and the other penal consequences already mentioned, except that it is not allowable for any one to kill or mutilate the rebel, unless he has been denounced for a capital crime, and has been killed or injured while making a forcible resistance to those who were pursuing him for the ends of justice; 1661, c. 22; Hume, vol. i. p. 182, et seq. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. iii. tit. 3, § 7, et seq.; *Bank. Deodand. The literal meaning of this term is, dedicated or devoted to God. By the law of England, any of the lower animals, as a horse or ox, or any moveable subject, such as a cart or carriage, which has been the immediate cause of the death of a human being, is forfeited to the Crown to be applied to pious uses. Deodands were originally designed as an expiation for the souls of those who were cut off by accident, and were devoted to the purchase of masses. It is now the practice for the jury who declare the deodand, to fix a certain value upon it, which, when there has been blame imputable to the owner, operates as a fine; and, where no blame attaches, the jury usually make the deodand merely elusory, by declaring some trifling thing, or a part of an entire thing, to have been the occasion of the death. There can be no deodand unless it is declared such by a jury; and the verdict of the jury on that point will be with difficulty interfered with; Blackstone, vol. i. p. 300, et seq. See also Tomlins' Dict. h. t. A similar forfeiture is said, on the authority of the Regiam Majestatem, to have been known in our older law; Bank. B. i. tit. 8, § 10.

Depending Action. An action is held to be in dependence from the moment of the citation, until the final decision of the House of Lords; and, upon such a dependence, it is competent for the pursuer to use either inhibition or arrestment, as a security to him for implement of the decree, in case he shall succeed in obtaining one. Warrant for an inhibition on the dependence will be obtained upon production, at the Bill Chamber, of the summons duly executed. The inhibition must bear a distinct reference to the action on which it proceeds. Where the summons concludes for a precise sum, the sum must be specified in the inhibition; and where it is impossible to specify any sum, the nature of the action must be particularly mentioned. The effect of an inhibition on the dependence rests entirely on the decree; and where the action does not terminate in a decree, the inhibition is not effectual. Thus, if the case be taken out of Court by arbitration, the inhibition will not cover the sum decreed for by the arbiter; Reids, &c., 3d July 1751, Mor. p. 6993, and Elchies, Inhibition, No. XVII. But in such a case the effect of the inhibition may be reserved by an express stipulation that the pursuer shall consent to a judicial decree in terms of the arbiter's award; Stewart, 16th Feb. 1770, Mor. p. 7004; Anderson, 25th May 1821, 1 S. 31. The same rules apply to arrestment on the dependence of an action. Warrant for the arrestment may be obtained summarily on production of the libelled summons before it is executed; 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 2. So also the wills of summonses, both in the Court of Session and in the Sheriff-court, may, and usually do, contain a warrant to arrest on the dependence; and wherever an arrestment on the dependence is used on the unexecuted summons, if the summons is not executed within twenty days next after the date of executing the arrestment, and the summons called within twenty days after the diet of comparance, or if the vacation intervenes, on the first calling day thereafter, the arrestment is null, without prejudice to any subsequent arrestment on the same precept; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, §§ 16 and 17; A. S., 10th July 1839, § 12; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 1. See Arrestment. Arrestments on the dependence do not prescribe in three years from their date, but in three years from the date of the decree in the action; and all arrestments on the dependence may be loosed on caution. Between the final decree in the Court of Session and the entry of an appeal, the creditor may inhibit or arrest as upon a final decree; but the appeal revives the depending process. See Bell's Com. ii. 144, et seq. and 67, et seq. 5th edit.; Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. pp. 185, 196; Ross's Lect. i. 449, 485, 490. See also Arrestment. Loosing Arrestment. Inhibition.

Deponent; a person who makes oath judicially. The term is usually applied to a witness whose testimony is taken down in writing, and authenticated by his subscription. See Deposition.

Deposition or Deposit; is a contract, by which a subject, belonging to one person, is intrusted to the gratuitous custody of another, to be re-delivered on demand. He who deposits or gives in custody, is called the depositor; and the person with whom the deposit is made, is called the depository. The contract is completed by delivery of the subject. The property of the subject and the risk remain with the depositor; consequently, if the subject perish accidentally, it perishes to him. The depository, until the subject is demanded back, is liable only for gross negligence, and bound to such diligence as he uses in his own affairs; but if he unduly delay to re-deliver the subject, after requisition, he will be liable in the most exact diligence; and if, after that, the subject should perish, even accidentally, he will be answerable for its value. Where a box or other repository, under lock and key, is deposited without delivery of the key, the depository will be answerable only for the repository itself, and not for its contents. If, on the other hand, the key be delivered, the rules just explained as to diligence will apply. Where a subject is committed to the custody of two persons, they are liable singuli in solidum for restitution. Deposition is divided into proper and improper. The former is where a special subject is deposited, to be restored without alteration; the latter where money, or other fungibles, are deposited to be returned in kind. In proper deposition, the real right of the subject remains with the depositor, the depository having neither the use nor the disposal of it; and although it seems to be doubtful, whether a bona fide purchaser from a depository, who has fraudulently sold the subject, will be safe from the owner's claim for restitution, it is certain that, where there has been no fraud, and while the subject remains with the depository himself, his creditors have no right to it in competition with the owner. In improper deposition, however, the rule is different; for there the real right is transferred to the depository, and the depositor becomes a creditor merely for the quantity of fungibles, or money, deposited. But there may be proper depositions even of money or other fungibles, provided they are delivered as a specific subject, marked so as to be distinguishable from the depository's ordinary stock. So also bills and other negotiable instruments may be the subject of proper deposition, provided the power of negotiation is not with the depository. The result, therefore, is,—1st, That where deposited goods are extant and distinguishable, the depositor, in all cases of proper deposition, is entitled to have them set apart from the common fund, and re-delivered to him; and, 2d, That where the subject deposited is to be returned in kind, the depositor is only a personal creditor of the depository. The depository is bound to restore the subject with all its fruits and accessories; and this obligation is enforced by the actio directa. The actio contraria of deposition is competent to the depository against the owner, for indemnification of any loss or expense, which he may have incurred through the custody of the subject. On account of the exuberant trust implied in this contract, the depository is not entitled, either in proper or improper deposition, to plead compensation or retention against the depositor, in payment or security of another debt, due by the depositor to the depository. But where the depository's claim arises from damage, occasioned by the subject of the deposition itself, or on account of money disbursed in the custody of it, the depository may retain the subject, until he is fully indemnified for such loss or expense. If, on the depository's death, his heir, ignorant of the deposition, bona fide sell the subject, he is accountable only for the price received by him, or, if he have not received the price, he will be discharged of his obligation, by assigning his claim for the price to the depositor. There are several special kinds of depositions, which will be more appropriately considered under separate articles. Such are depositions giving rise to claims under the edict Nautæ, caupones, stabularii,—sequestration, voluntary and judicial,—consignation of money,—and trust, which is a sort of deposition. These, however, although classed by our law writers under deposition, differ in some essential particulars from deposition properly so called. See the following articles in this Dictionary:—Consignation. Nautæ, caupones, &c. Sequestration. Trust. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 13; More's Notes, p. lxxvii; Bank. B. i. tit. 15; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 26, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 257, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 210, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 212.

Deposition; is the testimony of a witness, who is called also a deponent, put down in writing. Prior to the introduction of jury trial in civil causes, all proofs by witnesses, whether taken before the Court of Session or before an inferior court, or before a commissioner named by the Court to take the proof, were committed to writing, for the consideration of the Court which was to decide on the import of the proof adduced. This mode of taking evidence has been to some extent superseded in the Court of Session by the introduction of jury trial; but it is still competent, even for that Court, to authorize the testimony of witnesses to be taken according to the old form, and it is proper to explain the manner in which it is done. The deposition is taken in presence of the parties, or their counsel or agents, either by the judge, or by a commissioner, who administers the oath to the deponent. The interrogatories are put by the counsel or agent of the parties, under the control of the Court or of the commissioner, and the answers, as given by the witness, are taken down in writing by the clerk to the proof. If there be any objection to the competency of the questions, or to the admissibility of the witness, the objection is stated to the judge, or to the commissioner, who either disposes of it immediately, or reserves it for the opinion of the Court, his judgment either repelling or sustaining the objection, being subject of course to the review of the Court. Those objections, with the whole pleadings upon them before the commissioner, were formerly in use to be engrossed verbatim in the report of the proof; but the act of Sedes-runt 11th March 1800, in order to put an end to this practice, directs that, in proofs taken on commission from the Court of Session, the commissioner shall exercise his own judgment in excluding from the report of the proof all unnecessary pleading or altercation about the competency of questions, or the admissibility of witnesses, and that he shall take separate notes of such objections as he thinks of importance, for the information of the Court. He is also directed to take a note of any peculiarity in the witness's manner of giving his testimony. The examination of the witness being finished, the deposition is read over to him, so as to give him an opportunity of correcting any error which may have been fallen into in taking it down; and it is closed by a declaration that the whole of it is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God. The deposition is authenticated by the subscriptions of the deponent, and of the judge or commissioner, and the clerk to the proof. If the deponent cannot write, that circumstance is mentioned in the deposition; and the subscriptions of the judge or commissioner, and the clerk, are sufficient. By the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 10 (1853), the notes of the evidence led in the Sheriff-courts must be taken by the Sheriff with his own hand. In the Court of Justiciary, the testimony of the witnesses, as delivered to the jury, was taken down at large in writing, until the statutes 21 Geo. II., c. 19, and 23 Geo. III., c. 45, put an end to the practice; leaving to the Court an option to proceed according to the old form, if they see cause; Hume, ii. 382. A similar change was made in criminal trials by jury before sheriffs, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 17. Where it is found necessary to take the depositions of the witnesses examined on a precognition, in ordinary criminal cases, the formalities just explained are observed. In criminal trials before sheriffs, justices, and other inferior judges, without a jury, the depositions are taken down by the clerk of Court, and signed by the witnesses and judge. See 9 Geo. IV., c. 29. As to the mode of taking proofs in consistorial causes, see Commission for taking Proof; and as to depositions of witnesses taken to lie in retentis, see Evidence. Deposition of a Clergyman. The minister of a parish who has been guilty of scandalous or immoral conduct, or of any other offence against the Presbyterian scheme of ecclesiastical discipline, may be deposed from his holy office by sentence of the Church judicatories, and so deprived of the temporalities of his benefice. After the Reformation, sentence of deposition by a Church court, did not disqualify the deposed minister from enjoying the benefice for life, that being considered as a civil right conferred on him by the patron. But the statute 1592, c. 115, declares, that sentence of deposition by a Church court shall have the effect of depriving the deposed minister of the rents and emoluments of his benefice, and that the benefice shall thereby become vacant. The steps are in all respects similar to those taken on the occasion of a vacancy by death or translation. After the sentence of deposition is extracted and shown to the patron, he is allowed, by the same statute, six months to supply the vacancy; and if he fail to present within that time, the right to supply that vacancy devolves upon the presbytery within which the benefice is situated. A minister once deposed, may be restored to the exercise of his ministry by the General Assembly; but regularly he ought not to be settled in the same church, because it is held that the stigma attached to his character by the deposition, is likely to impair the usefulness of his ministry in that parish. Sometimes, instead of sentence of deposition or deprivation, the Church judicatory takes a more lenient course, and merely declares the relation between the minister and his parish to be loosed,—a declaration which is equivalent in effect to a deposition, and which is usually resorted to, where the clergyman is contumaciously disobedient to the Church courts, or where he promulgates doctrines inconsistent with the tenets of our national Church. Where sentence of deposition is pronounced by an inferior Church court, and afterwards reversed on appeal to a higher court, it is held as if it had never been pronounced; but, if the sentence be affirmed, the minister's right to the profits of his benefice ceases from the date of the sentence of the inferior court. A minister who has been deposed may, on reasonable considerations, be restored to his sacred functions by the General Assembly, without any new ordination; hence it appears that the ecclesiastical character is to that extent indelible, although, after deposition, the party is not to be regarded as a minister of the Church, nor entitled to any privileges as such, even if he should be reposed, unless he is again settled in a ministerial charge. Sentence of deposition cannot be pronounced by a presbytery in absence of the minister who is to be deposed, unless by authority of the General Assembly. Where the deposition has been on account of immorality, the minister cannot be restored to his former charge, under any circumstances, without the special authority of the General Assembly. *Bank. Depredation or Hershship; is the offence of driving away numbers of cattle or other bestial, by the masterful force of armed persons. This crime, although now almost unknown in this country, was at one time very prevalent. The punishment is capital. Hume, i. 110. See Hershship.

Deprivation of a Clergyman. See Deposition.

Deputy; one who exercises an office under another. A deputy differs from the assignee to an office: the principal is liable for the acts of his deputy, but the granter is not liable for the acts of his assignee. No judge has the power to name a deputy, unless he is expressly authorized to do so by the grant to himself. A deputy appointed by a deputy, who has a power of deputation, is usually called a substitute. Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 13. See Delegated Jurisdiction.

Derelict; is an English law term, signifying anything forsaken or left, or wilfully cast away. Derelict lands suddenly left by the sea belong to the Crown; but if the sea recede gradually, and by imperceptible degrees, the gain will go to the owner of the adjacent lands. By statute 54 Geo. III., c. 81, § 21, et seq., certain goods derelict (spirits and tobacco), are liable to the duties of customs, as if legally imported; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. As to derelict ships, i.e., vessels forsaken at sea, see Wreck.

Dereliction. The term dereliction, in Scotch law, is nearly similar in import to the English term derelict. Stray cattle not claimed within year and day are held to be dereliquished, and are escheated to the King. But if the thing found be inanimate, it would appear that the presumption of dereliction does not hold, and that the owner may reclaim it at any time within the period of the long prescription of forty years; Stair, B. ii. tit. 1, § 20; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 12; Bank. B. i. tit. 8, § 4. With regard to land gained from the sea, we have not recognised the distinction of the English law. In Scotland, the shores of the sea are held to belong to the public for the purposes of navigation, and to the Sovereign as trustee for the public. But this right is confined to the shore of the sea only, and is not understood to confer on the Sovereign anything like a right of private property. If, therefore, the sea were to recede either suddenly or imperceptibly, the land so gained would belong to the adjacent proprietors whose property is bounded by the sea-shore. Bank. B. i. tit. 3, § 4; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 6, and tit. 6, § 17. See Strays. Waifs. Wreck. Regalia. Sea-greens.

Dereliction, in teind law. The teind-court will pronounce a decree approving of a valuation of tithes by the sub-commissioners, although the sub-valuation has not been acted upon for upwards of forty years. But if there has not been a use of payment of a higher rate of teind than that fixed by the sub-commissioners, the sub-valuation will be held to be derelinquished, and the Court will not approve of it, even although the long prescription has not run on the higher rate. It appears, however, to be now settled, that the same rule does not apply to the case of a valuation by the High Commission, or to a sub-valuation approved of by that Court; for it has been decided that a decree of valuation by the High Commission will not be held to be derelinquished by prescription, or by a contrary and a higher rate of payment for any period, however long. See Connel on Tithes, i. 376, 386; see also Teinds.

Descendants; are all the persons descended from one common ancestor. Thus, the son, the grandson, and the great-grandson, are descendants in the direct line. The children of younger brothers are descendants in the collateral line. In legal succession, descendants are always preferred to ascendants, according to certain rules, fully explained under the article Succession. See also Heir. Executor. Conquest.

Desertion; in martial law, is the offence of a soldier or sailor who quits the army or navy without being discharged, or without leave of absence. By the annual mutiny act, military desertion is punishable with death, or with such other punishment as a court-martial may think proper to award; Tomlins' Dict. voce Soldiers. Desertion from the naval service of Great Britain is in like manner punishable at the discretion of a court-martial. By the articles of war regulating this branch of the service (arts. 15 and 16), it is provided, that "every person who shall desert to the enemy, or run away with any ship, ordnance, &c., to the weakening of the service, or yield up the same cowardly or treacherously to the enemy, shall suffer death;" and "every person who shall desert, or entice others to do so, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as a court-martial shall think fit;" Tomlins' Dict. voce Navy. Where a person is suspected to be a deserter, either from the military or naval service, he may be apprehended by any constable, or by any officer or soldier in the service, and brought before the nearest justice of the peace; and if, by the party's own confession, or by the oath of one witness, or by the knowledge of the justice, it appear that he is a deserter, the justice may commit him to prison, and transmit an account of the commitment, in a prescribed form, to the Secretary at War in London, or to the Secretary of the Admiralty. And, on receiving authority from either of those functionaries, the justice may grant an order on the collector of the land-tax of the place of commitment, for a reward not exceeding forty shillings to the person who apprehended the deserter. A person guilty of concealing or assisting a deserter forfeits L.20 on conviction, by the oath of one witness, before any justice; the fine to be levied by distress—half being paid to the informer, and half to the officer commanding the regiment or corps. Failing distress, or if the guilty person do not pay the fine within four days after conviction, he is to be committed, by warrant under the hand of the justice, to jail for six months. The forcible entering or breaking open any dwelling-house or out-house on pretence of searching for a deserter, without a written warrant, is illegal, and subjects the party in fault to a penalty of L.20; but a justice of the peace may lawfully grant warrant for such a search. Desertion is not a crime cognizable by the ordinary courts of law in Scotland. But to seduce a soldier or a sailor to desert is an offence punishable, arbitrarily, at common law; Hume, i. 528 and 560; ii. 34, 41. And by 37 Geo. III., c. 70 (made perpetual by 57 Geo. III., c. 7), the attempt to seduce a soldier or a sailor from his duty, is declared a capital offence; Tait's Justice of Peace, 387; Blair's Justice, voce Soldiers, p. 320; Hutcheson's, i. 296. See Soldiers. Navy. Court-Martial. Mutiny Act. In the merchant service, a seaman who deserts the ship before the expiration of the term of his agreement, forfeits all his wages, and renders himself liable to imprisonment; 17 and 18 Vict., c. 104. But it is not held to be desertion if the seaman forthwith enter into Her Majesty's service; 7 and 8 Vict., c. 112, § 50, and 17 and 18 Vict., c. 194. In either case, he is entitled to his wages up to the period of his entry into the Queen's service, provided the ship which he has left has arrived at her port in safety. Neither is it desertion if the master compel the seaman to quit the ship by harsh treatment. See Seymour's Merchant Shipping Acts, p. 196; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 978; Bell's Com., vol. i. p. 514, 5th edit.

Desertion of Married Persons. Wilful and malicious desertion or abandonment of the conjugal society, on the part either of a husband or of a wife, may be the ground of a divorce under the statute 1573, c. 55. Where either party has deserted from the other without reasonable cause, and has remained maliciously separate for four years together, the party deserted may pursue a process of adherence either before the Sheriff or the Court of Session; and where the action is pursued by the wife, it is competent for her in the same summons to conclude for aliment. The pursuer must prove both the marriage and the desertion; and the decree of adherence may be enforced by letters of horning. After this the Church is directed by the statute to proceed against the defender, first by admodition, and then by excommunication. And if all these be disregarded, an action of divorce may be pursued before the Court of Session, as coming in place of the Commissary Court. The action of adherence may be raised, and sentence of adherence pronounced, after one year's desertion; but four years must intervene between the first desertion and the decree of divorce. If the decree of adherence and the subsequent admonition of the presbytery (as coming in place of the bishop), have been disobeyed, and if the desertion have continued for the statutory period of four years, the pursuer may then raise an action of divorce before the Court of Session, reciting the procedure in the action of adherence and before the presbytery, and concluding for divorce on the ground of wilful desertion. If no appearance be made for the defender in this action, the pursuer must appear and depone de calumnia; after which no farther proof is required in support of the action than production of the documents libelled on. In like manner, also, where the defender appears and opposes the action, the pursuer must swear the oath of calumny; but at this stage of the proceedings the defender is not entitled to bar the decree of divorce by offering to adhere. Where the party accused of desertion is forth of the kingdom (especially where no personal notice of the action has been served), it has been doubted whether the action of divorce can proceed; although it has been said that such absence will be no defence where the offending party has gone abroad with the deliberate purpose of avoiding conjugal adherence; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 44; and reference may be made to Walker v. Walker, 7th Dec. 1844, 7 Jur. 87, and A. B. and C. D. Duke v. Duke, 1st Mar. 1845, 7 D. 556. But where the husband or wife is so absent about his or her lawful affairs, or in pursuance of a sentence of banishment, no action can be instituted; and if during such absence the party remaining at home should enter into another marriage, in the bona fide belief that the absent party is dead, the husband or wife, on his or her return, may either resume the former connection, or sue for a divorce on the ground of adultery. The bona fides, however, will be a protection against any criminal prosecution, either on the ground of bigamy or of adultery. The effect of divorce on the ground of desertion is declared by the statute 1573, c. 55, to be, that the party offender shall "tyne and lose their tocher, et donationes propter nuptias,"—that is, the offending husband is bound to restore to the wife her tocher, and to pay or implement to her all her provisions, legal or conventional; and, on the other hand, the offending wife forfeits to the husband her tocher, and all the rights which would have belonged to her had the marriage been dissolved by the predecease of the husband; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 46. See on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 4, §§ 8 and 20; More's Notes, p. xxvii.; Bank. B. i. tit. 5, § 127, et seq.; *Ersk. Desertion of a Tenant. The Act of Sederunt 1756, § 5, provides, that "where a tenant shall run in arrear of one full year's rent, or shall desert his possession, and leave it unlaboured at the usual time of labouring, in these, or either of these cases, it shall be lawful to the heritor, or other setter of the lands, to bring his action against the tenant before the judge ordinary, who is hereby empowered and required to decern and ordain the tenant to find caution for the arrears, and for payment of the rent for the five crops following, or during the currency of the tack, if the tack is of a shorter endurance than five years, within a certain time to be limited by the judge; and, failing thereof, to decern the tenant summarily to remove, and to eject him in the same manner as if the tack were determined, and the tenant had been legally warned, in terms of the foresaid act 1555." But, independently of the Act of Sederunt, it appears to be settled at common law, that where a tenant deserts his possession for any considerable length of time, or in such a manner as to indicate a decided intention on his part to abandon his lease, the landlord is entitled to enter into possession of the farm, and to prevent the tenant from resuming possession. As the fact of desertion, however, may be ambiguous, it seems proper, in order effectually to exclude the tenant, to have the forfeiture of his lease judicially declared; and where circumstances admit of it, the action ought to be laid upon the Act of Sederunt 1756. See Taylor, 28th Nov. 1728, Mor. p. 15310; Bell on Leases, vol. i. p. 324, et seq. 4th edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. p. 119, et seq. See also Lease. Declarator. Irrigancy.

Desertion of the Diet. To desert the diet in a criminal process is judicially to abandon proceedings on the particular libel, in virtue of which the panel has been brought into court. The Court may declare the diet to be deserted: 1st, In consequence of the absence of the prosecutor at the calling of the diet, which will have the effect of freeing the panel from a prosecution on that particular libel, but will not prevent a new process being raised on the same grounds. 2d, Where some defect or informality has been discovered in the libel, or where there is a good objection to the relevancy, the Court, on the application of the prosecutor, may desert the diet pro loco et tempore, as it is expressed. In this case the prosecutor acquaints the Court and the panel, that he wishes to pass from the prosecution for the time and occasion only, but to reserve his right to insist of new, if he shall see cause; and if the Court, in the exercise of their discretion, accede to the prosecutor's motion, the desertion pro loco et tempore, does not bar the prosecutor from raising a new libel, in which the error may be corrected. The diet, however, must be deserted as to the one libel before the other can be insisted in. Lastly, If the prosecutor thinks proper entirely to abandon the prosecution, he may move the Court to desert the diet simpliciter,—a motion which will be acceded to as a matter of course, and the effect of which will be to put a final stop to all further proceedings against the panel for the same offence. The prosecutor may move for a desertion of the diet pro loco et tempore, even after a plea of guilty has been recorded. But after the jury is once sworn, no desertion pro loco et tempore is competent, and the libel, such as it is, must take its fate. The public prosecutor, however, even after a verdict of guilty has been returned by the jury, may desert the diet simpliciter, if he think proper; the consequence of which will be, that the panel will be free of punishment for his offence, and of all future question on that account. A prisoner who has run his letters, as it is termed, under the act 1701, c. 6, and who, after the expiration of the sixty days, has been served with new criminal letters for the same offence, is entitled, under the statute, to have the diet deserted simpliciter, if the libel be not prosecuted to a final sentence, within forty days after the prisoner is of new incarcerated, unless the delay has taken place at his desire. The effect of such a desertion of the diet is declared to be, that the panel shall be for ever free of all challenge or question touching that offence. The construction of this provision of the statute, however, has given rise to considerable doubts. See Hume, 102, 263, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 98, 343, et seq. See also Liberation. Diet. Criminal Prosecution.

Designation; is the addition or description of a person. It is necessary in all deeds to design or identify the parties in such a manner as to distinguish them from all others; and, in practice, this is done by setting down the title of nobility, or the name and surname of the party, with his addition or description, by his estate, profession, trade, or place of residence. The witnesses to the execution of a deed, and the writer of it (except in the case of holograph deeds), must also be named and designed in the testing clause, otherwise the deed will not be probative. The statutes regulating this subject are—1579, c. 80; 1593, c. 175; and 1681, c. 5. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 19, and tit. 20, § 25; More's Notes, p. cccc; Bank. B. i. tit. 11, § 24; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 6, et seq.; Bell on Testing of Deeds; Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 130, et seq.; vol. ii. p. 156, et seq.; Menzies' Conveyancing; Duff on Deeds; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing. Designation of a Manse and Glebe. Manses and glebes for the clergy are designed, or set apart, from the Church lands in the parish, by the presbytery of the bounds. For a detailed account of the nature and extent of these accommodations, see Manse. Glebe. After a designation by the presbytery, if the possessors of the lands, designed for manse or glebe, do not yield possession to the minister, he, on producing the designation at the Bill-Chamber, may obtain warrant for letters of horning to charge the possessors to remove; and disobedience to this charge may be followed by caption; 1572, c. 48; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 120. See, as to this article, Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 40; More's Notes, p. clxxii.; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 119, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 55, et seq.; *Jurid. Designs. As to the copyright of designs for ornamenting articles of manufacture, and for the shape and configuration of such articles, see the statutes 5 and 6 Vict., c. 100; 6 and 7 Vict., c. 65; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 104; 14 Vict., c. 8; and 15 and 16 Vict., c. 12.

Destination. The series of heirs called to the succession of heritable or moveable property, either by the provision of the law or by the will of the proprietor, is, generally speaking, termed a destination; but the term is usually applied, in a more limited sense, to a nomination of successors in a certain order, regulated by the will of the proprietor. The rules of legal succession, whether in heritage or moveables, are stated under the article Succession; and the destination of moveables, by the will of the proprietor, under the articles Substitutions, Legacy, Institute, Executor. The present article relates chiefly to destinations of heritage. An absolute proprietor of heritage is under no legal restraint as to the order in which his heirs, or successors, are to be called to succeed him, or as to the manner in which his property is to be distributed. He may substitute a son to a daughter, or an elder child to a younger one; or he may exclude all his children and prefer a stranger; and provided the destination be explicable, and properly fortified by prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, the estate will descend in the course pointed out by the proprietor. But, without entering into the peculiarities of special, or of capricious destinations, the following enumeration comprehends some of the rules with regard to the construction of the terms used in destinations, and as to the formation of ordinary destinations. (1.) A destination "to A. and his heirs," or "to A. and his heirs-at-law," is merely a confirmation of the legal disposition of the property. (2.) A destination "to A. and his heirs of line," carries the property to the heir in heritage, exclusive of the heir of conquest. (3.) The term "heirs whatsoever," is synonymous with "heirs-at-law." (4.) A destination to heirs-male excludes females. An heir-male is a person who is himself a male, and connected by males. A grandson by a daughter is not an heir-male. (5.) The heir-male of line in a destination is the heir-male, excluding the heir of conquest; Sinclair, 24th June 1766, Mor. p. 14944. (6.) "Heir-female," is the male or female heir, connected by females. In legal succession, the heir-female is the nearest heir, failing the heir-male. The son of a daughter may be the heir-female under a destination to heirs-female; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 48. (7.) A destination "to heirs-male of the body" carries the property first to the eldest son and his male descendants, then to the second son and his male descendants, and so on through the sons in succession, to the exclusion of females, and of males connected through females. (8.) A destination "to heirs-female of the granter" will carry the estate to the daughter of a son, preferably to the granter's own daughter; and the same rule applies where the destination is to the heir-female of the body of the granter. In order to carry the estate to the daughter of the granter, she must either be named or described as daughter; see the case of Bargeny, Elchies, voce Provisions to Heirs and Children, No. 2. The terms daughter and heir-female, therefore, are not synonymous; nor is daughter a vox signata at all in destinations; it merely expresses relationship; Lady Essex Ker, 13th Nov. 1810, Fac. Coll. Some conveyancers think a destination ill arranged when the estate is given, failing the sons of the maker, and their heirs-male, to the daughters of the maker in their order, and their heirs-male; or where it is given, failing heirs-male, to the heirs whomsoever of the body of the eldest son; whom failing, to the heirs whomsoever of the body of the second son, &c. In place of this, they think it preferable to call the heirs whomsoever of the body of the last heir-male in possession; by which means the daughters of the family in possession, and the heirs of their bodies, are preferred to the daughters of former branches of the destination, who, although nearer in degree to the original maker of the destination, may, when the succession opens to them, be very remotely connected with the family last in possession of the estate. (9.) When the substitute in a destination is described as second son, or as third son to the maker of the destination, that means the second or third son at the date of the deed, not at the time the succession opens. (10.) A destination to A. simply is understood to carry the property to heirs-at-law; but if it be to A., whom failing, to B. on A.'s failure, his heirs will be excluded, except in the case where A. is the maker of the destination, and, subsequently to its date, has children of his own, so as to admit of the implied condition si sine liberis. see Condition si sine liberis decesserit. (11.) A destination to A. and his heirs; whom failing, to B., brings in the whole line of descent of A. before B.; Bailie, 17th June 1766, Mor. p. 14941; and such a destination is held to call, not merely the heirs-male of A.'s body, but his heirs-male generally; Hay, 24th June 1788, Mor. p. 2315; and this notwithstanding the decision in the Roxburghe case, which proceeded on specialties. See Sir J. N. Innes, 23d June 1807, Mor. App. voce Tailzie, No. 13. (12.) A destination of lands in a contract of marriage, in favour of the "heirs and bairns," or of the "heirs and children" of the marriage, is held to import a destination to the heir-at-law; that is, to the eldest son of the marriage, when there are more children than one. The word "heirs" in such a destination is held to be the ruling term, and the introduction of the word "bairns" or "children" does not derogate from its meaning. Where, on the other hand, the destination is to the "bairns" or "children" of the marriage, the word "heirs" being omitted, all the children of the marriage succeed equally, with no preference in favour of the eldest son; Bell's Princ. § 1962, and authorities there cited; also Sandford on Heritable Succession, i. p. 172-179, and cases there cited. See also Bairns, Heirs and Bairns. (13.) In order to avoid ambiguity, and such a difficulty as occurred in the Bargeny case, it is proper for the maker of the destination to consider, whether it is his intention to call the heirs-male or the heirs-female of such a person generally, or to limit the destination to the heirs-male or female descended of the person called. Lastly, The destination is usually closed, by calling the heirs whomsoever of the granter, the object of which originally was to defeat the Crown's right as ultimus hæres, which was formerly held to open where the destination was not closed in that form. See Succession. Heirs. Conjoint Rights. Clause of Return. A destination, the members of which are laid under no restriction as to the use or enjoyment of the subject, nor under any prohibition to alter the prescribed order of succession, is called a simple destination, the only effect of which will be, that the order of succession pointed out by the deed will be observed so long as no alteration is made. But each substitute in the destination being an unlimited fiar, is entitled gratuitously to alienate the estate, or to alter the order of succession precisely as the original proprietor might have done. A simple destination, therefore, merely confers a spes successionis on the substitutes, defeasible by each member of the destination in succession; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 22. As to the effect of prohibitory, irritant, or resolute clauses in protecting destinations, see Tailzie; and with regard to the restraints on the right of making destinations imposed by entails, by contracts of marriage, or by other destinations more or less strict, or by insolvency, see, in particular, Contract of Marriage. Conjunct Rights. Bankrupt. Conjunct and Confident. Bell's Com. 5th edit. i. 44, et seq.; Bell's Princ., § 1704, et seq., 1775, et seq.; Illust. § 1704; Bell on Leases, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 142; Sandford on Heritable Succession, vol. i. p. 158; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Ross's Lect. ii. 482; Meases's Conveyancing; Duff's Conveyancing.

A subject, moveable in its nature, may be made heritable by destination, either express or implied. Thus, a personal bond taken to heirs, secluding executors, is necessarily heritable by its own terms, and not as having an heritable subject implied for it; or the materials of a building accidentally thrown down, or materials laid down for the purpose of building, or prepared to be permanently attached to a building, are held to be heritable by destination. Bell's Com. ii. 6; Bell's Princ. § 1475; Illust. ib. See Heritable and Moveable.

Destination of a Ship. In insurance law, it has been decided in Scotland that concealment of the destination of a ship voids the insurance, although the loss of the vessel should have occurred prior to the actual deviation from the voyage specified to the insurer; Bain, 20th Nov. 1783, Mor. p. 7087. Bell's Com. 5th edit. i. 621; 6th edit. p. 483. See Insurance. Deviation.

Desuetude. By the law of Scotland, acts of Parliament before the Union were held to lose their force by disuse, without any express repeal, or to go into desuetude, as it was termed, and the same is still understood to be the case with regard to the acts of Sederunt of the Court of Session. In deciding causes which turn upon the construction of the old statute law of Scotland, it is sometimes a matter of considerable difficulty to determine whether a particular statute has, or has not, gone into desuetude; Report of Lords of Session to House of Lords, 27th Feb. 1810; Printed Acts of Sederunt, p. 53. Ac- cording to Mackenzie, if a statute had fallen into desuetude before the Union, it might have been revived by a proclamation of the Privy Council; for, although the Council could not make laws, they could revive them; Mackenzie, B. i. tit. 1, § 10. No statute, however, can be abrogated by mere non-usage for the greatest length of time. There must be some positive act showing the intention of the community to repeal it by a contrary practice; and Erskine limits the right of the King and Council to revive statutes which are in disuse to the case where the usage, contrary to the statute, has not yet acquired sufficient strength to abrogate it entirely. Some authorities limit the statutes which may fall into desuetude to those relating to private rights, and hold, that statutes relating to the public policy of the kingdom, cannot be abrogated by any continuance of a contrary usage, however long. But there seems to be no sufficient reason for this distinction; and, according to the decisions, statutes relating to public policy have been held to be in desuetude by contrary usage; see Stair, B. i. tit. 1; Ersk. B. i. tit. 1, § 45, and Paterson, 6th Dec. 1810, Fac. Coll. correcting Bank. B. i. tit. 1, § 60. See Usage. Customary Law.

Detinue; in English law, was a form of action for the specific recovery of goods and chattels, or damages for the detainer. In this action the defendant was allowed the privilege of waging his law, or swearing with compurgators in his own favour. To remedy this inconvenience the action of Trover was introduced, in which the defendant has no such privilege. Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 849; Bell's Com. i. 249; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Trover.

Deviation. Under the contract of affreightment, if a vessel be compelled by stress of weather, or by a foreign enemy, or by any inevitable accident, to deviate from the appointed voyage, or to take refuge in a port not included in the destination, no claim thence arises at the instance of the freighter against the owners; and where the ship, in consequence of such accident, requires to be refitted, the master may now detain the cargo until the necessary repairs be executed, although formerly the rule was, that he was bound to find another ship in which to embark the cargo. Where the deviation is imputable to the fault of the master, the freighter has a claim for damages, in satisfaction of which he may retain the freight. Deviation, under the contract of insurance, is, strictly speaking, a departure from the course of the voyage insured, made after the voyage has begun, in contradistinction to an alteration, which is a complete abandonment of the voyage insured before its commencement, and a resolution to sail on another voyage. Any unnecessary deviation from the specified voyage, as being an alteration of the risk insured against, is held to discharge the underwriters or insurers of their responsibility, without subjecting them in any obligation to return the premium.

With regard to deviations in questions of this kind the following rules seem to be settled: 1st, It is a deviation whether the party insured be privy to it or not. 2d, The mere intention to deviate, or an engagement or instructions to do so, will not annul the insurance if the vessel never have deviated, or have been lost before arriving at the proposed point of deviation; Bell's Com. i. 622. See to the contrary, however, Bain, 20th Nov. 1783, Mor. p. 7087. 3d, If the deviation be actually committed, the underwriters are discharged, although the vessel has returned to her course, without any apparent injury or change of risk. 4th, Where the ship has liberty to call at a port not named, but described as upon a particular coast, or in a particular country lying in the course of the voyage, it will be a deviation if the vessel go to a port out of the usual course of the voyage, although the port may be on the coast or in the country mentioned. 5th, Where the deviation is unavoidable, or necessary for the safety of the ship or cargo, it will not discharge the underwriters, provided it be made in the shortest and most expeditious manner. Lastly, The onus probandi lies on the underwriters, who allege that a deviation has taken place. Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 976; Bell's Com. 5th edit.; 6th edit. p. 483; i. 622, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 241, 435, 492, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 435, 492; Smith, Dow's App. Cases, ii. 538. See Insurance.

Devise; is an English law term, signifying properly, a gift of lands, &c., by a last will and testament,—a form of conveyance mortis causa which the English law admits. The giver is called the devisor; and he to whom the lands are given is called the devisee. The term was formerly particularly applied to bequests of lands, but is now generally used for the gift of any legacies whatever; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. By the law of Scotland, lands cannot be conveyed in the form of a last will and testament. See Testament. Settlement.

Devolution; is a term sometimes applied to the reference made by two or more arbiters who differ in opinion, to an oversman or umpire, to determine the difference. To confer this power on arbiters, an express clause in the submission is necessary. The term is also applied to the devolution of a purchase made under articles of roup upon the next highest offeror, on the failure of the highest offeror to find caution for payment of the price within the time limited by the articles. Bell's Com. ii. 274; Jurid. Styles, ii. 193. See Arbitration. Clause of Devolution. Roup.

Devolutum Jus. See Jus Devolutum.

Dice. See Gaming.

Diem Clanit Extremum; was the name given to a writ which might be issued from Exchequer, where a Crown debtor had died before any proceedings, by extent or otherwise, had been instituted against him. By this writ, the Sheriff was directed to inquire when and where the Crown debtor died, and what goods, debts, effects, or sums of money he had at the time of his death; and carefully to appraise and extend the same, and to seize them for the Queen's use, to be retained until the Crown be satisfied of the debt; and that the Sheriff should carefully keep what he had so seized, until he received further command; Bell's Com. 5th edit. ii. 51; 6th edit. p. 623; Bell's Princ. § 2381. The forms of writs of extent are now abolished by 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56. See Crown Debt. Extent.

Dies Inceptus Pro Completo Habetur. See Computation of Time.

Dies Interpellat Pro Homine. Where the debtor in an obligation is bound to implement it on a day certain, he will be in mora, if he allow the stipulated day to elapse without performance, nam dies interpellat pro homine; i.e., the arrival of the day is equivalent to a requisition by the creditor; Stair, B. i. tit. 3, § 7; tit. 17, § 15 and 18. See Mora.

Dies Incertus Pro Conditione Habetur. An obligation exigible on the arrival of an uncertain day, i.e., of a day which may never come, is held to be conditional. See Conditional Obligation.

Dies Cedit, and Dies Venit; are expressions borrowed from the Roman law, and used in reference to the fulfilment of a conditional obligation. Dies cedit, is used whenever the obligation is due; dies venit whenever implement may be demanded. If implement of the obligation be deferred to a determinate day, then it is said, dies statim cedit, sed non venit; but if it depend on the fulfilment of a condition, it is said, dies nec cedit, nec venit nisi conditio extiterit. The same rule holds, when it depends upon the arrival of an uncertain day; for dies incertus pro conditione habetur; that is, a day, the arrival of which is absolutely uncertain, since it may never arrive; e.g., the day on which a person shall attain majority, or any other specified age, whereas, the day of a man's death, is a day which, sooner or later, must arrive, and therefore, in this sense, it is not uncertain. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 6; Kames' Equity, 387. See Conditional Obligation.

Diets of Compareance; are the days to which a party in a civil or criminal process is cited to appear in Court. In all ordinary summonses in civil actions in the Court of

Session, there were formerly two diets of compearance; the origin of which was, that formerly there were two summonses instead of one. The second summons was long ago dispensed with; but the former practice was so far preserved, that all ordinary summonses specified two diets of compearance, one at the distance of twenty-one days after execution, and the other six days after the first, the practical effect of which was, that the inducia of the summons were twenty-seven days; and, accordingly, the statute 50 Geo. III., c. 112, § 27, enacted "that, in actions at present requiring two diets of appearance against persons within Scotland, there shall be only one diet of twenty-seven days." But, if the defender was furth of Scotland, the summons still required two diets, one of sixty and the other of fifteen days, in all seventy-five days, until the passing of the Judicature Act (1825), whereby it is enacted, that from and after 11th November 1825, the practice of citing defenders on two diets shall in all cases cease, and that all summonses are thenceforward to proceed on one diet,—viz., privileged summonses against defenders within Scotland on one diet of six days, other summonses against defenders residing in Orkney or Shetland, a diet of forty days, and for all other persons within Scotland a diet of twenty-seven days, and for defenders out of Scotland a diet of sixty days; it being thereby declared, that where a person not having a dwelling-house in Scotland, occupied by his family or servants, shall have left his usual place of residence, and shall have been absent therefrom for forty days, without having left notice where he is to be found within Scotland, he shall be held as absent from Scotland, and charged or cited accordingly; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 53; Ross's Lect. . . 536. See Summons. Privileged Summons. Bills of Signet Letters. Edictal Citation. Calling of a Summons.

By the act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 21 (1850), the inducia of summonses are shortened in the case of persons within Scotland from twenty to fourteen days, and in the case of persons in Orkney or Shetland or furth of Scotland, from forty and sixty days respectively to twenty-one days. In the Sheriff-courts six days is now the period of inducia; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80. Edicts require ten days.

Diet in a criminal prosecution.—The diet of appearance in criminal cases is peremptory. The indictment, or the criminal letters, must be called on the precise day to which the accused is cited; 1578, c. 79; otherwise the instance perishes, and a new libel must be raised. But although the diet is peremptory, yet, after the day of appearance has once arrived (but not sooner), the diet may be continued by an act of the Court, even in absence of the parties, and without calling them. In like manner, where both parties are present, the Court may, for its own convenience, or on sufficient reason stated, either for the prosecutor or for the accused, continue the diet. In all such cases, however, the continuation must be to another day certain, for the diet cannot be continued indefinitely, or sine die. See Continuation of the Diet. The prosecutor as well as the accused must be personally present at the calling of the diet; and, although objections to the legality of the citation may be discussed in absence of the accused, no other step in the trial of the offence libelled can be taken in absence of either of the parties. Where the prosecutor is absent, the Court may desert the diet, and thus the instance will be lost, and no farther proceedings can take place on that libel. And, if the prosecutor be a private party, the Court may also declare his bond of caution to insist to be forfeited. See Desertion of the Diet. Criminal Prosecution. If the accused be absent at the calling of the diet, no step whatever towards trial of the crime libelled can be taken; but sentence of fugitation or outlawry may be pronounced, in virtue of which the person, in law, of the accused is said to be forfeited, and he may be denounced a rebel. See Fugitation. Denunciation. If both parties be absent at the calling the diet, in strictness the surety for the prosecutor ought to forfeit his bond of caution, although the Court is not in use, ex proprio motu, to declare the bond forfeited. And, on the other hand, the accused, if he has found caution for his appearance (but not otherwise), is liable to sentence of outlawry, and to have the bail-bond declared forfeited if he do not appear; and this may be done by the act of the Court itself, on account of the breach of the engagement to appear, undertaken by the accused in the bail-bond. There are many instances in our former practice of outlawry under such circumstances. Hume, ii. 66, 263, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 343, et seq. See Bail. Criminal Prosecution.

Digest; the name given to the Pandects of the Civil or Roman law, called the Digest, as containing "Legalia præcepta excellentè digesta." Du Cange. See Pandects. Civil Law.

Dignities. Dignities have been divided into superior and inferior. The titles of duke, earl, baron, &c., are the highest names of dignity; and those of baronet, knight, &c., the lowest. Nobility only can give so high a title of dignity as to supply the want of a surname in legal proceedings. No temporal dignity of any foreign nation, can give a man a higher title in Great Britain, than that of esquire; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. In former times, in this country, honours and dignities were annexed to territorial property rather than to the person; and, when the land was alienated, the dignity passed with it. But now dignities and honours are strictly personal, descendible to the heir in the patent, and not transferable by voluntary alienation, nor attachable for debt. The landed estate of a peer, if unentailed, even although it be the estate from which his title is taken, may be sold, and is open to the diligence of his creditors, in precisely the same manner as the estate of a commoner. Bell's Com. i. 124.

Dilapidation of Benefices. Prior to the Reformation, the clergy in Scotland seem to have exercised the right of granting feus of Church lands, which had the effect of greatly depreciating the value of the benefice, to their successors. Several acts of the Scotch Parliament were passed to check this species of dilapidation; and by statutes subsequent to the Reformation, churchmen are prohibited from granting feus of their benefices, or from charging them with burdens to the prejudice of their successors. Their power of granting leases was also restrained, and subjected to certain regulations; and the clergy were required to find security to leave their benefices in as good a condition as that in which they found them at their entry. See, in particular, the statutes 1564, c. 88; 1581, c. 101; 1585, c. 11; 1606, c. 3; 1617, c. 5; 1621, c. 15. See also Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 17, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 7, et seq.; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 110, et seq. With regard to the minister's right to the use of his glebe, and the obligation under which he lies to execute certain repairs on his manse, see Glebe. Manse. By the law of England, the incumbent is bound to preserve the benefice, and to transmit it unimpaired to his successor. Thus, he must keep the houses belonging to the benefice in sufficient repair; and if he refuse to do so, the bishop may sequester the profits of the benefice for that purpose. He must not destroy the woods, trees, &c., nor cut timber, except for necessary repairs. Such dilapidations may even be the ground of deprivation. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Dilatory Defence; is a plea offered by a defender for eliding the conclusions of the action, without entering on the merits of the cause; and the effect of which, if sustained, is to absolve from the lis pendens, without necessarily cutting off the pursuer's ground of action. Such are defences founded on informalities in the manner in which the cause has been introduced into the Court, or on the pursuer's want of title, and the like. Stair, B. iv. tit. 39, § 13; App. § 6; Shand's Prac. pp. 288, 317; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. p. 28, et seq.; MacLaurin's Forms of Sheriff-Court Pro- cess, p. 114; Barclay's M'Glash. Sheriff-Court Prac. 204. See Defences.

Diligence. This term is used in three different and unconnected meanings;—1st, It is with propriety used to express the nature and extent of the care and diligence incumbent on the parties to a contract with regard to the preservation of the subject-matter of the contract; 2d, It means the warrants issued by courts for enforcing the attendance of witnesses, or the production of writings; and, 3d, The term is applied generally to the process of law, by which person, lands, or effects are attached on execution, or in security for debt. The reason of the use of the term in the two latter senses is not obvious; and the explanation given by Stair does not seem satisfactory. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 41, § 1; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 763.

I. Diligence prestable under contracts. In the Roman law, diligence in preserving a thing committed to one's care, or in executing a commission, was threefold:—1st, Ordinary diligence, such as a man of common understanding exercises in his own affairs; 2d, Exact diligence, being that which men of ordinary industry and management practise; and, 3d, Most exact diligence, such as the most industrious and expert men exercise in their own affairs. For the rules of our law upon this subject, see Culpa. See also Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 21; Bank. B. i. tit. 23, § 59, et seq.; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 923, 932; Bell's Princ. § 232, et seq.; Illust. § 243; Ross's Lect. ii. 383.

II. Diligence against witnesses, and for recovering writings. When a judge allows a proof of the whole, or of any particular branch of a cause, and for that purpose grants commission to take the proof, he at the same time grants to both parties letters of diligence for citing witnesses, and possessors of writings (or havers, as they are technically called), to appear before the commissioner in order to be examined, or for the purpose of producing the writings. In case the citation, given in virtue of these letters of diligence, was disobeyed, the Court might then issue what were called letters of second diligence, containing a warrant to apprehend the witnesses or havers, who had been disobedient, and to bring them before the commissioner; the witness requiring such compulsion not being entitled to the expense he may have incurred by attendance; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 30. See also A. S. 21st December 1765. On cause shown, the letters of second diligence were often combined with the first; but in practice they were not acted upon, until a certificate of disobedience to the first citation was obtained from the commissioner. Now, by 13th and 14th Vict., c. 36, § 25, a copy of any interlocutor in the Court of Session, granting a commission and diligence, certified by the clerk to the havers, has the same effect as the extract under the former practice; and the same is now the practice in the Sheriff-courts; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 11. Witnesses and havers residing beyond the Sheriff's jurisdiction, may be cited on the warrant being indorsed by the sheriff-clerk of the county in which they reside. In jury causes, warrants of all kinds for citing witnesses and havers, are called letters of diligence; and the Jury Court (now merged in the Court of Session) was empowered to enforce the attendance of witnesses and havers in the same manner with the Court of Session; 59 Geo. III., c. 35, § 28. In the Jury Courts, it is still the practice to take out letters of first and second diligence as formerly; Dickson on Evidence, pp. 942, 943. In like manner, the Court of Justiciary, after a libel has been raised, will grant diligence, if required, for the recovery of writings, or other articles meant to be used in evidence, either by the prosecutor or the accused; Hume, ii. 154, 398. The letters are issued by the clerk of Court; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, § 2. See, on this subject, Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 71, and tit. 2, § 30; Bank. B. iv. tit. 24, § 59; Stair, B. 4, tit. 41, § 6, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, vol. iii. p. 781, et seq.; Dickson on Evidence, pp. 628, 941, et seq. See Witness. Evidence. Commission to take Proof. Deposition. Haver.

III. Diligence of creditors. The diligence at the instance of creditors is divisible into that against the heritage, the moveables, and the person of the debtor. It is sufficient here to specify the different forms of proceeding, referring to the particular articles for a more detailed account of each of the diligences mentioned in the following enumeration. Some of these forms are not usually called diligences (the application of which term, in practice, seems rather arbitrary); but all of them, in point of effect, operate as attachments, and may therefore, not improperly, be classed under this general head. Indeed, it is not always easy to draw the distinction between a diligence and an action. The diligence, for example, of poinding the ground, has been said to partake more of the nature of a real action than a diligence (per Lord Balgray, in Campbell v. Paul, 13th Jan. 1835, 13 S. 241); and other processes of execution are no less ambiguous. One important characteristic, however, of a diligence is, that its warrant must in every case be a debt or obligation, duly constituted by a liquid document or by a decree, or by an action in which decree is sought; in which last case, although the intermediate nexus is effectual, yet the ultimate efficacy of the diligence is contingent, on decree being obtained in the depending suit. The diligence against heritage comprises,—1st, Inhibition, by means of which the debtor is prevented from selling or burdening his heritage, to the prejudice of the creditor who has used the inhibition. 2d, Adjudication, by which the property is judicially transferred, redeemably in the first instance, to the creditor in lieu of his debt. 3d, Adjudication in implement, by which the property is irredeemably transferred to the creditor, in implement of a previous obligation to convey that property to the creditor. 4th, Ranking and sale, a process which operates as a general attachment for behoof of creditors, and under which the property is sold, and the price judicially distributed amongst the creditors. 5th, The action of mails and duties, which, although an attachment of moveables, is classed here as being the consequence of an heritable right, and of the nature of a diligence. By this process, an heritable creditor, or the holder of a personal right to the land, may attach the rents. 6th, The action and letters of poinding of the ground (which is of a similar character), by which creditors in what are called debita fundi may point the goods on the property, and also the effects of the tenants, to the extent of the rents due by them; and, lastly, Mercantile Sequestration, which is a congeries of all diligences, whether against heritable or moveable property, being a general attachment and transfer of the heritable, as well as the moveable or personal estate, for behoof of all the creditors. The diligence against moveables consists of,—1st, Arrestment, by which the debtor's effects, or the debts due to him, are attached in the hands of third parties; and the subsequent action of Forthcoming, by which the property of the goods arrested is transferred to the creditor. 2d, Poinding, which is in principle an adjudication of the effects to the creditor, although in practice it is nothing more than an appraisal, and judicial sale, of them for behoof of the creditor. 3d, Mercantile Sequestration, as above explained, is also a general diligence against moveables. 4th, Sequestration of a tenant's effects, by a landlord, under his right of hypothec, may also be classed under this head, as being of the nature of a diligence under which the effects may be judicially sold for payment of the rent, which is due, or attached or hypothecated, in security of the current rent; and, 5th, Ejection, by which a tenant at the issue of his tack may be compelled to quit possession. Personal diligence comprehends,—1st, Letters of Horning and of Caption, by which a debtor may be charged to pay or perform, in terms of his obligation, and, on failure, imprisoned until he do so. The use of these letters, however, is almost entirely superseded by the Personal Diligence

Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, which authorizes warrant to charge, arrest, and poind to be inserted in extract decrees. To this diligence are analogous the act of warding issued by the magistrates of royal burghs, and the warrant of imprisonment (where now competent), granted by justices of the peace, or by Sheriffs under the Small Debt acts. 2d, Under the same head may be classed the meditatio fugæ warrant, in virtue of which a debtor, who intends leaving Scotland to avoid performance of his obligation, may be apprehended and detained until (according to the nature of the debt) he either find caution de judicio sisti, or judicatum solvi; and, 3d, The Border Warrant, being a warrant issued by the Sheriffs of the counties adjacent to the English borders, for the apprehension and incarceration of any foreigner (i.e., any person not subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court) against whom a debt has been sworn, and who may be found within the jurisdiction of the judge who grants the warrant, until he find caution judicio sisti,—a proceeding which seems contrary to that comitas by which the law of Scotland is in general distinguished; and which may subject a stranger to the jurisdiction of an inferior judge, and expose him to the hardship and difficulty of finding caution, at the suit of any one who may choose to commit perjury. See those several diligences more fully explained in separate articles under their respective heads. See also Bell's Com. i. 3, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 55, et seq., and tits. 11 and 12; and B. iv. tit. 3, § 9, et seq.; Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 234, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 331, 342, 1231, 1468, 2355, 2381, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 342; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. The second branch (as it is usually called) of the act 1621, c. 18, provides for the case of voluntary payments, or conveyances, made by the debtor in defraud of inchoate, or begun diligence, whether against heritage or moveables, or the person of the debtor. According to the construction put on the statute by adjudged cases, it authorizes the reduction of all voluntary deeds granted after such diligence shall have been begun, as law has appointed for the attachment of the subject conveyed by the debtor; provided the diligence was specially directed against that subject, and that the debtor was notoriously insolvent at the date of the deed done, or of the payment made in defraud of the diligence. But, if the insolvency be secret, and unknown to the person favoured by the deed, the challenge will not be successful; Bell's Com. ii. 199; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 37. See Litigiosity. Mora. Although a bill of exchange may be transferred by indorsation, even after the term of payment, the mere indorsation will not carry the right to the diligence which the indorser may have done on the bill. To accomplish that, there must be a special assignation of the diligence; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 403; Thomson on Bills, 2, 47, 81, 206, 242, 264, 349, 549, 686, 2d edit.

Diminution of Rental. It is a question of great importance in entail law, whether an heir of entail in possession, can grant leases of the entailed estate, at rents lower than the estate was let for at his entry. The heir's powers, in this respect, must necessarily depend in a great degree on the terms of the particular deed of entail. But, independently of the special terms of the deed, it seems now to be settled, that where the entail contains a prohibition to alienate, the heir in possession, in letting leases, must act bona fide, and will not be permitted fraudulently to diminish the rental to the prejudice of his successors. Sandford on Entails, p. 200; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, vol. i. p. 85. See Entail. Grassum.

Diocese; is the circuit of a bishop's ecclesiastical jurisdiction. England is divided ecclesiastically into two provinces, viz., Canterbury and York, each of which is subdivided into dioceses, every diocese is subdivided into archdeaconries, and every archdeaconry into parishes; Tomlins', h. t. When the church government of Scotland was episcopal, there were two archbishops; the archbishop of St Andrews, who was called the primate of all Scotland; and the archbishop of Glasgow, who was called the primate of Scotland; and under them there were twelve bishops, who had particular dioceses; Connell on Tithes, i. 38. The ecclesiastical subdivisions of Scotland are now Presbyterian. See Church of Scotland. Church Judicatures.

Directa Actio. See Actio directa.

Disability; in English law, an incapacity in a man to take any benefit which he might have otherwise enjoyed, such as inheriting lands. The disability may happen through the act of his ancestor, of himself, or of God, or of the law; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Discharge. To discharge an obligation is to extinguish it. Obligations may be extinguished by payment or performance on the part of the debtor, or by the mere consent of the creditor without performance, or by compensation, novation, delegation, or confusion. The discharge may be either verbal or in writing, according to the nature of the obligation. Thus, an obligation contracted verbally may be dissolved by a verbal discharge; but a written obligation requires a written discharge, agreeably to the rule, that the same solemnities which are requisite in the constitution of an obligation are necessary in its extinction,—unumquodque eodem modo dissolvitur quo colligatur. See Payment. Compensa- tion. Novation. Delegation. Confusion. In the technical language of the Scotch law, the term discharge is usually applied to the written instrument by which the creditor discharges the debtor of his obligation. The object of such a discharge is to liberate the obligant; and whether the particular obligation legally requires a written discharge or not, it is desirable, if possible, to have the evidence of its extinction in writing. The clauses usually inserted in a formal deed of this description are,—1st, The narrative, in which the obligation, as originally undertaken, is narrated. 2d, A clause specifying the manner in which it has been dissolved, whether by payment, performance, compensation, simple consent of the creditor, or otherwise. 3d, The clause of discharge, which is the essential clause of the deed, to which the others are merely subservient. In this clause the proper terms of discharge applicable to the particular obligation must be used. The debt or obligation, the document of debt itself, and all action or execution which has followed or may follow upon it, ought to be distinctly and separately discharged. 4th, The clause of warrandice, the ordinary warrandice being absolute, unless where the discharge is gratuitous, when it is usually from fact and deed only. 5th, A clause of delivery of the grounds of debt. The debtor is entitled to have these delivered up to him; and where particular circumstances render that impracticable, the fact ought to be mentioned, and the creditor taken bound to deliver them. 6th, The clause of registration, which is not essential to the discharge, and is sometimes omitted. And, lastly, The testing clause, which does not differ from the testing clause of any other regular deed. A written discharge is usually a separate deed, and it must be written upon stamped paper. But to this rule there is an exception in the case of receipts written on bills of exchange, promissory-notes, &c., where the bills, notes, &c., have been themselves written on the legal stamps, and also in the case of "receipts or discharges, indorsed or otherwise, written upon or contained in any bond, &c., or other security; or any conveyance, deed, or instrument whatever, duly stamped according to the laws in force at the date thereof, acknowledging the receipt of the consideration-money therein expressed, or the receipt of any principal money, interest, or annuity thereby secured;" 55 Geo. III., c. 184, schedule annexed. In virtue of this exception, the discharge of a bond is sometimes written upon the back of the principal bond; and lest such a discharge should, in any case, be thought not to fall within the exception in the statute, it is sometimes the practice at the same time to grant a receipt for the sum on a separate stamped receipt, referring to the discharge indorsed on the bond. Receipt and discharge stamps are now regulated by the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 59, 1853. With regard to the discharges of heritable securities, real burdens, &c., see Heritable Securities. Burdens. Renunciation. It is a rule in the construction of discharges which contain both general and particular clauses, for ascertaining their extent, that the general clause is not to be extended to subjects or claims of a different kind, or of greater importance than any of the particulars mentioned in the special clause. But a discharge which is entirely general, without mentioning any special debt or claim, will receive a more liberal interpretation, although even such a discharge will not be extended to debts which are not presumed to have been in contemplation either of the granter or grantee, such as obligations of relief from cautionary engagements not yet paid to the creditor, obligations of warrandice not yet incurred, or obligations ad facta præstanda. Neither will such a general discharge comprehend, by implication, debts due to the granter by the grantee, and assigned by the granter prior to the date of the discharge, even although the assignation has not at that time been completed by intimation. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 9; Bank. B. i. tit. 24, § 19; Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 2, and B. iv. tit. 49, § 34. In all yearly or termly payments, such as of rent, feu-duties, interest of money, salaries, pensions, and the like, three consecutive discharges of the yearly or termly duties, raise a legal presumption that all preceding termly duties have been regularly paid. But the discharges must be discharges in full of the respective termly duties, and the three terms must be consecutive. Thus the presumption will not be created by two discharges, although they should contain the duties of three or more terms. Nor is the presumption inferred from two discharges by the ancestor, and a third by the heir, even although they be for consecutive terms, unless it appear that the heir knew of the two former discharges. Neither do three consecutive discharges by a tutor or administrator for the creditor, raise the presumption, except as to the terms falling within the period of his administration. A bond granted for arrears of rent or interest will not be presumed to be discharged by three consecutive discharges of subsequent termly duties; and, on the same principle, where the creditor has taken a decree against the debtor for the arrears, the debt covered by the decree will not be affected by three consecutive discharges of posterior years or terms. The implied discharge founded on three consecutive termly discharges, being a presumptio juris only, may be elided by the debtor's oath. Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 2, and B. iv. tit. 40, § 35; More's Notes, p. cxxii.; Brodie's Sup. 945; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 10; Bank. B. i. tit. 24, § 13; Bell on Leases, vol. ii. p. 21, 4th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 582, et seq., 256, et seq.; Bell's Illust. 256 and 582; Thomson on Bills, 2d edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Kames' Equity, 157. Discharge of a Bankrupt under a Sequestration. Under the Bankrupt Statute 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, 1856, a bankrupt may, at any time after the meeting held after his examination, petition for discharge, provided every creditor shall concur in the petition. He may also present a petition to that effect on the expiration of six months from the date of awarding the sequestration, provided a majority in number, and four-fifths in value, of the creditors concur in the petition; and after twelve months, with the concurrence of a majority in number, and two-thirds in value, of the creditors; and after eighteen months, provided a majority in number and value concur. He may also present such petition after two years from the date of sequestration without any consent of creditors. In each case the petition is intimated in the Gazette, and to each creditor; and after twenty-one days, if no opposition is made, the bankrupt is found entitled to a discharge; but if opposition is made, the objections shall be judged of, and the discharge granted, or refused, or deferred, or granted with such conditions annexed as the justice of the case may require. See Statute § 146, et seq.

Disclaimer; in English law, is a plea containing an express denial or renunciation of a thing. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Disclamation; signifies a vassal's disavowal or disclamation of a person as a superior, whether the person so disclaimed be the superior or not. A vassal who deliberately disclaims his superior on frivolous grounds incurs a forfeiture of the fee. This is a rule applicable to all feudal tenures; and, according to our more ancient law, disclamation, even as to a part of the fee, subjected the vassal to the loss of the whole. But now a probable ground of ignorance on the part of the vassal, or a mistake either in point of law or in point of fact, or any colourable excuse, will be sufficient to protect him against this forfeiture. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 5, § 51; Stair, B. ii. tit. 11, § 29; More's Notes, p. cccclxxviii.; Bank. B. ii. tit. 11, § 24; Macenzie, B. ii. tit. 5, § 9. Discretion. It is a rule of the law of England, that where anything is left to another to be done according to his discretion, the construction of the law is, that it must be done with sound discretion, and according to law; and that rule being founded on a principle universally applicable, has been fully recognised in the law of Scotland. See Tomlins, h. t.

Discussion. This is a technical term in the law of Scotland, and may be applied either to the discussion of a principal debtor, or to the discussion of heirs.

I. Discussion of a principal debtor. Formerly, when a cautioner was bound simply as cautioner, and not conjunctly and severally with the principal debtor, he might insist that, before the creditor used diligence against him, the principal debtor should be discussed; that is, not merely that the debt should be demanded, but that the creditor should carry personal diligence against the principal debtor the length of a registered denunciation on letters of horning,—that he should proceed against his moveables by poinding or by arrestment and furthcoming, and against his heritage by adjudication and sale. The cautioner, however, might be sued in the same summons with the principal debtor; and when decree was obtained, the Court superseded execution against the cautioner until the principal debtor was discussed. When the principal debtor and the cautioner were taken bound, jointly and severally, the creditor might proceed against either of them; for, in that case, the cautioner had not the benefit of discussion, except in the case of a cautioner for another that he should perform a fact, who was in no case liable until the principal obligant was discussed. Where the principal debtor was out of the country, and had no effects within the jurisdiction of the courts of Scotland, the cautioner, even although he was bound simply as cautioner, could not insist that the principal debtor should be discussed in a foreign country. Bank. B. i. tit. 23, § 30; Elams, 7th Dec. 1757, Mor. p. 2110. See, on this subject, Stair, B. i. tit. 17, § 4, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cxliii.; Brodie's Supp. 945; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 61, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 252, et seq.; Bell's Illust. § 252; Ross's Lect. i. 77; Bell's Com. i. 347; Menzies' Conveyancing. See also Beneficium Ordinis. Cautionary.

II. Discussion of heirs. All heirs who have incurred a representation of their ancestor, are liable universally for his debts; but they may insist on being sued in a certain order. In the case of obligations relative to a particular subject, the heir who succeeds to that subject, as being liable in any burden chargeable against it, may be sued without discussing any other heir. So also, where a special heir is burdened with a debt, the creditor must discuss that heir before he can insist against the heir-at-law. But in general obligations, in which the debtor expresses no intention of charging any special heir or estate, the following is the legal order in which the heirs must be discussed:—1st, The heir of line, as being the heir-general by the most universal representation. 2d, the heir of conquest; and, 3d, the heir-male, both of whom succeed to a lesser universitas. 4th, Heirs of tailzie and provision, by simple destination, where they represent the debtor; and, lastly, Heirs under marriage-contracts, where they are not themselves creditors, in virtue of the contract under which they have succeeded. See Bank. B. iii. tit. 5, § 60, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 52. Heirs-portioners, while they remain solvent, are only liable for their respective shares of the ancestor's debts. But, on the bankruptcy of any one of them, the creditor may, after discussing her, insist for her share of the debt against the rest. They are not, however, liable in solidum, for the share of the bankrupt heir, but only in so far as they are gainers by their predecessor's succession; Ersk. ibid. § 53. By discussing an heir is meant, charging him to enter; and if he do not renounce the succession, obtaining decree against him, and raising diligence both against his person and his estate, whether belonging to himself or derived from his ancestor, as in the case of the discussion of a cautioner. If the heir-at-law, or any of the other heirs, renounce the succession, his renunciation protects him from all diligence against his person or his own estate; and if there be no estate belonging to the ancestor, which the renunciation leaves open to the creditor's diligence, then he may proceed against the other heirs in their order. But, before getting decree against any of the subsidiary heirs, the creditor must assign to him all the diligence and decrees affecting the subjects belonging to the original debtor. The subsidiary heir has the benefit of discussion, although he has incurred the passive title of behaviour as heir, because that passive title cannot be extended farther than the heir's actual service, in the particular character in which he has acted as heir, would be; and such service would be no bar to the benefit of discussion; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 53. Where an heir who is liable only subsidiarie has paid a debt due by the ancestor, he has an action of relief against the heir primarily liable. And this rule will apply, even although the document of debt subject all the heirs of the debtor in payment, "without the benefit of discussion," such a clause being introduced for the benefit of the creditor, and not being intended to injure the right of relief competent to the one order of heirs against the other; Bank. B. iii. tit. 5, § 70; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 8, § 53. See also, as to this article, Stair, B. iii. tit. 5, § 17, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cccxlvii.; Jurid. Styles, vol. ii., p. 22, 2d edit.; Sandford on Entails, p. 256; Ross's Lect. i. 74, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1935; Menzies' Conveyancing. Although the executors or next of kin of a deceased person, as being his heirs in mobilibus, are primarily liable for all his moveable debts, yet the heir in heritage, when required to pay a moveable debt, is not entitled to insist that the executors shall be previously discussed. The heir who pays has a claim of relief against the executor; but the creditor is at liberty to proceed at once against the heir without discussion. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 48. See also Heir. Executor.

Disfranchising; signifies the depriving a person of the rights and privileges of a free citizen or subject. Tomlins' Dict. A. t.

Disgradation, Deposition, or Degradation; the stripping a person for ever of a dignity or degree of honour, and taking away the title, badge, and privileges thereof. Enc. Brit.

Disabilitation; is a term sometimes used by our older law authorities, and signifies the corruption of blood consequent upon a conviction for treason. See Dirleton and Stewart, h. t.; 1 Hume, 549. See Corruption of Blood. Treason.

Dishonour of a Bill. To dishonour a bill is to refuse to accept it when it is presented for acceptance, or to fail to pay it on the day on which it falls due. Bell's Com. i. 415, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 340; Bell's Illust. § 340; Thomson on Bills; *Jurid. Disjunction of Parishes. The Court of Session, as commissioners for the plantation of kirks and the valuation of teinds, have the power of disjoining or dividing large parishes, or annexing portions of one parish to another, not only quoad sacra, but quoad omnia; and of erecting new churches, provided the disjunction or annexation is made with consent of three-fourths of the heritors in the parish, reckoning the votes, not by the number of heritors, but by their valued rent within the parish. Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 21, and B. ii. tit.

10, § 64; Bank. B. ii. tit. 8, § 47. See Parish. Annexation.

Disorderly House; a house of ill fame, kept for the resort and commerce of lewd persons of both sexes. "It has not, in any late instance, been thought necessary to curb the vice of incontinence by the public example of a criminal prosecution. It is not, however, to be doubted, that the keeping of an open and notorious house of lewdness, for the reception of loose and dissolute visitors, is of itself such an offence against public decency and the quiet of the neighbourhood, as is punishable at common law (and of this there are daily examples in the burgh courts), with imprisonment or whipping, or banishment from the vicinity to which the scandal or disturbance has been given;" Hume, vol. i. p. 478; 2 Swinton's Rep. 128, 236, 279. See Fornication. Nuisance.

Disparagement; inequality in blood, honour, dignity, or otherwise. Under the casualty of marriage in ward-holding, if the superior required the heir to make an unsuitable or disparaging marriage, he or she might legally refuse. The disparity might be either in rank or in years, or in mental or in personal accomplishments. The heir was not bound to accept a person of inferior degree, or who was much senior in years, or whose mental capacity was defective, or who was "lame or blind, or dumb or deaf, or defective or redundant in any member." But mere disparity of fortune was not of itself a sufficient justification of the heir's refusal. Stair, B. ii. tit. 4, § 59; Bank. B. ii. tit. 4, § 59; Skene de Verb. Sig. h. t. See Avail of Marriage. Ward-holding.

Dispensation, Clause of. Where heritable subjects lay locally discontinuous, or where the progresses of title-deeds to several parcels of land comprehended in one Crown charter, were different, a clause of dispensation was sometimes inserted, specifying a particular place at which it should be sufficient to take infeftment for the whole lands, and other subjects, however discontinuous or dissimilar, and dispensing with any other symbols than earth and stone. The Crown alone could competently grant such a dispensation. More's Notes on Stair, p. xcii. ; Menzies' Lect. See Union.

As by the act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 35, § 1, 1845, the ceremony of infeftment on the lands is superseded, a clause of dispensation is no longer necessary.

Disposition. In its general acceptation, a disposition is an unilateral deed of alienation, by which a right to property, either heritable or moveable, is conveyed. The disposition most frequently used in practice is that by which heritable property is conveyed to a purchaser; but a disposition of moveables is also a well-known deed; and where a person wishes to regulate his whole succession, heritable as well as moveable, he may do so by a general disposition and settlement.

I. Of the disposition of heritage. The modern disposition is a deed of alienation, by which heritable property is conveyed to a purchaser, or to an heir, for onerous causes, or gratuitously. The disponent or maker of the deed "sells and disposes," or, where the deed is gratuitous, "gives, grants, and disposes," the subject of the deed to the receiver, who is technically called the disponent. As contradistinguished from a charter, a disposition may be said to be the deed by which the feudal right or fee constituted by the charter, is transmitted to a purchaser or new proprietor, a distinction to which Erskine does not appear to have sufficiently attended; see Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 19; Bell on the Purchaser's Title, p. 13. See also Charter. In the ordinary case, the disposition contains the following clauses:—1st, The narrative, called also the inductive clause, containing the names of the disponent and disponent, and stating the cause of granting the deed; and, where it is an onerous deed, this clause usually contains an acknowledgment of the receipt of the price or consideration, and a discharge of it. 2d, The dispositive clause, containing words of de presenti conveyance, the destination of the subject and its description. If any real burden is to be imposed, or if the right is to be otherwise qualified by any conditions or limitations, they must be inserted in this clause. 3d, A clause obliging the disponent to infest the disponent by two manners of holding, the one de se, the other a se de superiore suo. 4th, A Procuratory of resignation, for the purpose of enabling the disponent to complete a public right—i.e., to become the vassal of the disponent's superior. 5th, A clause of warrandice; the warrandice, where the deed is onerous, being absolute. 6th, An assignment to the title-deeds and rents of the subject, with a clause of absolute warrandice of the assignment, in so far as concerns the rents and profits. 7th, An obligation to free the disponent from all public burdens exigible from the subject prior to the term of his entry. 8th, A clause, bearing that the disponent has delivered the title-deeds of the subject to the disponent. 9th, The ordinary clause of registration, both for preservation and execution. 10th, A precept of sasine, for enabling the disponent to obtain infeftment under the deed. The precept is what is termed indefinite—i.e., it is a precept which may be the warrant for an infeftment, to be holden base of the disponent, or of an infeftment which may be afterwards rendered public by a charter of confirmation from the disponent's superior. Lastly, The deed is authenticated by a testing clause in the usual form.

The clauses formerly in use are shortened by the act 10 and 11 Vict., c. 48, 1847, and some are dispensed with by the Titles to Land Act, 21 and 22 Vict. c. 76, 1858. See the articles Infeftment, Investiture, and Sasine.

The history of the changes which have been made in the form of the disposition is well deserving of the attention of conveyancers, not only as exhibiting the practical application of some of the most important principles of feudal law, but because an acquaintance with those changes will afford the best security against the dangers arising from an unskilful use of the warrants contained in the modern deed. The limits of the present work, however, admit of no more than a short explanation of the manner in which the disponent may, in virtue of the disposition, proceed to complete a feudal title to the subject, to which the mere disposition, not followed by that procedure, never confers more than a personal right. 1st, The usual course is, for the disponent to take infeftment, in virtue of the indefinite precept of sasine, which infeftment completes a feudal title in his person, by vesting him with a base right, under which he becomes vassal to the disponent. When he wishes to render his right public, he may do so at once, by obtaining from the disponent's superior a charter of confirmation of the base infeftment. This confirmation operates retrospectively; and the right is held to have been a public one from the date of the disponent's infeftment. 2d, But although this is the most ordinary method of completing a public right under the disposition, the disponent may follow a different course, and complete his title by resignation. The procuratory of resignation contained in the disposition, is of the nature of a mandate by the disponent, authorizing his mandatories (whose names are always left blank) to make a resignation of the subject of the disposition into the hands of the superior in favorem (as it is called) of the disponent—i.e., in order that the superior may sanction the substitution of the disponent for the disponent, as his vassal. The superior having, in point of form, got back the subject, grants to the disponent a charter of resignation, as it is termed, containing a precept of sasine for infefting him in the subject formerly held by the disponent, and an infeftment on this charter completes the disponent's title. The superior, in case of refusal, may be compelled to complete the disponent's title in either form. See Charge against Superiors. 3d, If, however, the disponent means to complete his title by resignation, he must take care not to take infeftment on the precept of sasine in the disposition; for where a disponent first takes infeftment on the precept, and then, having obtained no charter of confirmation, resigns upon the procuratory, the superior's charter of resignation, and the disponent's infeftment following on it, will carry nothing but the superiority of the sub-vassalage which the disponent has created by his base infeftment unconfirmed. The consequence of this is, that the disponent being vested with the dominium directum and the dominium utile of the subject, by different titles, must, in the twofold capacity of superior and vassal to himself, resign ad remanentiam in his own hands, in order to consolidate the property and the mid-superiority. See Bell on Title, p. 1, et seq., and p. 230, et seq.; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 215, et seq. See also, Confirmation, Resignation, Base Right, Public Right, Consolidation.

With regard to dispositions of property held by burgage tenure, a precept of sasine is seldom inserted in the disposition to a burgage subject. The title of the disponent is always completed by resignation; the evidence of the resignation by the disponent, and of the infeftment of the disponent under the warrant of the magistrates, being contained in one deed, called an Instrument of resignation and sasine. The magistrates, in sanctioning these transmissions, act merely as commissioners for the Sovereign, who is the immediate superior of every vassal who holds by burgage tenure. See Bell's Princ. § 818, et seq.; Illust. ib.; Jurid. Styles, vol. i.; Menzies' Lect. See also Burgage Holding.

The magistrates of a royal burgh are entitled to feu out burgage property held by them for behoof of the burgh. See Erskine, B. ii. t. iv. §§ 8 and 9, and Hope's Minor Practicks. There seems, therefore, no reason for holding that a burgage vassal may not grant a feu to be held of himself, he remaining a crown vassal, and liable in the prestations incident to a burgage tenure. See case of Bennet, M. 6895.

II. Disposition of moveables. A disposition of moveables is a deed by which the disponent conveys his moveable estate, either partially or per aversionem, to the disponent. Sometimes the disposition bears reference to an inventory, as containing a more particular enumeration of the effects conveyed. Power is given to the disponent to assume possession of the subjects,—the warrandice is usually from fact and deed only,—and the deed is closed by a clause of registration, for preservation and for execution, and by the ordinary testing clause. The proper way of completing the donee's title is, by actual delivery of the moveable subjects conveyed; but an attempt is sometimes made to accomplish the same purpose by what is called an Instrument of possession; that is, a notarial instrument, bearing that the donor, in the presence of a notary-public and witnesses, delivered corporal possession of the moveables to the donee. Where, however, the donor retains possession, this method of transferring the property is not to be relied on; for it will not be effectual against creditors who may have trusted to the donee's apparent ownership. See Bell's Com. i. 252; Jurid. Styles, ii. 239; Menzies' Lect. See also Possession. Delivery. Assignment. As to the transference of ships, see Ships. Vendition.

III. Disposition and settlement. This is the name usually given to a deed, by which a person provides for the general disposal of his property, heritable and moveable, after his death. When the testator's directions are not numerous, and admit of speedy execution, the most convenient form of the deed is that of a direct conveyance to the parties meant to be benefited, under such burdens or conditions as he may choose to impose. It generally happens, however, that the object can be more beneficially attained by a trust disposition and settlement;—i.e., a conveyance to trustees with certain powers, and subject to certain directions, as to the interim and final disposal of the property,—a form which, being more comprehensive in effect, and better adapted for contingencies, is advisable wherever the details of management are numerous or complicated, and the operations under the deed likely to be protracted. The technical clauses of the disposition and settlement are,—a special conveyance of the heritable property, belonging at the time to the grantor, and a general conveyance of all other heritage of which he may die possessed;—in virtue of which general conveyance, an adjudication may, if necessary, be led against his heir-at-law; a conveyance in similar terms of the grantor's moveables, which it is more expedient to make special; the necessary obligations and warrants for completing the titles of the donees; the appointment of executors; a reservation of the grantor's liferent; and a clause dispensing with delivery. The directions in the deed, and the powers given to the trustees (when a trust is the form adopted), must depend on circumstances. Reference, however, may be made to the form of a trust disposition and settlement, in the Juridical Styles (vol. ii. p. 442, 2d edit.), as being by far the most comprehensive, effective, and accurate form of that deed which is to be found exemplified in any book of styles. Bell's

Disposition in Security. See Heritable Securities.

Dispositive Clause; is the clause of conveyance in any deed, by which property, whether heritable or moveable, is transferred, either absolutely or in security, inter vivos, or mortis causa. In this clause, the subject of the conveyance is precisely described, with all the burdens, conditions, or limitations, under which it is given. The purpose of the grant is also mentioned; the grantee must be distinctly named and described; and, where the deed contains a destination, it is in this clause that it is inserted. All the other clauses of the deed are merely auxiliary, or subservient to the dispositive clause, to which they are intended to give effect. More's Notes to Stair, p. clviii.; Bell's Princ. § 760; Illust. ib.; Ross's Lect. ii. 157, 233, 287, 344, 380. See Charter. Disposition. Entail.

Dissenters; persons who dissent from the doctrines of the Established Church. In Scotland the established religion is Presbyterian; and the term dissenter, in its most extensive signification, may be applied to all who do not conform themselves to that system of religious doctrine and worship. The numerous statutes of the Scotch Parliament directed against nonconformity, were repealed after the Revolution of 1688, by 1690, c. 5, and 1690, c. 27, and have not since been revived. See also 9 and 10 Vict., c. 59; Hume, i. 575, et seq.; More's Notes to Stair, pp. lxxv. and ciii. See Nonconformity. Papist. Episcopalian. Test.

Dissolution; a loosing of that which was formerly bound, used in contradistinction to annexation. Skene, h. t.

Distress; is a term in English law, signifying the seizing of the moveable effects belonging to a debtor, and either retaining them in security, or selling them in payment of the debt, as the case may be. It appears that a distress was formerly regarded as a mere brevi manu taking of the effects by the creditor, in security or pledge for the debt or damage—a practice which still prevails in the case of the distraining cattle found trespassing. But from the utility of distresses as a method of recovering payment of debt, they have in England been subjected to several legislative regulations, which have considerably altered their original character; and they are now treated by English authorities under eight distinct classes. See Blackstone's Com.; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Wharton's Lex.

l. t.; and Burn, voce Distress. This term also appears to have been known in our ancient law, and is mentioned by some of our authorities as similar in effect to poinding; Stair, B. iv. tit. 47, § 24. It seems, however, to have differed from that diligence, in so far as poinding, properly so called, is a diligence which can be used only in execution, and by judicial authority, whereas distress might have been used in security, and even without the intervention of a court. The right which a proprietor in Scotland has to seize brevi manu, and retain cattle found trespassing on his property, until satisfaction be made to him for the injury done, and the landlord's right of hypothec, seem to be vestiges of the ancient distress. See Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 385. See also Poinding. Hypothec. Several British statutes, which are in force in Scotland, authorise execution by distress and sale under warrant of justices of the peace. This is particularly the case as to some of the revenue statutes. Power is conferred on the justices to grant warrant for distraining the effects, and for selling them, if the penalty, and the expenses attending the distress, be not paid within a certain limited time; and, where money is ordered to be levied in this way, and sufficient effects are not found within the jurisdiction of the judge who grants the warrant, the person to whom the execution of it is entrusted, may get it indorsed by any other justice within whose jurisdiction the effects belonging to the debtor can be found, on the oath of one witness, that a sufficiency of effects were not to be found within the jurisdiction of the original granter of the warrant. The oath must be indorsed on the warrant; and the justice indorser is not answerable for any irregularity which may have been committed in obtaining the original warrant; 27 Geo. II., c. 20. Effects seized under distress cannot be used by the seizer: cows, however, may be milked, as that is necessary for their preservation. The officer levying a penalty by distress is not entitled to break open doors or lockfast places, unless the penalty, or part of it, be given to the Sovereign. Things in which a person has not a valuable property, and animals feræ naturæ, cannot be distrained. Nor can things sent to a public place of trade, as a horse in a smithy, or the effects of a traveller in an inn, be distrained for debts due by the person on whose premises they are. Neither can any fixture be taken. The tools and instruments of a man's trade, the beasts for his plough, &c., cannot be distrained, unless the distress be by way of execution under a particular statute. Many of the statutes also contain directions as to the manner in which the distress is to be levied under them. A poinding has been held illegal which proceeded on the decree of justices of the peace, under the excise statutes ordering distress; King's Advocate against Forgan, 20th Feb. 1811, Fac. Coll. App. No. 1. See also on this subject, Hutch. Justice of Peace, B. i. c. 8; Tait's Justice of Peace, p. 87; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 46, and B. iv. tit. 23, § 1; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, vol. ii. p. 339; Ross's Lect. i. 389.

Districts. For the more convenient administration of justice, the sheriffs-depute of the larger counties of Scotland are in the practice of appointing substitutes, whose delegated jurisdiction cannot be exercised beyond the limits of their particular district. In the same manner the justices of the peace are in the practice of subdividing extensive counties into districts, in each of which they hold sessions chiefly for the dispatch of the business within the district. But the jurisdiction of each justice remains entire over the whole county, and the justices of one district may hold their court and may act in another. The subdivision clerks and fiscals are appointed by the clerk of the peace, and by the fiscal for the county; and, in case of the absence of either of those officers, the justices may appoint a clerk and fiscal for the particular occasion. The Small Debt Acts, Licensing Acts, and Road Statutes, authorise a subdivision of counties for the purposes of these acts. Tait's Justice of Peace, p. 89 and 357; Barclay's Law of the Road, passim; 1 Hutchison's Just. 55. See also Sheriff-Courts. Justices of Peace. Small Debt Courts. Road Acts.

Dittay; is a technical term in criminal law, signifying the matter of charge, or ground of indictment, against a person accused of a crime. The manner of taking up dittay, as it was termed, or obtaining information and presentments of crime in order to trial, has undergone various changes. See as to the methods formerly adopted, Skene de Verb. Sig. voce Iter, and Hume, vol. ii. p. 23, et seq.; and, as to the present practice, see in this Dictionary the articles Criminal Prosecution. Circuit Court. Porteous Roll.

Dividend. In bankruptcy the share of any inadequate fund, apportioned according to the amount of the debt for which a creditor is ranked upon the estate, is called a dividend.

Divisible Fund; is a fund set apart or prepared for distribution amongst several claimants. The term is usually applied to the fund for division amongst the creditors of a bankrupt. The divisible fund, in a mercantile sequestration, consists of the whole estate and effects belonging to the bankrupt at the date of the sequestration, or the produce thereof, after paying all charges. It includes all payments made by the bankrupt to any of his creditors after the date of the first deliverance, together with all alienations in security of prior debts made after the sequestration, or reducible under the statutes 1696, c. 5, or 1621, c. 18, or as frauds at common law. The fund also includes bank interest for money belonging to the estate deposited, in terms of the statute, or the penal interest of 20 per cent. due where such deposit has not been made. The deductions from the fund consist of the expense of management, wages or payments to servants, workmen, carriers, and others engaged in preserving or realising the estate; the expense of litigation, whether belonging properly to the estate, or found due to those against whom litigation has been carried on; the allowance or commission to the trustee; and the allowance to the bankrupt, where such an allowance has been made in terms of the statute. See Bell's Com. ii. 421, et seq.

Division, Scheme of; is a state or cast showing the amount of a divisible fund, and apportioning it amongst the different claimants according to the legal order of ranking. The scheme of division in a process of ranking and sale is made up agreeably to the rights fixed by the decree of ranking. It is then lodged in process, to be examined by the parties interested, and objected to if they see cause. Thereafter it is approved of by the Lord Ordinary, with such alterations as the discussion may have led to. A decree of division, in terms of the scheme, is then pronounced, on which, as on any other decree, diligence may follow; see Bell's Com. ii. 288, et seq. See also Judicial Sale. By the bankrupt statute, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, 1856, § 125, et seq., the trustee is directed to make up and exhibit to the commissioners a state of the bankrupt's estate immediately on the expiration of four months from the date of sequestration, and complete a list of the creditors entitled to draw a dividend, &c. This list is held to be the trustee's decision on the claims made by the creditors. The decision, however, is subject to the review of the Court, on the complaint of any creditor who is dissatisfied with it.

Divorce. Marriage may be dissolved either by the death of either of the parties, or by divorce. Divorce is a judicial dissolution of the conjugal society, while both the parties are alive, the effect of which is, to leave them at liberty to intermarry with others. By the law of Scotland a divorce may be obtained on the ground either of adultery or of wilful desertion; but neither of these grounds dissolves the marriage ipso jure; and if neither party institutes a process of divorce, the marriage subsists, notwithstanding the adultery or desertion. In the case of adultery, if the injured party continue the matrimonial connexion, after knowledge of the adultery, that is held to be an irrevocable forgiveness of the offence; and an act of adultery so overlooked, cannot afterwards be the foundation of a process for divorce. (See Adultery. Remissio Injuriae.) When the divorce proceeds on wilful desertion, the act 1573, c. 55, requires that the offending party shall, maliciously and without just cause, have abandoned the conjugal society for four years together; and if, after such desertion, he or she disregards the admonition of the church to adhere, a decree of divorce may be pronounced. (See Desertion.) The action of divorce formerly proceeded before the commissaries of Edinburgh; but by 1 Will. IV. c. 69, which abolished the commissary-court, it is enacted, that actions of divorce shall be competent before the Court of Session only. (See Commissaries.) In every such action, whether founded on adultery or on desertion, the pursuer must make oath that the action is not collusive. But, after decree of divorce has been pronounced, an action of reduction of the decree, on the ground of collusion, seems not to be competent, to the effect of reviving the marriage, although the action may be insisted in, so far as to protect creditors against any fraudulent device for defeating their rights, by means of a divorce; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 46. The legal effect of divorce on the ground of desertion is, that the offending party loses the tocher and the donationes propter nuptias; 1573, c. 55; that is, the offending husband is bound to restore the tocher, and to pay or implemt to the wife all her provisions, legal or conventional; and the offending wife forfeits her tocher, and all that would have come to her, had the marriage been dissolved by the predecease of the husband; and our authorities concur in holding, that the penalties fixed by the statute 1573 extend, by analogy, to the offending party in a divorce for adultery. It has been decided, however, that the offending husband, where the divorce is for adultery, is not bound to restore the tocher; Justice, 13th Jan. 1761, Mor. p. 334. This decision is said by Erskine to have been pronounced in deference to a uniform train of old decisions; but, on investigation, it rather appears that the course of decisions had fixed an opposite rule; see Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 48; Ivory's note, 177. Bankton (B. i. tit. 5, § 128) holds recrimination to be a good defence against divorce for adultery. The contrary doctrine, however, is now settled in the law of Scotland. But although recrimination cannot be pleaded as a defence in bar of the divorce, yet, as the mutual guilt may affect the patrimonial interests of the parties, it may be stated in a counter-action; Jardine, 9th March 1787. Mor. p. 338; Lockhart, 7th Dec. 1799, Mor. App. voce Adultery, No. 1. Lenocinium, however,—that is, the husband's participation in the profits of his wife's prostitution, or even the husband's connivance in her guilt, without participating in the gain,—is a good defence to the wife against an action of divorce on the ground of adultery; M'Kenzie, 28th Feb. 1745, Mor. p. 333; Bank. B. i. tit. 5, § 130. See Recrimination. Remissio Injuriae. Lenocinium. The act 1600, c. 20, declares marriages contracted between the adulterer and the person with whom he or she is declared, by the sentence of divorce, to have committed the crime, to be null and unlawful, and the issue of the marriages to be incapable of succeeding to their parents. This statute, however, has not the effect of bastardizing such issue; Ersk. B. i. tit. 5, § 51. See Bastard. Adultery. The right to institute an action of divorce is personal to the husband or the wife; and if, after the action has been raised, either party die before the decree of divorce is final, it has been argued, that the natural dissolution of the marriage by death supersedes and definitively closes all inchoate proceedings for dissolving it on any other ground; the natural dissolution being the first effectual one, and that which is to regulate all questions as to the patrimonial rights or status of the survivor. The question, how far litiscontestation in such an action renders it transmissible to representatives, was argued, but not decided, in Campbell and others against Macallister, 1821, First Division, not reported. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 7, et seq.; Mor's Notes, p. xvi. xxviii.; Bank. B. i. tit. 5, § 126; *Ersk. Dock Warrants. The bonding warehouses in London, mentioned in the stat. 43 Geo. III., c. 132, are those of the London and West India Dock Companies; and when goods are warehoused in those docks, they are entered in the name of the importer, and a certificate given to the owner as a voucher. These certificates are called dock warrants. When a transfer is made, the certificate is indorsed, with an order to deliver the goods to the purchaser; and a corresponding entry in the warehouse books, made by the clerk, completes the transference. The certificates or warrants are transferable from hand to hand by a delivery order, in a prescribed form, which is printed on the certificate with blanks; and the courts in England have recognised this as a legitimate mode of transferring the property of the goods. In Scotland the system is not yet so perfect, but the same object is attained by delivery orders, with indorsed transfers, and corresponding entries in the warehouse books. Unless intimation is made to the keeper of the warehouse the property is not transferred; Melrose v. Hastie, Feb. 4, 1850, 12 D. 665. See Bell's Com. i. 192, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1305; Brown on Sale, p. 460. See also Delivery.

Dogs. Dogs are so far the objects of law, that, by the acts 1475, c. 60, and 1621, c. 32, the stealing of hounds (as they are called in the statutes) is punishable by fine. Sir George Mackenzie observes, upon the former of those statutes, that it is clear "that stealing of dogs, hawks, and the like, is not to be punished as theft, but only by a fine or penalty of ten pounds; and, in effect, this is not contractatio rei alienae, lucri faciendi causa—these beasts being rather useful for sport than gain." But he seems to think that the stealing of a dog from a dog-merchant may be punished as theft; Observations on the Statute, p. 79. Bankton holds that it is not felony, but that the offender may be subjected to an action for damages; B. i. tit. 3, § 9. See also Hume, i. 82 and 124. In England, by the statute 10 Geo. III., c. 18, the stealing of dogs is punishable by fine or imprisonment. It appears to be settled, that the owner of a vicious dog is liable for the injuries done by the animal to persons whom it may attack. The owner of a dog in the practice of destroying or worrying sheep, will also be answerable for the loss; and in the inferior courts the owner, besides being held liable to repair the injury to the private party, is sometimes fined, and the dog ordered to be killed. In order to subject the owner in damages, his previous knowledge of the vicious or bad habits of the dog must be proved. Stair holds such previous knowledge to be necessary to found the claim; and it was so decided by the House of Lords reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, in the case of Fleming v. Orr, April 3, 1853, 1 Macqueen. See Damages. The power of magistrates to order dogs into confinement, under pain of their being destroyed, where hydrophobia is prevalent or apprehended, is sometimes conferred by police statutes; but it seems also to fall within the general commission of justices of the peace, as well as the common law jurisdiction of the judge ordinary. In like manner, it rather seems to be lawful to kill a dog found in the act of worrying sheep, although, in one case where two dogs had been shot, and where the defender alleged that he was justified, because, at the time the dogs were shot, they were on his property, and in the neighbourhood of a valuable flock of sheep, he was subjected in damages to the owner of the dogs, on the ground that he had failed to justify the shooting of the dogs; Grant v. Barclay Allardyce, 8th Jan. 1830, 5 Mur. 130, and English cases there cited. Dogs are specially mentioned in the statute against cruelty to animals; 13 Vict., c. 92; and penalties for certain offences—e.g., suffering a rabid dog to go at large, &c.—are imposed by the general Police Acts for the towns in Scotland; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33. See Damages. Justice of Peace.

Dole; is the corrupt, malicious, or evil intention which is essential to the guilt of a crime. See Crime.

Dolus Malus; is craft, guile, or machination, employed for the purpose of deception or circumvention. This term is used, in the Roman law, in contradistinction to dolus bonus, which signifies that degree of allowable dexterity, by which a person may advance his own interests; such, for example, as to make the best bargain he can in sale, or to use stratagems in war, or devices for his defence against fraud or violence. By the law of Scotland, dolus malus is a ground for reducing any deed, obligation, or transaction in which it occurs. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 9; More's Notes, p. lix.; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 62; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 1, § 27. See also Fraud. Circumvention. Deceit.

Domesday Book; is an ancient record made in the reign of William the Conqueror, and now remaining in the Exchequer in England, fair and legible. It consists of two volumes, and contains a survey of all the lands in England, except the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Durham, and part of Lancashire. A transcript of the Domesday Book has been made, and printed and published. There are other books posterior in date to the Domesday Book of William the Conqueror, which are also called Domesday Books, and preserved in Exchequer. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Domicile; the place where a person has his home or fixed abode. Moveable property is held in law to follow the person of the owner, and on his decease must be distributed according to the law of the country in which he was domiciled at the time of his death, and not according to the law of the country in which the property is situated. But although the rule of moveable succession is the lex do- micilii, the mode in which the subjects are to be taken up and vested in the successor, is regulated by the lex rei sitæ. Thus, in Miligan (4 S. 432), a lady domiciled in Scotland, having died possessed of funds in England, and being succeeded by her children resident in this country, who died without having expedite confirmation, it was held that the funds were vested in them, ipso jure, according to the law of England. Where a company has a domicile in more than one country, the proceedings in bankruptcy in any one of the domiciles of the company comprehend the whole personal estate of the entire concern. By the law of Scotland, the residence of a party within the territory of a judge for forty days preceding the citation, establishes a domicile, to the effect of rendering the citation, under the precept of that judge, effectual, and that even although the forty days' residence has been in an inn or hired apartment. But a temporary residence of this kind will not constitute a domicile to warrant denunciation on letters of horning, or the publication of letters of inhibition at the head burgh of such residence, or the confirmation of a testament before the commissary of that district; in all of which cases regard must be had to the principal domicile or place where the party resides with his family, or has his permanent home; Paterson, 20th Nov. 1672, Mor. p. 3724; Bank. B. iv. tit. 6, § 5; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 29. See also Denunciation. Confirmation. Inhibition. Where the party possesses two houses within different jurisdictions, either of which is entitled to the appellation of his domicile, he may be cited within either the one or the other jurisdiction. If a person have no fixed domicile, as may happen in the case of a soldier or a travelling merchant, a personal citation will subject him to the jurisdiction of the judge within whose jurisdiction he is so cited. Where a person, not having a dwelling-house in Scotland occupied by his family and servants, has left his usual place of residence, and has been absent therefrom for forty days, without leaving notice where he is to be found, in Scotland, he is to be held as absent from Scotland, and charged, or cited, accordingly; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, § 53. The Act of Sederunt, 14th Dec. 1805, contained a similar provision; and declared that, within the forty days, a citation or charge, left at the late dwelling-place of the party, should be effectual, unless the party was personally found prior to the execution, or should have taken up some other known and fixed residence in Scotland. It has been doubted, however, whether the Act of Sederunt would be applicable to a citation, even within the forty days, where the party cited, and his family, had unequivocally left their late dwelling-place before the citation was given—eg., where another family had taken possession of the house. As this Act of Sederunt related to the bankrupt statute, 33 Geo. III., c. 74, and was not renewed after the expiration of that statute, doubts have been entertained how far the rule laid down in it is to be held as now in force; unless, as has been thought, the Act of Sederunt can be taken as a declaration of the common law upon the point. See More's edition of Erskine's Principles, p. 16, note 7; Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 170, et seq. in notes, 5th edit. See farther on the subject of this article, *Ersk. In connection with the subject of domicile, several important decisions in questions of status have been recently pronounced. Thus, in one case, a Scotchman by birth, possessed of landed property in Scotland, had, while domiciled in England, a son born to him of an illicit intercourse with an Englishwoman, whom he subsequently married in Scotland. The Court of Session held the son legitimated by the subsequent intermarriage of his parents, to the effect of entitling him to succeed to his father's property in Scotland. But that judgment was reversed in the House of Lords, it being held that the father was domiciled in England at the date of the marriage, which took place in Scotland; Rose v. Ross, 15th May 1827, 5 S. and D. 605; House of Lords, 16th July 1830, 4 W. and S. 289. In a more recent case, a Scotchman had a daughter born to him in England by an illicit connection with an Englishwoman, whom he subsequently married in England. The question there was, whether, at the date of the birth of the child, and of the subsequent marriage, the father had acquired an English domicile; and the Court of Session, by the narrowest possible majority of the whole thirteen judges, holding that he had lost his Scotch domicile, and adopting the principle of the judgment of the House of Lords in Rose v. Ross, decided that there was no legitimation per subsequens matrimonium; Munro v. Munro, 16th Nov. 1837, 16 S. 18. This judgment, however, was reversed by the House of Lords, on the ground that the father had not lost his Scotch domicile; 1 Rob. 492. In another case, a Scotchman and a Scotchwoman contracted, in Scotland, an intimacy, in consequence of which issue was afterwards born in England, whither the father, followed by the woman, went on military service, and where, after his regiment was disbanded, he continued to reside for a period of years. There it was held,—one judge alone of the thirteen dissenting,—that a subsequent marriage contracted with this woman, in England, legitimated the issue to the effect of entitling them to take Scotch heritage, under an entail, as lawful heirs-male of the body; Macdowall v. Lady Dalhousie, 16th Nov. 1837, 16 S. 6. This judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords; 1 Rob. 495. The general rule, deducible from another recent case, is, that the domicile of the husband is the domicile of the wife. In the case in which that rule was settled, a domiciled Scotchman had brought an action of divorce against his wife, who was actually resident abroad, on the ground of adultery committed abroad; and there the House of Lords held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Session,—1. That the domicile of the husband was the domicile of the wife; and that the action was competently executed in the Scotch courts, a previous contract of separation between the parties being held revocable, and virtually revoked, by the execution of the summons of divorce; 2. That the wife was sufficiently cited by an edictal citation and personal notice, without leaving a copy of the summons for her at her husband's dwelling-place in Scotland; and, 3. That the marriage, although contracted in England, according to the rites of the English Church, and therefore indissoluble by the courts of that country, might be dissolved by the Scotch courts on the ground of adultery committed abroad; Warrender v. Warrender, 28th June and 5th July 1834, 12 S. 847 and 885; House of Lords, 27th Aug. 1835; 2 S. and M.L. 154. But the rule that the domicile of the husband is that of the wife, does not hold where the husband, a foreigner, has come to Scotland, and resided there for forty days, merely with a view of constituting a domicile, and of making his wife, whose actual domicile is abroad, subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts for adultery committed abroad; Ringer, 15th Jan. 1840, 2 D.p. 307. Residence for forty days still, however, was held to confer jurisdiction in an action of divorce by a husband against a wife, where Scotland was the forum originis of both parties, the locus contractus and the locus delicti; Forrester, 18th July 1844, 6 D. 1358. In an undefended case, where a Scotchman, after contracting a marriage in Scotland with a Scotchwoman, had committed adultery in Scotland, and had afterwards gone abroad, leaving his wife and a child in Scotland, without letting her know whither he had gone, it was held by the Court, on considering an ex parte argument, which the Lord Ordinary had ordered on the point, that the absent husband was competently cited in an action of divorce at the instance of the wife by an edictal citation; and that although the husband had been absent from Scotland for upwards of ten years prior to the raising of the action, yet the jurisdiction of the Court in such a suit at the instance of the wife was not excluded; Buchanan v. Downie, 18th Nov. 1837, Fac. Coll., and authorities there cited. See Legitimation.

Dominant Tenement; is the name given to the tenement or subject in favour of which a servitude exists or is constituted. The tenement over which the servitude extends is denominated the servient tenement. More's Notes to Stair, p. cxxxix.; Bell's Princ. § 980, et seq. See Servitude.

Dominium Directum and Dominium Utile. In the language of the feudal law, the interest vested in the superior is called the dominium directum, or superiority, as being the higher or paramount right. The vassal's interest, as contradistinguished from the superiority, is termed the dominium utile, or the property, as comprehending the more profitable and useful enjoyment of the subject and its fruits. Much controversy has prevailed amongst feudalists as to the philosophical correctness of those terms; but practically there exists no doubt as to their import. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 7; Bank. B. ii. tit. 3, § 2; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 10; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 670, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 676, et seq.; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 147, et seq. With regard to the nature and extent of the respective rights of the superior and the vassal, see Superiority. Vassal. Feudal System. Property.

Dominus litis; is the person to whom a suit belongs, who derives the benefit of a favourable, and is liable to the effects of an adverse, judgment. One may be dominus litis although his name be not in the suit as either pursuer or defender. Thus, a father was subjected in the expenses of a process which had been awarded against his son, in respect that, although not himself the party, he had undertaken to defend his son, and had not allowed him a sufficient aliment; Stevens, 21st Nov. 1823, 2 S. 507. And in Corsan, Feb. 8, 1828, 6 S. 505, one who got another to present a bill of suspension in his own name, was found liable in expenses, as being the verus dominus litis. See Mandatory.

Donatary. A donatary is the donee or receiver of a gift or donation. In practice, the term is applied exclusively to the person to whom the Crown makes a gift, as of escheat, ultimus hæres, or the like. Hunter's Landlord and Tenant; Ross's Lect. i. 208. See Escheat. Gift.

Donation; is the free gift of anything which the giver lies under no antecedent legal obligation to bestow—a definition which comprehends remuneratory gifts, because they cannot be enforced by law, although in some respects they differ from pure donations. The law recognises several kinds of donation; as,—(1.) Pure donations. (2.) Donations mortis causa. (3.) Donations inter virum et uxorem. (4.) Donations propter nuptias.

1. Pure donations proceed from the mere liberality of the giver. Where the subject of the gift either cannot be, or is not meant to be, immediately delivered, the proper evidence of the donation is a written deed,—a solemnity which is of course indispensable in the case of a donation of heritage,—and the warrandice implied is said by our institutional writers to be warrandice from future facts and deeds only of the donor; although a contrary opinion is maintained in the Annotations on Stair, published some years ago, and ascribed to Lord Elchies. See Annotations, p. 136. Acceptance by the donee is not required to complete the donation. The Roman law allowed beneficium competentie to every one who had laid himself under a gratuitous obligation; that is, he was allowed to retain as much as was necessary for his own subsistence, if, before fulfilling the obligation, he was reduced to indigence. But the law of Scotland does not recognise this doctrine, except in the case of donations or provisions by fathers and grandfathers to their children or grandchildren. (See Beneficium Competentie.) Another implied condition of a donation by the Roman law was, that where one who had no children made a gift of the whole, or the greater part, of his estate, the donation became void if the donor afterwards came to have children; the presumption of the law being, that had he expected children of his own he would have preferred them to any other person. As to the extent to which this doctrine has been adopted in the law of Scotland, see Condition, si sine liberis decesserit. Donations, even when completed by delivery, were, by the Roman law, revocable on account of ingratitude on the part of the donee; and if the same doctrine prevail in the law of Scotland, it is a ground of revocation, which, following the principle of the Roman law, must be personal to the donor, and not descendible to his heirs; for the presumption is, that if the donor has died without revoking the donation, he has forgiven the injury; Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 2; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 88, et seq.; Bank. B. i. tit. 9, § 1, et seq. Remuneratory donations differ from pure donations so far, that they cannot be revoked; because, although the donor was under no legal obligation to make the gift, yet he was bound in gratitude to do so—a consideration which gives to such a donation the character of the discharge of a debt; and hence, without an express power of revocation, a donation of this kind is irrevocable; Ersk. ib. § 91. No deed is presumed in law to be a donation, if it admit of another construction; for one is never presumed to do that which is to be attended with loss instead of gain to himself, unless there be facts and circumstances in his conduct which leave no doubt as to his intention to make a gift. In dubio, the law holds the transaction to be onerous. Thus, a debtor is not presumed to make a gift to his creditor while his debt remains unpaid. But aliment supplied, without an agreement for board, to a person of full age, and capable of contracting, is presumed to have been given animo donandi, unless the entertainer be one who makes a livelihood by the board of strangers. Aliment; however, given to minors, and others incapable of contracting, is not accounted a donation, unless the minor has a father or curators, with whom a contract for his maintenance might have been made, or where, from the near relationship of the alimenter, there is room for the presumption that the aliment was given ex pietate; Galt, 19th Jan. 1830, 8 S. and D. 332, and authorities there cited. Where the minor has a separate estate, it is held that even his father has a claim for the expense of alimentering him; and the same rule seems to apply, with greater force, to the case where such a minor has been alimentered by a more distant relation, or by a stranger. An eldest son who is debtor to his brothers and sisters for their provisions, and who has maintained them in his family, is not held to have done so gratuitously, but will be entitled to a reasonable allowance for their board; see Stair, B. i. tit. 8, § 2; Bank. B. i. tit. 9, § 20; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 92. See also Debitor non præsumitur donare.

2. Donations mortis causa. A donation mortis causa is a deed whereby one, in contemplation of death, gives anything to another, or grants a right in favour, revocable at the grantor's pleasure. The characteristic of such donations is, that the donor prefers the donee to his heir, but prefers himself to both; and such rights not being effectual during the grantor's life, his creditors are preferable to the grantee. But where they become good by the grantor's death, they will receive effect against his heir or executor, in the same manner as other deeds delivered at the date. But unless conceived in favour of the grantee and his heirs, they become void if he predecease the grantor; Boston, 13th Feb. 1781, Mor. p. 8099. Donations are rather presumed to be absolute than mortis causa; hence, although made in contemplation of death, yet, if they be irrevocable and delivered, they are held to be simple gifts. Thus, a gratuitous bond payable at the grantor's death, delivered and irrevocable, is not a donation mortis causa, but an absolute right; Bank. B. i. tit. 9, § 18, et seq. By the Roman law, when a gift was made in contemplation of death, the subject was understood to be given to the donee, under the implied condition that it was to be returned to the donor, either on his revocation, or on the predecease of the donee. This sort of donation mortis causa is unknown in the law of Scotland. That which most resembles it is a gratuitous bond or assignation, revocable by the grantor, and to take effect at his death. Such bonds being of the nature of legacies, the grantee will be postponed to the onerous creditors of the grantor; at the same time, in a question with legatees, such a bond will constitute a debt, and will therefore be preferable to proper legacies. A disposition of heritage, mortis causa—that is, a disposition made intuitu mortis, and on the recital of the grantor's desire to settle all disputes in regard to his succession, after his decease—is not necessarily a deathbed deed; for, if it disposes the heritage by words of de præsentis conveyance, although it contain a reservation of the grantor's liferent, and a clause dispensing with delivery, and remain undelivered, yet, if it be otherwise a formal and regular deed, it will receive full effect, unless it can be set aside on the ground that the grantor was actually on deathbed at the time of its execution. No deed, even although gratuitous, is revocable after delivery, if a power of revocation be not reserved. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 91; Bell's Illust. § 1691; Thomson on Bills, 18; Kames' Equity, 177; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit., vol. ii. p. 429. See also Legacy. Disposition and Settlement. Deathbed. Delivery.

3. Donations inter virum et uxorem. All deeds importing donations, whether granted by the husband to the wife, or by the wife to the husband, during the subsistence of the marriage, are revocable by the donor at any time during his or her life—ne conjuges mutuo amore se spolient. Although the deed should be granted nominally, or in trust to another, yet if in effect it convey a right gratuitously from one spouse to the other, it is subject to revocation; plus enim valet quod agitur, quam quod simulate concipitur. See Jardine v. Currie, June 17, 1830, 8 S. 939. But mutual remuneratory grants between the spouses are not revocable, where there is any reasonable proportion between the two; Hepburn, 6th June 1814; House of Lords, Dow, ii. 342. Neither are postnuptial grants, made in consequence of a natural obligation, revocable.

Thus, where there has been no antenuptial contract of marriage, the husband may provide for his wife, in the event of her survival; and, in so far as the provision is rational, and suitable to his circumstances at the time, it will be effectual. It will be revocable, however, quoad excessum. The same rule would probably be applied to the case of a similar provision by the wife, in favour of the husband. But where there has been an antenuptial contract, all postnuptial deeds increasing or diminishing the provision in the former contract, are revocable, in so far as they do not proceed on onerous considerations. All voluntary contracts of separation, by which the wife is provided with an alimentary allowance, were reprobated by our older law, as being contrary to the adherence implied in marriage; but, according to more recent authorities, the provisions made in such contracts are effectual as to the time past, although revocable at any time by either the husband or the wife; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 29, et seq.; Ivory's edition, notes 161 to 166. See Marriage. Donations inter virum et uxorem may be revoked by the donor, not only in express terms, but also tacitly by a subsequent conveyance of the subject of the donation to another, or even by the subsequent contraction of debt. Where the donation is constituted by writing, it ought to be revoked also by writing; and such revocations may be signed etiam in articulo mortis, and without the knowledge of the other spouse. Revocation is not presumed from a posterior general disposition by the donor, in favour of a stranger; for the general clause in such a disposition does not include any right of which the grantor has previously divested himself; Handyside, 7th Feb. 1699, Mor. p. 11349. In like manner, the mere contraction of debt raises no presumption of revocation. Posterior creditors, indeed, when the donor has no separate fund for their payment, may found upon the faculty of revocation competent to their debtor, which the law will transfer to them, if he do not revoke voluntarily; but his representatives, where there is no insolvency, cannot found upon posterior contractions as a tacit revocation. Although a donation between husband and wife is valid, if not revoked, yet the donee, who holds it under the tacit condition that it may be revoked, cannot alienate or burden the subject of the donation, to the prejudice of the donor's right of revocation, which it has been stated will operate even against the donee's creditors or singular successors,—resoluto enim jure dantis, resolutor jus accipientis. But if the donor die without revoking, his or her representative cannot revoke, and the right of the donee becomes absolute,—morte dantis donatio confir-

4. Donations propter nuptias. In the Roman law, donationes propter nuptias are described as that sum or subject, given by the husband in security as the dos or tocher, which he was bound to restore to the wife on the dissolution of the marriage; and as the dos returned to the wife, so the donatio propter nuptias returned to the husband; sicut dos ad mulierem, sic et donatio propter nuptias reddit ad virum. The law of Scotland differs essentially from the Roman law on this subject; but when donations propter nuptias are mentioned by our authorities, they must be understood to mean the provisions granted by the husband to the wife, in consideration of the tocher, given by her or her friends; Balfour's Prac. p. 101; Bank. B. i. tit. 5, § 6; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 46. See Contract of Marriage.

Doom; a judicial sentence; in which sense the term was used in the more ancient law of Scotland, both as to civil and criminal causes. The falsing of dooms was an expression formerly used to signify protesting against the sentence, and taking an appeal to a higher tribunal. In the case of a capital conviction in the Court of Justiciary, the doom or sentence was in use to be pronounced by the public executioner, or doomster as he was called—a barbarous practice, which was abolished by Act of Adjournal, 16th March 1773, and the sentence ordained to be pronounced in future by the presiding judge. Hume, ii. 472; also p. 3, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 39. See Falsing of Dooms.

Doomster. The public executioner was formerly called the doomster or dempster, in consequence of the practice mentioned in the preceding article.

Doquet. The word doquet is an old English term, signifying a brief or summary of a large writing; and all attestations or declarations annexed to written instruments are called doquets, particularly when done by notaries. The notarial doquet is the most ancient example of fixed style in Europe; and it was formerly common to all solemn instruments. In Scotland, however, it was almost exclusively appropriated to the instrument of sasine. It consisted of a Latin attestation, holograph of the notary, annexed to the notarial instrument prepared by him, on the co-

casion of the infeftment being taken. The doquet set forth the name of the notary, and the authority under which he had been appointed a notary-public. It then stated that he was personally present along with the witnesses; that he saw, knew, heard, and noted the circumstances mentioned in the instrument of sasine; and that he prepared the instrument, and had authenticated it by his sign, name, and surname; and, by express statute, the doquet must mention the number of "leaves" of which the instrument consists; 1686, c. 17, and A. S. 17th Jan. 1756. In addition to his subscription, the notary was formerly in use to add his signum, which was a flourish of penmanship, called a paraph or a ruck; but this went into disuse; and, by the subsequent practice, the notary merely subscribed each page of the instrument, adding the letters N. P. to his name; and, on the last page, opposite to the doquet, he added to his subscription the motto which he had assumed on his admission as a notary. Any omission in the essentials of the doquet is fatal to the instrument to which it is annexed. In registering instruments of sasine, the practice was to transcribe the entire doquet into the record; but in registering instruments of sasine in tenements within burgh, under the statute 1681, c. 11, a diversity of practice prevailed as to the registration of the doquet, as to which no precise rule is prescribed by that statute. To remedy this omission, it was enacted by 10 Geo. IV., c. 19, that an abbreviated or incomplete registration of the doquet, or even a total omission of it in the record, should not affect the validity of instruments recorded prior to 14th May 1829; but that thereafter the doquets of all instruments of sasine within burgh, shall be recorded at length in the burgh register of sasines; otherwise such sasines shall not bear faith in judgment in prejudice of a third party with a perfect right to such tenements; without prejudice, however, to the using of the instruments against the makers thereof, their heirs and successors. The act contains a declaration, that it shall not affect any action in relation to the former practice, depending at its date. The notarial doquet to instruments of sasine was superseded by 8 and 9 Vict., c. 35, § 5. See on the subject of this article, Ross's Lect. ii. 187; Bell on the Purchaser's Title, p. 217; Bell's Princ. § 771; Bell's Illust. § 872; Thomson on Bills, 461; Menzies' Lect. p. 554. See also Sasine. Notary-Public.

Dos; in the Roman law, was the dowry or tocher brought by the wife to the husband on the occasion of the marriage. By that law, the dos returned to the wife on the dissolution of the marriage; but, during its subsistence, the rents or profits of the dos went to the husband, ad sustinenda onera matrimonii. The donatio propter nuptias was a counter remuneratory donation made by the husband to the wife, as a security for the return of the dos; Stair, B. iii. tit. 4, § 22; Bank. B. i. tit. 5, § 6; Skene, h. t. See Marriage. Donation.

Double Bonds. One of the English law expedients, devised for evading the prohibitions, anciently in force against taking interest for money, was for the borrower to grant a bond for double the sum advanced. Those bonds were sometimes qualified by a separate stipulation, that, if the debtor paid a certain sum to the lender, at a particular time, the debt should be discharged; but, if not, that the whole sum in the bond should become due as damages. The bonds thus taken are called double bonds. It does not appear that this was ever a prevailing form of security in Scotland; but similar devices were well known; for the prohibitions against taking interest were as rigid in the one country as in the other. See Ross's Lect. vol. i., p. 19, et seq. See also Interest.

Double Distress. Where arrestments have been used by two or more creditors, in order to attach the funds of their debtor in the hands of a third party, such arrestments constitute what is called double distress; and entitle the arrestee to call the arresters and the common debtor in an action of multiplepoinding, to dispute their respective rights to the fund in medio, so that the arrestee may pay in safety, and under judicial authority. This action is called an action of double or of multiple poinding; because poinding was a term which anciently denoted any distress or diligence. Stair, B. iv. tit. 16, § 3, et seq.; Bank. B. iv. tit. 24, § 32; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 23. See Multiplepoinding.

Double Securities. A creditor who holds two securities for the same debt, is said to hold double securities. Thus, the debtor may give security for the full debt over two separate estates, each of which may be made liable for the whole debt; and, in the event of insolvency, the creditor will rank upon each estate for the whole debt, to the effect, however, of drawing ultimately no more than twenty shillings in the pound on the debt due; Bell's Com. ii. 520, et seq. Questions of considerable difficulty arise on bankruptcy in the ranking of double securities; as to which see Ranking. See also Catholic Creditor.

Doubles of Summonses. A full copy, technically called a double, of every summons, as far as the will, must, in the ordinary case, be delivered to, or left for, each defender when the summons is executed. Where, however, more defenders than one are called, it is sufficient if each be served with a copy of that part of the summons which concerns himself.

If the defender be forth of Scotland, a copy must be left for him by the messenger, at the office of the keeper of Edictal Citations. See Citation. The following summonses are excepted from the general rule:—Adjudication, Mails and Duties, Ranking and Sale, Exhibition ad deliberandum, Choosing of Curators, Transumpt, Wakening, Multiplepoining, Poining of the Ground, and Furthcoming; all of which may be executed, by leaving short copies without doubles, whether the defenders be forth of Scotland or not; except that a full double must be served on the heritor, in a summons of poining the ground, and on the common debtor in a furthcoming. See A. S. 15th Feb. 1723, 1st Jan. 1726, and 19th Feb. 1742; Jurid. Styles, 2d edit. vol. iii. p. 7973; 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 22.

Dovecot. By the statute 1617, c. 19, it is enacted, that no person shall be entitled to build a dovecot or pigeon-house, either in town or country, unless he have lands or teinds belonging to him worth the yearly rent of ten chalders of victual, adjacent to the dovecot, or at least lying within two miles of it. It is also declared, that it shall not be lawful for the person having such qualification to build more than one dovecot within the "bounds foresaid." This statute has been held to impose no restraint on proprietors possessed of a greater rent (e. g., sixty chalders), provided they build only one dovecot within the limits of that ground which yields ten chalders of yearly rent; Brodie, 3d July 1752. See Kilk. Rep. Mor. p. 3602. The statute does not extend to dovecots already built; and the legal presumption is, that the dovecot challenged was built before the passing of the act, unless the contrary be proved. If an estate with a dovecot on it is acquired from a person who was legally qualified to build one, the purchaser is entitled to the benefit of the dovecot, although he may not have the legal qualification; but, if it become ruinous he is not entitled to rebuild it; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 6, § 7; Bank. B. ii. tit. 3, § 167; Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 78; Bell's Princ. § 978; Ross's Lect. ii. 173. Dovecot breakers, and stealers of pigeons therefrom, are declared guilty of theft; and, in addition to repairing the damages, they are punishable by fine or imprisonment. If they have not effects sufficient to pay the fine and damages, they are to be imprisoned or set in the stocks for the first and second offence; and for the third, according to the rigour of the old statutes, they may be capitally punished, even by an inferior court; 1474, c. 61; 1579, c. 84; Hume, vol. i. p. 80; Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 4. By 1661, c. 38, justices of the peace are directed to execute the acts against breakers of dovecots, &c.; but they cannot judge in complaints for shooting or killing pigeons; Murray, 19th Jan. 1797, Mor. p. 7628; in which case also it was held that the statute 2 Geo. III., c. 29, for the protection of pigeons, does not extend to Scotland. See Pigeons.

Dowager; a widow endowed; applied to the widows of princes and persons of rank.

Dowager Queen; the widow of the King, who, as such, enjoys most of the privileges belonging to the Queen Consort. But it is not high treason to conspire her death, or to violate her chastity, because the succession to the Crown is not thereby endangered. But no man can marry her without a special license from the Sovereign, under pain of forfeiting his lands and goods. Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Queen.

Dower; is an English term, signifying the portion which a widow has of the lands of her deceased husband, for the maintenance of herself and the education of her children. Tomlins, h. t.

Dowry; is a term sometimes used to signify the dos or marriage-portion brought by a wife to the husband. See Dos.

Draft. In mercantile language, the term draft is usually applied to an order or bill drawn by a creditor on his debtor, ordering him to pay the contents either to the drawer himself, or to a third party, and sent to the drawee for acceptance. Acceptance completes the transfer of the debt from the drawer to the payee or porteur. If acceptance be refused, the presentment of the draft for acceptance is held to be equivalent to the intimation of an assignation, and the proper evidence of the completed transfer is the protest for non-acceptance. Drafts of this kind made within sixty days of bankruptcy, in satisfaction or security of prior debts, are reducible under the act 1696, c. 5; Bell's Com. ii. 20 and 211; Thomson on Bills. As to the due negotiation of drafts, see Bill of Exchange.

All drafts or orders for the payment of money to the bearer on demand must be impressed with a penny stamp, or have an adhesive draft or receipt penny stamp upon them; and when an adhesive stamp is used, the drawer must cancel the stamp by writing on it his name or initials; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 59, and 17 and 18 Vict., c. 83. The exemption from such stamps of drafts on bankers transacting business within fifteen miles from the place where the draft is issued, is taken away by 21 Vict., c. 20, 1858.

By 21 and 22 Vict., c. 79, 1858, it is enacted, that where a cheque or draft on a banker, payable to bearer or to order on demand, shall be issued, crossed with the name of a banker, or with two transverse lines, with the words "and con; any," and any abbreviation thereof; such crossing shall be deemed a material part of the cheque or draft; and the banker upon whom the draft or cheque is drawn shall not pay it to any other than the banker with whose name it is crossed; and if it is crossed without a banker's name, to any other than a banker, the lawful holder of a cheque uncrossed or crossed with the words "and company," or any abbreviation thereof, may cross it with the name of a banker; and a banker is not responsible for paying a cheque which does not plainly appear to have been crossed, unless he shall have acted mala fide, or been guilty of negligence in so paying it.

Drawee of a Bill; the person on whom a bill of exchange is drawn. See Bill of Exchange.

Drawer of a Bill. The drawer is the proper creditor in an inland bill between two parties; and, on the failure of the acceptor, the drawer (unless the contrary has been expressly stipulated), is bound to indemnify the holder of the bill. The claim of the drawer who has been obliged to pay against the acceptor or the drawee who has failed to pay or to accept, is of the nature of damages, and will extend to the principal sum in the draft, with interest, expenses, exchange, and re-exchange, provided the drawee has improperly refused to accept: and to the principal sum, with interest and expenses, where the drawee, after having accepted, has failed to pay; Bell's Com. i. 405. The sums contained in bills of exchange, in case of non-acceptance, bear interest from the date of the refusal to accept; and, in case of acceptance and non-payment, from the day of payment; 1681, c. 20; Bell's Princ. § 311; Bell's Illust. § 311; Thomson on Bills. See Bill of Exchange.

Drawn Teind; was the ipsa corpora of the tithe drawn by the titular after the crop was reaped, and before it was removed from the ground. As the proprietor of the crop was liable to heavy penalties if he removed it before the drawing took place, this mode of levying the teind was attended with great hardship, and sometimes, from the titular's delay, with the total loss of the crop. The evil was attempted to be remedied by several enactments, the object of which was to authorize the proprietor of the crop to fix a day for drawing the tithe: and if the titular failed to attend, the proprietor himself was then entitled to make the separation between the stock and teind, and to carry home his share of the crop, leaving the teind sheaves stacked on the ground; 1606, c. 8; 1612, c. 5; 1617, c. 9. The rules for the valuation of teinds, introduced in 1633, have, however, more effectually obviated the inconveniences of the former system. Stair, B. ii.

tit. 8, § 22; Bell's Princ. §§ 1152, 1157. See Teinds; Connell on Tithes, i. 125, 160, 256.

Drilling. Unlawful drilling, or training to arms, as preparatory to a treasonable rising against the Government, was carried to such an extent in the year 1819, that the Legislature was compelled to interfere; and by the statute 60 Geo. III., c. 1, it is enacted that every person present or assisting at any meeting for training or drilling, or for practising military exercise, assembled without authority from the King, or the lieutenant, or two justices of the peace for the county, may be transported for seven years, or imprisoned, not exceeding two years. Justices of the peace, and all other inferior judges and magistrates, and peace officers, may disperse such meetings, and apprehend those concerned, and deal with them as in cases of bailable offences. Prosecutions under this statute must be raised within six months after the offence; and actions against judges and others for things done by them in pursuance of the act, must be brought within six months. See the statutes 60 Geo. III., c. 1; 1 Geo. IV., c. 1; 6 Geo. IV., c. 47; 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict., c. 5; Alison's Princ. 595. See also Treason. Sedition.

Driving, Careless. Various legislative provisions have been made with the view of guarding against the accidents likely to arise from carelessness in the driving and management of stage-coaches and similar vehicles. Thus, if the driver of any such coach stop at any place where assistance can be procured, and quit his horses, or the box, before a proper person comes to hold the horses, or if such person quit actual hold of the horses before the driver return to his box, such driver or person, on conviction by confession, view of a justice or magistrate, or oath of one credible witness before any justice or other magistrate of the place, forfeits not more than £5, nor less than 10s., for each offence. Or, if the driver or guard, by negligence or misconduct, endanger the safety of the passengers or their property, on conviction by similar evidence, he forfeits not more than £10, nor less than £5, for every offence, besides repairing the damage; and in case of non-payment, he may be committed to the jail or house of correction for not more than six, or less than three months, at the discretion of the judge. If the coachman permit any other person to drive without consent of a proprietor, or against the consent of the passengers, or quit the box without reasonable occasion, or for longer time than is necessary (although the reins be in the hands of the person on the box), or if, by furious driving, or any negligence or misconduct, he overturn the carriage, or endanger the persons or property of the passengers, or the property of the owners, for every such offence he forfeits not more than L.10, nor less than L.5. Drivers of stage-coaches, who occasion injury to passengers by furious driving or wilful misconduct, may be punished criminally by fine or imprisonment. See 50 Geo. III., c. 48; 1 Geo. IV., c. 4. Hackney-coaches not plying for hire as stage-coaches, are excepted from these statutes; but offences of the kind here mentioned seem to be punishable at common law. Justices of the peace may convict for the ordinary statutory penalties; but in aggravated cases, the Court of Justiciary is the proper Court. Where personal injury has been sustained by passengers, or where property has been lost or injured, through the misconduct or negligence of drivers, the provisions of the statutes do not affect the injured party's claim for damages against the coach proprietors, under their common law responsibility for the servants or others employed by them; Bell's Com. i. 462, et seq. Where a person loses his life by an accident arising from negligence or furious driving, the person in fault is held to be guilty of culpable homicide. Under the Road Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 43, the driver of a vehicle is liable in a penalty not exceeding L.5, besides damages, for riding in the cart, &c., without double reins; for leaving the cart travelling on the road without some person to guide the beast; for allowing a dog to go at large, not chained to the vehicle; for not keeping to the left or near side of the road, on meeting or being overtaken by any other carriage or rider; or for wilfully preventing any other person from passing him or his vehicle. Drivers or owners are liable in a penalty not exceeding 40s. if one driver has the management of more than two carts, &c.; if the last of two carts has more than one horse, and both carts are under the charge of one person; or if the horse of the hindmost cart is not attached by the rein to the back of the foremost cart, and following in the same line not more than six feet behind. Owners are liable in 40s. if the driver is below fourteen years of age. Barclay's Law of Highway, 73, et seq.; Hume, i. 192; Bell's Sup. 70, 76; Bell's Princ. §§ 168, 2031; Alison's Princ. 116; Prac. 625. Droit D'Aubaine. By the old custom of France, the king was entitled, under the Droit D'Aubaine, to claim the moveable estate of all foreigners who died within his dominions, and that notwithstanding a testamentary settlement. But where a person went to France as a traveller, merchant, or public minister, with no intention of fixing his domicile there, the Droit D'Aubaine was excluded; and the Swiss, Savoyards, Scotch, and Portuguese were exempted. This ancient privilege was finally abolished in 1819. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 10, § 10; and Encyc. Brit. voce Aubaine.

Drove Road; is the name given to a servitude road used for the passage of sheep or cattle to annual fairs or cattle markets. Such roads do not possess any of the characteristics of highways or public roads, but in the ordinary case consist merely of a particular tract, or course, along which the cattle are in use to be driven. The privilege of using a road of this description is a servitude which may be acquired by prescription; Porteous, 17th June 1773; Mor. p. 14512. See, on this subject, the case of the Marquis of Breadalbane v. M'Gregor, House of Lords, 14th July 1850; 7 Bell's App. p. 43. Servitude. Road.

Drunkenness. The offence of notorious and excessive drinking, under several statutes of the Scots Parliaments, was punishable by fine or imprisonment, or by corporal pains. See, in particular, the statutes 1436, c. 144; 1617, c. 20; 1661, c. 19; 1672, c. 22; 1693, c. 40; 1696, c. 31; and by 1661, c. 38, the execution of the statutes against drunkenness is committed to justices of the peace. Those statutes, however, have fallen into desuetude; and the mere indecency of getting drunk does not now, in the general case, subject the offender to any punishment, although it frequently leads to the commission of greater crimes; Hume, i. 465. But in the Edinburgh Police Act, and in the General Police Act for Towns (13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, § 97), penalties are enacted against drunkenness accompanied by riotous or indecent behaviour in the streets; and, in particular circumstances, mere drunkenness is still punishable; Bell's Notes to Hume, p. 165. Persons in a state of complete drunkenness, as being incapable of legal consent, cannot enter into a contract or obligation; but a lesser degree of intoxication will be no sufficient ground for reducing the contract, unless fraud is proved upon the part of the obligee. Drunkenness, as a ground of nullity, is not pleadable by way of exception; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 13, and B. iv. tit. 20, § 49; Bank. B. i. tit. 9, § 66; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 1, § 16. Where a person is charged with the commission of a crime, he will not, in the ordinary case, be allowed to plead intoxication as a defence; Hume, i. 45. Dry Multure; is a yearly sum of money, or quantity of corn paid to a mill, whether those liable in the payment grind their grain at the mill or not; Bell's Princ. § 1018;

Duces Tecum; in English law is a writ commanding a person to appear in a court of law, and to bring with him writings, evidences, or other things in his custody, which may be required in modum probationis. The Scotch law diligence against havers of writings is somewhat analogous to the English writ, duces tecum. Tomlins, h. t. See Diligence. Haver.

Duelling; is the act of fighting in single combat upon a previous challenge given by one party, and accepted by the other. Where, in consequence of such appointment, a meeting takes place, and death ensues, it is accounted murder by the law of Scotland, however fair the duel may have been; and principals and seconds are equally exposed to the criminal charge; but there is no modern instance of a capital conviction on such a charge, where there has been nothing dishonourable in the conduct of the accused. By 1600, c. 12, the offence of fighting a duel without the king's permission, even although death did not follow, was declared a capital crime; and by 1696, c. 35, any person concerned in giving or accepting a challenge to fight, or engaged therein, although no fighting ensued, was punishable by banishment and escheat of moveables. But both of those statutes were repealed by the statute 59 Geo. III., c. 70. Hume, i. 230, 247, 442, et seq.; *Ersk. Duellum; "duorum bellum vel plurium," single battle or combat. Skene, h. t. See Championnes.

Duke. In Great Britain the title of Duke is the next dignity to that of Prince of Wales. The first English Duke was Edward the Black Prince, who was created Duke of Cornwall in the year 1337. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Dumb. See Deaf and Dumb.

Dung. In the Roman law, dunghills were held to be accessories of the soil, except in the case where the usual practice of the farm, or the established intention of the proprietor, was to sell the dung separately. By the law of Scotland, in questions between landlord and tenant, dunghills are held to be moveable; but in questions of succession, arising during the currency of the lease, or on the death of a proprietor in the natural possession of his land, they might perhaps be regarded as heritable destinationes, where the evident intention of the proprietor was that the dung should be laid upon the land. See Bell's Com. vol. ii. p. 3; Bell's Princ. §§ 1261–1475; Bell's Illust. § 1261; Bell on Leases, i. 327, 4th edit.; Roxburgh, Bligh's Appeal Cases, ii. 156; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, i.

pp. 263, 771. See also Heritable and Moveable.

Duplicate; in its most usual acceptation, signifies a copy or transcript of a deed, or other writing, made to provide against accidents, or for other reasons. In the case of mutual contracts, such as leases, contracts of marriage, copartnership, and the like, duplicates of the deed are frequently prepared, each of which is signed by all the contracting parties; and, where this is done, the parties are bound if one of the duplicates be regularly executed, although the others should be defective in the necessary solemnities; Cubison, 3d July 1716, Mor. p. 16988; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, pp. 312, 315; Tait on Evidence, 3d edit. p. 111; Dickson on Evidence, §§ 135, 886, 904.

Duplicates. This is a pleading formerly in use in inferior courts. The procedure in Sheriff Courts is now regulated by the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, 1853. See Record. Condescendence.

Duress; in English law, the plea of a man who has obliged himself to pay or perform, or who has committed a misdemeanour, that he was constrained to do so, and therefore ought to be free from the consequences. There is both duress of imprisonment and duress per minas. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Dusty-Foot. In England there is a court called a Pie-Powder-Court, held in fairs, to do justice between buyers and sellers, and to redress disorders committed in the fair; and there are traces of a similar court in Scotland, although it has long been out of use. Writers differ about the etymology of the word; but, according to Lord Kames, courts of Pie-Powder are so called, because fairs are generally composed of pedlars or wayfaring persons, who in France bear the name of Pied Poudreux, and in Scotland of Dusty-Foot. See Regiam Majestatem, Burrow Laws, c. 134, 140; Kames' Stat. Law, note 5, p. 412. See also Tomlins' Dict. voce Court.

Dwelling-House. In England, a man's dwelling-house is a sanctuary against the personal execution of the law, with these exceptions:—1st, It affords no protection to a person charged with a crime; 2d, Crown debtors are not protected in their own houses; 3d, Even in the case of ordinary debts, if the sheriff or bailiffs succeed in getting admission to the house without violence, they may take the debtor out of it; 4th, After repeated capias and outlawry, the sheriff, in virtue of a writ, called a capias uilagatum, may break into the house and seize the person against whom the writ is directed; and, 5th, A capias may be issued from the Court of Queen's Bench, or of Chancery, for compelling a man to find sureties to keep the peace; and, fictione juris, this process is sometimes used to effect execution on common debts. In Scotland, also, a man's house is a sanctuary to him against imprisonment on an act of warding, which contains no warrant for breaking open doors. But it is no protection against the execution of a criminal warrant, nor against letters of caption, which contain a warrant to apprehend the debtor as a rebel, against whom the whole executive power may be directed; and the caption accordingly contains an express warrant to break open doors in search of the debtor. See Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 335, et seq.; Bell's Com. (5th edit.) ii. 570; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant. See also Caption. Dying Declaration. See Declaration.

Dyvour, or Dyour; according to Skene, is a bankrupt of "bairman; who being involved and drowned in debts, and not able to pay or satisfy the same, for eschewing of prison, and other pains, makes cession and assignation of all his goods and gear in favours of his creditors, and does his devour and duty to them, proclaiming himself bairman, and indigent, and becoming debt-bound to them of all he has." By Act of Sederunt, 17th May 1606, it is ordained that a pillory be erected near the market-cross of Edinburgh, with a seat upon it, upon which all dyvours are to be exposed once on a market-day; and, before their liberation from jail, they are required to provide themselves with a hat or bonnet of yellow colour, to be worn by them while sitting on the pillory, and constantly thereafter, while they continue dyvours, under the pain of three months' imprisonment, if they be found at any time without it. By Acts of Sederunt, 26th Feb. 1669, and 23d Jan. 1673, the habit of a dyvour is appointed to be a coat or upper garment, half yellow and half brown, with a party-coloured cap or hood, to be worn on the head; and formerly all decreets of cessio bonorum required to bear a clause expressly ordaining the bankrupt to wear this habit; any of his creditors being entitled to imprison him if he were found without it. The Act of Sederunt 18th July 1688 contains a more minute description of the habit, and declares, that the Lords will not hereafter dispense with it, unless in the case of innocent misfortunes liquidly libelled and proved. And, finally, by the statute 1696, c. 5, the Lords of Session are prohibited to dispense with the dyvour's habit, unless, in the process of cessio bonorum, the bankrupt's failure through misfortune be libelled, sustained, and proved. In awarding the benefit of the cessio bonorum, it was the practice, until the passing of the cessio act, 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 56, to dispense with the habit; and by that statute (§ 18) it is abolished, and the statute 1696, c. 5, repealed. There were two cases, however, of comparatively recent date, in which, where the bankrupt's losses had arisen from dealing in smuggled goods, the court granted the benefit of the cessio, but refused to dispense with the habit. Drysdale, 20th Feb. 1752, Mor. p. 11781; Dick, 17th Nov. 1775, Mor. p. 11791. E

Earl, or Comes. This title of nobility, according to English authorities, was known amongst the Saxons, and is the most ancient in the English peerage. Formerly, both in England and Scotland, an Earl or Count appears to have been the governor of a county or province, over which he had the chief jurisdiction. The office was at first held only for life; but William the Conqueror rendered it feudal and hereditary in England, and endowed it with certain fees exigible from the suitors in the Earl's court. Deputies for the earls were afterwards appointed, who were called Viccomites or Sheriffs; and the earldom itself came to be looked upon not as an office, but as a territorial dignity, which passed along with the land to which it was attached. The dignity of earl, however, like all other titles of honour, is now merely personal, and independent of any territorial property. It is the next dignity to that of marquis, and immediately superior to that of viscount; and as those who were anciently created earls were of the blood royal, the Sovereign, in all formal writings, addresses an earl as "cousin." Ersk. B. i. tit. 4, § 1; Wight on Elections, p. 53; Tomlins' Dict. h. t. See Dignities.

Earnest, Arrhæ, or Arles; is a small sum of money, or part of a larger quantity of any other commodity, given as a corroboration, symbol, or token of the completion of a bargain. Doubts, founded upon some texts of the Roman law, were at one time entertained, whether the giving of earnest did not imply a power to either party to resile on forfeiting the earnest; but in the law of Scotland it has been long settled, that earnest is to be held merely as evidence of the completion of the contract; and that the party who resiles, besides losing the earnest he has paid, may be compelled to perform his obligation. Where the earnest given bears a considerable proportion to the whole price or consideration, it will be imputed as part of it; but as, in the ordinary case, the earnest is trifling in value, it is presumed to be what is called dead earnest, and not taken into account in the reckoning. Earnest is in no case essential to the completion of the bargain; and although, in the case of a sale, earnest perfects the contract, and vests the property in the purchaser, yet it does not affect the seller's right to demand the full price before delivery, if credit has not been given, or to stop the goods in transitu, in the case of insolvency. Nor does it affect any of the other rights vested in the seller prior to delivery. Stair, B. i. tit. 14, § 3; More's Notes, p. xcv.; Brodie's Supp. p. 853; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 3, § 5; Bank. B. i. tit. 19, § 20; Bell's Princ. § 173; Mackenzie, B. iii. tit. 3, § 1; Tait's Justice of Peace, pp. 327, 346; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. ii. p. 159, 2d edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 277; Brown on Sale, p. 11, et seq. See Sale. Delivery. In hiring domestic servants, it is usual to give earnest or arles; but this is not necessary to the validity of the agreement; for if it have been actually completed by legal consent, it is binding without arles; and where arles have been given, neither party can resile on forfeiting the arles, unless with the consent of the other party. 2 Fraser's Pers. & Dom. Rel. 376.

Easement; the English law term equivalent to the Scotch term Servitude. It is defined to be a service or convenience which one neighbour has of another, by charter or prescription, without profit; as a way through his land, a sink, or the like. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

East India Company; is the name given to a company of merchants incorporated and recognised by sundry acts of Parliament, and who at one time enjoyed almost the exclusive trade, and a large share in the administration of the government of the British possessions in India. The countries originally comprehended within the exclusive charter of the Company, are described in the stat. 9 and 10 Will. III., c. 44, as the "countries, islands, ports, cities, &c., of Asia, Africa, and America, or any of them, beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Straits of Magellan, where any trade or traffic of merchandize is, or may be used or had." It is foreign to the object of this work to attempt any analysis of the numerous legislative enactments connected with the rights and privileges of this establishment; but, whether it be regarded in a political or in a commercial aspect, as it is a subject of much general interest, it may not be improper to refer to the article "East India Company" in Tomlins' Law Dictionary, where an historical account of the origin of the Company, and a systematic arrangement and enumeration of the statutes relating to it, will be found. By 21 and 22 Vict., c. 106, the government of India, and of all territories in possession of the East India Company, and the whole powers and rights of the East India Company in relation thereto, are transferred to and vested in the Crown.

Easter; is the day on which our Saviour's Resurrection is commemorated. Easter-day is always the first Sunday after the full moon, which happens upon or next after the 21st day of March; and, if the full moon happen upon a Sunday, Easter-day is the Sunday after. It is not observed as a festival in the Church of Scotland.

Eaves-Drop. A proprietor may build, if he pleases, to the confines of his property, provided the eaves-drop from his building does not fall on the adjoining property. It is enough, however, that the eaves-drop actually falls within the builder's property; and the conterminous proprietor has no right to complain, although the water, following the natural inclination of the ground, should afterwards run into his property. The Roman law required a proprietor who had no servitude stillicidii, to place his building two feet and a-half within his march. In Scotland there is no express statute on the subject; but by custom, nine inches at the least seem to be necessary for the eaves-drop; Garriochs, 7th March 1769, Mor. p. 13178; Stair, B. ii. tit. 7, § 7; Bank. B. ii. tit. 7, § 13; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 9, § 9. See Stillicide.

Eaves-Droppers; persons who listen under the windows or eaves of a house, to disturb the public peace by framing slanderous or mischievous tales. In England, such persons are punishable by fine, and may be compelled to find surety for their good behaviour; and, as this is an offence against the public peace, the English statutes relating to it seem to be extended to Scotland under the general clause in the stat. 6 Anne, c. 6; but whether that be the case or not, a nuisance of this description would be reached by the common law of Scotland, both directly and indirectly. See Blackstone, vol. iv. p. 169; Tait's Just. of Peace, p. 382.

Edict Nautæ, Cauponæ, Stabularii. See Nautæ, &c.

Edict in a Confirmation. A writ in the form of a precept by the commissary of the bounds (now the sheriff as commissary, or the sheriff of Edinburgh, where the parties are forth of the kingdom), ordaining the next of kin of a deceased party, and all others having interest, to be cited edictally, to hear executors decerned and confirmed to the defunct. This writ, until recently, was in use to be applied for by persons desiring to be decerned executor. It was executed by a messenger-at-arms, or by an officer of court, on a market-day, at the head burgh of the county where the deceased had his domicile, and at the parish-church door on a Sunday, at the dismissal of the congregation. If the deceased was absent from Scotland, animo remanendi, the edict was executed in the same manner at the market-cross of Edinburgh, as the commune forum, and at the door of the parish-church of St Giles; i.e., the High Church of Edinburgh. The induciæ were in all cases nine days; and it was unnecessary to serve the edict on any one personally, except in the case of a confirmation ad omnia vel male apprehensata, where the executor already confirmed was personally cited on the edict. On the expiration of the induciæ, the edict might be called in court; and, if no competitor appeared, the mover of the edict was decerned executor. If there was a competition, the claimants fell to be preferred according to the legal order, without the necessity of any new edict, whether the mover of the edict should be the person ultimately preferred or not. Since the article Confirmation was printed, the procedure has been changed. By 21 and 22 Vict., c. 56, the practice of raising edicts is abolished, and parties must now proceed by petition. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 54; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 31; Bell's Com. ii. 87; Jurid. Styles, vol. ii. p. 500, et seq., 3d edit. See also Confirmation. Executor.

Edictal Citation or Intimation. An edictal citation is a citation which was formerly published at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and the pier and shore of Leith, or at the head burgh of the county where the party so cited has his residence. In civil causes this form of citation was necessary, where the party cited, although amenable to the courts of this country, was out of Scotland; and, in that case, the citation required to be given by a messenger-at-arms, who made proclamation at the market-cross of Edinburgh and the pier and shore of Leith, and left copies of citation for the defender, at those places respectively; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 18. But the practice on this point was altered by the judiciary act 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, whereby it was enacted, that after 11th November 1825, the then subsisting forms of edictal citation, charge, publication, citation, and service at the market-cross of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith, as against persons forth of Scotland, should cease and be discontinued, and in lieu thereof, such edictal citations, charges, publications, citations, and services, as against persons forth of Scotland, should be done and performed by delivery of copies at the record-office of the keeper of the records of the Court of Session. An abstract of the copy so delivered, specifying the time of service, the nature of the writ, the names and designations of the parties, and the day against which he is called to give obedience, or to make appearance, is then to be registered in a book kept for the purpose; and the keeper is further enjoined to keep three separate registers, one for citations on summonses and orders of service against parties forth of Scotland; another for citations by virtue of letters of supplement to persons forth of Scotland, to appear before any of the inferior courts; and a third for all charges, intimations, and publications to persons forth of Scotland, given by virtue of letters other than summonses passing the Signet. These abstracts, in so far as they comprehend citations by virtue of summonses, precepts, warrants of court, and letters of supplement, are directed to be periodically printed by the keeper of the record at the end of each successive period of fourteen days, from and after 11th November 1825; and the record is to be at all times open for inspection, the copies left being preserved for three years, and the keeper being remunerated for his trouble from the fee fund; 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, §§ 51, 52; A. G. 24th Dec. 1838, and 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 22. See Citation. Curatory. Minor. In criminal prosecutions, if the accused is not found personally, in addition to leaving a copy of the indictment or criminal letters at his dwelling-place, he must be edictally cited at the market-cross of the head burgh of the county where he resides, and a copy left there for him; 1555, c. 33; and in order that such edictal citation may be the more public, the Act 1587, c. 85, requires that it shall be given between the hours of eight a.m. and twelve o'clock noon, "in presence of famous witnesses specially designed." If the accused have no fixed domicile, and cannot be found personally, the Court of Justiciary will grant a warrant for citing him edictally at the head burgh of the shire, or shires, where he has chiefly resorted; and if he be out of Scotland, special authority will, in like manner, be given for citing him edictally, at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and the pier and shore of Leith, on induciæ of sixty days, the ordinary induciæ in all criminal cases being fifteen days; Hume, ii. 255, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 333. See Criminal Prosecution. Execution. Induciæ. On the same principle on which edictal citations are founded, our practice permits edictal executions of diligences and intimations of various kinds. Thus, where the parties are abroad, a warrant may be obtained for the edictal execution of hornings, inhibitions, arrestments, and other diligences. So also, edictal intimations of assignments, premonitions, and requisitions, in the case of redeemable rights and the like, are authorized; letters of supplement issuing under authority of the Court of Session, being the warrant to the messenger and notary, the former of whom makes the intimation, and takes instruments in the hands of the latter, the execution being signed by both. By 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 3, edictal executions of arrestments, in order to interpel an arrestee who is out of Scotland, must be intimated to his known agent in Scotland, the object of the enactment being, to protect debtors residing abroad, who have paid bona fide; Syme, 7th Dec. 1824, 3 S. & D. 372. But, unless by express consent of parties, all these edictal citations and intimations must be given, or made, in virtue of the royal warrant contained either in the summons, or obtained by presenting a bill at the Bill-Chamber. Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 4; Ross's Lect. vol. i. pp. 202, 293, 479, et seq.; Shand's Prac. p. 243. Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, and the seat of all the Scottish supreme courts of justice. The market-cross of Edinburgh, and the pier and shore of Leith, are held, fictione juris, to be the communis patria, and the Court of Session is the commune forum of all Scotchmen resident abroad, and amenable to the courts of this country; Stair, B. i. tit. 18, § 4; Ersk. B. i. tit. 2, § 18; Brown's Synop. h. t. and pp. 390, 575, 1933, 2306; Ross's Lect. i. 202, 293; ii. 359, 364. See Edictal Citation. Various acts of the Scotch Parliament were passed for regulating the markets, police, &c., of Edinburgh, most of which have been superseded by more recent police statutes. The act 1698, c. 8, contains many useful regulations concerning the manner of building in this city, and prohibits any new house to be built higher than five storeys above the causeway (i. e., the causeway of the front street). This statute was held to be in force, with respect to property within the old town of Edinburgh, in the case of Buchan, 5th August 1760, Mor. p. 13173; and more recently as to buildings in the suburbs, not within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild; Procurator-fiscal of Edinburgh, 20th June 1789, Mor. p. 13187. The present police acts for Edinburgh are 11th and 12th Vict., c. 113, and 17th and 18th Vict., c. 118. The extent of the municipality and the administration of its affairs are regulated by the 19th and 20 Vict., c. 32, called the "Edinburgh Municipality Extension Act, 1856." Effectual Adjudication. An adjudication is completed as a feudal right, in competition with other feudal rights, by a charter of adjudication and sasine, or by infestment on the warrant in the decree of adjudication. But, in questions with other adjudgers whose rights are not feudalized, and in reference to the pari passu ranking, the statute 54 Geo. III., c. 137, § 11, in order to fix more clearly what diligence is necessary to make an adjudication effectual, enacts, "That the presenting a signature in Exchequer when the holding is of the Crown,—or the executing a general charge of horning against superiors at the market-cross of Edinburgh, and pier and shore of Leith, when the holding is of a subject, and recording an abstract of the said signature, or the said charge, in the Register of Abbreviates of Adjudications,—shall be held in all time coming as the proper diligence for the purpose aforesaid." This act was repealed by the act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, 1856; but the act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 91, § 6, enacts, that the lodging of a draft charter and note in the office of Presenter of Signatures, when the proceeding is of the Crown, or the executing a charge of horning against superiors when the holding is of a subject; and, secondly, a copy of such note, and an abstract of such draft charter or such charge in the Register of Abbreviates of Adjudications,—shall be held as the proper diligence for making an adjudication effectual. In burgage subjects, the general charge and recording in the Register of Abbreviates are sufficient; and, by 1661, c. 62, all adjudications led prior to the first effectual one, or within year and day after it, are to be ranked pari passu. As to the mode of reckoning the year and day, see Computation of time. The first effectual adjudication, being thus the criterion of the pari passu preference, is held not merely as a private diligence belonging to the user, but as a general diligence in which all the adjudicating creditors of the debtor have an interest; nor, relatively to the other adjudications, will it lose its legal character of the first effectual adjudication, although the debt on which it proceeds may have been paid off, and the adjudication thus extinguished as an individual diligence. Bell's Com. i. 718. See also Adjudication. Charge by Adjudgers.

Effairs, or Effairing. This word occurs frequently in Scotch law language, and signifies, corresponding to, or relating to. The interest effairing to a particular sum, is the interest corresponding to the sum. "In form as effairs," means, in such form as in law belongs to the thing. Some etymological speculations about the term will be found in Ross's Lect. vol. i., p. 52.

Egyptians. The Egyptians or Gypsies, a distinct race, who sprung from the East, spread over all Europe, and became, from their vagrant and dissolute habits an intolerable nuisance, have been the object of severe regulations in most of the kingdoms of Europe. In Scotland, they are taken notice of in all the statutes for the punishment of rogues and vagabonds; and, by 1661, c. 38, justices of the peace are empowered to execute the laws against them. By an order of the Privy Council in June 1603, confirmed by the statute 1609, c. 13, the whole race was ordained to quit Scotland, under the pain of death if they returned; and even the offence of being habit and repute an Egyptian is, by that statute, declared capital. Under the statute several convictions took place; but the progress of civilization has mitigated the severity of the law; and the mere fact of being an Egyptian, unless coupled with some other charge, such as of theft, or of idle and disorderly conduct, will not be considered as a legitimate ground of prosecution or of punishment. See Hume, i. 471, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 64; Boyd's Justice, 123.

Eik to a Reversion. The reverser in a wadset right is the borrower, who, under his right of reversion, is entitled to redeem the wadset; that is, to have the land restored to him on repaying the sum advanced by the wadsetter. An eik, or addition, to a reversion, is a deed granted by the reverser, acknowledging the receipt of a farther sum borrowed from the wadsetter, and declaring that the wadset shall not be redeemable until repayment of the additional loan, as well as the original one. These eiks, although not specially mentioned in the statutes 1469, c. 28, and 1617, c. 16, yet, being additions adjoined to the reversion, must be governed by the rules applicable to the reversion itself, of which they make a part, and are therefore real rights effectual against singular successors, if registered according to the directions of the statute 1617, c. 16. Stair, B. ii. tit. 10, § 4; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 8, § 10; Bank. B. ii. tit. 10, § 21; *Jurid. Eik to a Confirmation or Testament; is an addition to the inventory made up by an executor in his confirmation. When, subsequently to the expediting of a confirmation, any additional effects belonging to the deceased have been discovered, the party who has confirmed may, under authority of the commissary, eik those effects to the confirmation.

This is done by lodging with the commissary-clerk a note of the additions to be made, whereupon the executor receives an extract, which, according to the former practice, enumerated the articles comprehended in the eik; although a reference, in the extract, to the inventory as recorded in the Commissary-court books, seems now to be sufficient—the extract stating merely the summa in that inventory. See A. S. 21st Feb. 1824. By the stat. 4 Geo. IV., c. 98, § 3, it is enacted, that after the 1st Jan. 1824, every person requiring confirmation shall confirm the whole moveable estate of the deceased, known at the time, to which such person shall make oath; "provided always, that it shall and may be lawful to eik to such confirmation any part of such estate that may afterwards be discovered, provided the whole of such estate so discovered be added upon oath, as aforesaid," excepting special assignations, which remain as under the act 1690, c. 26. Where the executor confirmed appears to have fraudulently omitted, or undervalued, any effects belonging to the deceased, any creditor, or other person interested, may apply to the commissary to be confirmed executor ad omnia vel male apprehensata. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 36, et seq.; Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, § 61; *Jurid. Ejection and Intrusion. Ejection is the violent taking possession of lands or houses, by illegally expelling the present possessor; and intrusion is the entry to possession, and the violent detention of the subject, without the consent of the parties interested, or other legal warrant. These delinquencies as to heritage are analogous to spuilzie of moveables; and they give rise to a penal action of ejection and intrusion, for recovering the possession, with the violent profits and damages, according to the pursuer's oath in litem. This action can be insisted in by such persons only as were, either by themselves or by their servants or cottars, in possession of the subjects from which they were ejected. Hence, where tenants have been illegally expelled, and the natural occupation seized by an intruder, the tenants are the proper pursuers; and without their consent or concurrence, the landlord cannot insist in the penal action. But, in such a case, even without the tenant's consent, the landlord may pursue the intruder to remove without warning, and to pay the ordinary rent, and any damage which the landlord may have suffered through the illegal act. A tenant who, after the expiration of his lease, and after having been legally warned to remove, continues to possess without the landlord's consent, will be held as a violent possessor, and will be subject to an action of ejection and intrusion, in the same manner as if he had been a stranger. The defender in an action of ejection and intrusion, if he plead any defence not instantly verified, must find caution for the violent profits; 1594, c. 217; A. S. 11th July 1839, § 34. As to the penal consequences or violent profits, this action prescribes in three years after the forcible entry or intrusion, 1579, c. 81; but the injured party may, even after the expiration of the three years, pursue the offender to remove, without warning, and to pay the ordinary rent and damages. Stair, B. i. tit. 9, § 25, et seq., and B. iv. tit. 28; More's Notes, p. cccclxxxii; Bank. Ejection, Letters of. Letters of ejection are letters under the royal signet, authorizing and commanding the sheriff to eject a tenant, or other possessor of land, who has been decreed to remove, and who has disobeyed a charge to remove, proceeding on letters of horning on the decree. Where the decree of removing is pronounced by a sheriff, he may grant a precept of ejection, directed to his own officers, without the necessity of a previous charge of horning. These letters or precepts of ejection are executed by throwing out of the house some part of the defender's household furniture, and extinguishing his fire. Anciently, where the execution of letters of ejection was forcibly opposed, the Scotch Privy Council was in use to grant letters of fire and sword, authorizing the sheriff to call for the assistance of the county to dispossess the party. But by the present practice, where the execution of any decree or other lawful diligence is opposed by a force which the civil magistrate and his officers are unable to overcome, they may apply for military aid to enforce the execution manu militari; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3, § 17; Bank. B. ii. tit. 9, § 74, and B. iv. tit. 41, § 17. In ejecting tenants on the expiration of a lease, the landlord may proceed either under the statute 1555, c. 39, or under the Act of Sederunt, 14th Dec. 1756. Under the statute, after the legal warning, decree of removing may be obtained either in the Court of Session or before the sheriff. If the decree be taken in the Court of Session, letters of horning must be raised on it; and if the tenant disobey the charge, letters of ejection may follow. If the decree of removing be pronounced by the sheriff, no letters of horning are necessary; and the ejection may proceed at once on the sheriff's precept of ejection; Bell on Leases, ii. 66, 4th edit. The rule prescribed by the Act of Sederunt 1756 is, that where the lease contains an obligation to remove without warning, the landlord may charge the tenant forty days before Whitsunday, on letters of horning raised on the lease, to remove at the stipulated term; and, on producing such horning duly executed to the sheriff, he is authorized, within six days after the term of removal, to eject the tenant. Where there is no obligation to remove in the lease, the landlord, under the Act of Sederunt, may raise an action of removing before the sheriff; and if that action be called in court forty days before Whitsunday, it is held equivalent to a warning under the statute 1555; and on a decree of removing in that action, a precept of ejection may be obtained, under which the tenant may be ejected within forty-eight hours after the term of removal. The same summary ejection may take place, where the decree of removing proceeds on any of the grounds of irritancy of the lease, mentioned in the Act of Sederunt 1756. See the forms of ejection fully explained in Bell on Leases, App. No. 3; Darling's Prac. p. 334, et seq.; Ross's Lect. ii. 510, 535, et seq.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 36, ii. et seq.; Jurid. Styles, iii. 686, 771, 992; Watson's Stat. Law, h. t. See also Removing, and the Act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, 1855, § 29, et seq., enacting new procedure in actions of removing.

Ejectment; an English law term, signifying an action at law, by which a person ousted and removed from the possession of an estate for years, may recover that possession; and which action is now used as the general mode of trying disputed titles to lands and tenements in England. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Ross's Lect. ii. 55, 3.

Elder. Elders are the lay members of church courts under the Presbyterian system of church government. In every kirk-session there must be at least two elders. The qualifications for the eldership are, that the elder shall be a man of good and exemplary moral character, and that he shall have attained the age of twenty-one years at least. He must be a communicant, and inhabitant of the parish, residing there for at least six weeks annually; or an heritor in the parish, liable in stipend and other parochial burdens; or the apparent heir of such an heritor. Where one is proposed as an elder who resides only occasionally in the parish, a certificate must be produced, under the hand of the minister and kirk-session of the parish where he generally resides, that he is of unblemished character, and regular in his attendance on religious ordinances. Elders are chosen by the kirk-session, and approved of by the congregation. When the choice or election has been agreed on in the kirk-session, the name of the proposed elder is read from the pulpit, in a paper called an edict, appointing a day, at the distance of not less than ten days, for the ordination. If no good objection be stated to the appointment, the elder is then ordained before the congregation. On his ordination, he is required to declare his belief in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament; his assent to the Confession of Faith; his conviction that the Presbyterian government and discipline are in accordance with the Word of God; to promise to conform to these standards, and to follow no divisive courses, directly or indirectly, to their prejudice; and, finally, he is required to accept the office of the eldership, and to engage to perform its duties. He is then set apart (as it is expressed) for the office, by prayer, accompanied with an exhortation to himself, and an address from the pulpit to the congregation. After this ceremony, he becomes a member of the kirk-session, in which he has an equal vote with the minister of the parish, and may be chosen representative elder of the kirk-session in the presbytery, or in any other church judicatory. When a parish is entirely without elders, the minister applies to the presbytery of the bounds, to appoint a kirk-session for his parish; or the presbytery proceeds of itself to do so. A meeting is held of the heads of families; fit individuals are selected; their edict is appointed to be served; the presbytery meets again for their ordination; and the forms, as above described, are observed. See Kirk-Session. Church Judicatories. The original design of the institution of the eldership appears to have been, to supply the minister of the parish with a parochial council, to assist him in exercising ecclesiastical discipline, and to advise and co-operate with him in matters affecting the interests of religion. Hence, an elder who discharges the religious duties of his office with fidelity, ought to take a close inspection of the moral and religious conduct of the parishioners, and to assist the clergyman in visiting and catechising the parish; he is also required to serve at the communion table. An elder removing from one parish to another may be admitted ad eundem, in the kirk-session of the parish to which he removes, without being re-ordained. And where an elder does not reside within the parish, and does not return to it within twelve months to discharge his duties, it is competent to the kirk-session to declare him no longer a member of the session; which finding is intimated by letter. Every kirk-session is represented in the presbytery of the bounds, and in the provincial synod, by one of its elders. The representative is elected every half-year, within two months after the sitting of the synod; and a new election takes place within a month after death or demission. Each presbytery is represented in the General Assembly by a certain number of elders, varying from one to four, according to the number of ministerial charges in the presbytery. These representatives are elected at least forty days before the meeting of Assembly. Elders, when members of church courts, have a title to reason and vote on all matters under discussion, in the same manner with the clergy themselves. The office of elder is gratuitous. See, on the subject of this article, Cook's Styles, &c., in Church Courts, p. 4; Acts of Assembly, 1842, Sess. 5, Act 10; Hill's Theological Institutes, p. 174, et seq., and 212, et seq.; Burns on the Poor, pp. 1-47. Election Laws. It has been thought right to comprehend, under this general title, a short account of the provisions and regulations relating to the representation of the nobility and commons of Scotland in the British Parliament, although a considerable portion of the article has been rendered merely historical by the passing of the Reform Act, as it contains a summary of the former election law of Scotland.

The ancient Parliament of Scotland consisted of the higher clergy and the barons; the latter title including not only the nobility, but every man who held territorial property as the immediate vassal of the Sovereign. It was not until towards the end of the fourteenth century (1372) that members from the royal burghs obtained places in that assembly. At that time the duty of attendance in Parliament was felt to be burdensome; and the acts 1427, c. 102, and 1587, c. 113, and several other old statutes, introduced a system of representation, chiefly as a relief to the lesser barons. Afterwards, when religious dissensions, and the increasing importance of the Commons as a political body, rendered a seat in Parliament more an object of ambition, it became necessary to improve the representative system by various legislative enactments. See the statutes 1661, c. 35, and 1681, c. 21. But while the representation of the Commons was in this state of improvement, the Scottish Parliament lost one of its branches, on the final abolition of prelacy by the act 1689, c. 3. The whole estates of Parliament sat in one house, and voted together as one deliberative body; consequently, the vote of every individual member was of equal weight; for the question seems to have been determined by a majority of the individual votes of the aggregate assembly, and not by the votes of the different estates, as distinct and independent bodies. See Mackenzie's Obs. on the Stats. p. 424. Hence it has been remarked as a result of this peculiarity in the constitution of the Scottish Parliaments, that the aids and subsidies granted to Government did not, as in England, originate with the Commons, but were conferred by the simultaneous act of the whole three estates. Another peculiarity of the Scottish Parliament was, the institution called the Lords of the Articles. This was a select committee, composed of a certain number taken from each of the estates of Parliament, and nominated in a separate meeting of the several estates, at the commencement of every Parliament; 1663, c. 1. The Lords of the Articles so chosen, were empowered to arrange and digest the subjects for deliberation, and even to reject altogether such matters as did not appear to them proper to be brought under the consideration of Parliament. This institution was not only made subservient to the undue increase of the influence of the Sovereign, to whom, in effect, it gave the advantage of a negative before debate; but, in other respects, the Lords of the Articles usurped the duties, and encroached largely on the privileges of Parliament; and, accordingly, this is stated as the first in the list of grievances represented by the estates of the kingdom to King William in 1689. By the act 1690, c. 3, this obnoxious committee was abolished. See Articles, Lords of. At the union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland (1st May 1707), the Scottish Parliament was incorporated with the Parliament of England, the united Parliament being styled the Parliament of Great Britain. The Scottish nobility, instead of having hereditary seats, as in the Scottish Parliament, are now represented in the British House of Lords by sixteen of their number; and in the House of Commons, while England continued, as before the Union, to be represented by 513 members (now, by the Reform Act, 500), the number fixed by the act of Union for Scotland is forty-five (by the Reform Act, fifty-three), of whom thirty represent the counties, and fifteen (by the Reform Act, twenty-three) the royal burghs; Act 1707, c. 7, art. 22. See Reform Act. The rules according to which these representatives of the nobility are still elected, and by which, until 1832, the representation of the Commons were elected, form the proper subject of the present article. The subject will be explained in the following order:—

1. Of the Election of the Peers of Scotland.
2. Of the Election of Commissioners for Shires.
3. Of the Election of Representatives for the Royal Burghs.

I. OF THE ELECTION OF THE PEERS OF SCOTLAND.

The sixteen representative peers must be elected from the Scottish peerage. The heirs and successors to the dignities and honours of the ancient Scottish nobility, are declared to be the electors; 1707, c. 8. It follows, that no British peer, created since the Union, has a title to vote, or to be elected; and, in the case of the Duke of Queensberry, which occurred immediately after the Union, it was resolved in the House of Lords (21st Jan. 1709), that a Scottish nobleman who was, subsequently to the Union, created a British peer, had no right to vote in the election of the representative peers. Very soon afterwards (18th Dec. 1711), in the case of the Duke of Hamilton, the House of Lords determined that a Scottish nobleman, who had been created a British peer after the Union, was not entitled to sit in the British House of Lords. Hence, it followed that a Scottish peer, in those circumstances, was deprived, not only of all right to sit in the House of Lords, but even of a voice in the election of the representative peers. This result led the Scottish peers, at the election in 1733, to alter the rule which had been formerly established; and on that occasion the Dukes of Hamilton and Queensberry, although both British peers, were allowed to vote in the election of the sixteen representative peers: they did so, however, under protest that they did not thereby compromise their rights as British peers. At last, in 1782, the right which a Scottish peer, who had been created a British peer subsequently to the Union, had to sit in the House of Lords, was brought to trial in the House of Lords by the Duke of Hamilton, when the former precedent was disregarded, and it was held, that a Scottish peer, on whom a British peerage had been conferred, was entitled, in virtue of such peerage, to a seat in the House of Lords. But, subsequently to this, the House of Lords ordered the resolution of 21st January 1709 to be communicated to the Lord Clerk-Register, with an injunction to him to conform thereto; that is, to reject the votes of Scottish peers who, since the Union, had been created British peers; Resolution of the House of Lords, 18th May 1787. At a more recent election, however (1790), the Duke of Queensberry and the Earl of Abercorn, both of them Scottish peers, created British peers since the Union, tendered their votes, which were rejected by the clerks, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Lords; but that procedure having been brought before the House of Lords, it was resolved (6th June, 1793), that the votes of the Duke of Queensberry and of the Earl of Abercorn ought to have been received; and, although this resolution was never officially communicated to the Lord Clerk-Register, the practice ever since has been to receive, without objection, the votes of Scottish peers holding British peerages, created since the Union; so that now they can vote at elections and also sit in the House of Lords. A Scottish peer who, at the time of the Union, was also an English peer, was never denied the privilege of voting for the representative peers of Scotland. When a new Parliament is summoned, the peers of Scotland are called by proclamation to meet and elect their representatives. This proclamation must be made at Edinburgh, and at the head burghs of the other counties in Scotland, ten days at least before the time appointed for the election. An execution, bearing that the proclamation has been made at the market-cross of Edinburgh, is produced at the meeting for election; but no evidence of the publication at the county towns is required. The palace of Holyroodhouse is the place of election; and the meeting for election is attended by the Lord Clerk-Register, or by two of the principal clerks of Session, acting under his commission. After prayers by one of the royal chaplains, the proclamation and execution are read, and the roll of peers is called. The names of the peers present, and of the proxies, and the signed lists of absent peers, are inserted in the minutes. The oaths are then administered to the peers present, by the officiating clerks, and the evidence that absent peers who have sent lists or proxies, have taken the oaths, is examined, after which the votes are collected from the peers present and from the signed lists, and the names of the sixteen peers who have the majority are declared. In case of an equality of votes there is no casting vote, and the returning officer merely states the fact, leaving the House of Lords to give directions in the matter. A list of the names of the peers elected, written upon parchment, and authenticated by the subscription of the officiating clerks, is read to the meeting, and afterwards transmitted to Chancery, under a cover addressed to the clerk of the Crown. Previous to taking the votes, the titles in the roll, as existing at the time of the Union, are called over, when those who are present answer "here." By 14 and 15 Vict., c. 87, § 4, titles of peerages, in right of which no vote has been given for fifty years, are not to be called, if the House of Lords shall so direct; and by 10 and 11 Vict., c. 52, titles of peerages, in right of which no vote has been received since the year 1800, are not called. The roll is again called, for taking the separate votes, proxies, and signed lists. It is at this stage of the proceedings that any peer who deems himself aggrieved, as to the precedence allotted to his title, may have his protest recorded. The complaint may be, either that his own place in the roll is, generally, too low, or that some individual peer is ranked too high. Many of the older peerages are very irregularly arranged in the list; some, such as Crawford, Errol, Rothes, Morton, and Buchan enjoying the place due to the original creation, notwithstanding repeated and sweeping alterations having been made in the line of succession; while others, for example, Mar, Sutherland, and Caithness, are placed on the roll, according to what those skilled in peerage law represent as an arbitrary and unwarranted arrangement.

No peer under age can vote; and at one time a Roman Catholic could neither vote nor be elected; 1708, c. 8; but now, by 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, §§ 5, 7, and 8, Roman Catholic peers may vote and be elected. See Roman Catholic. It will afford a good objection to the vote of a peer, if, within a year preceding the election he has been twice present at divine service in any Episcopal meeting, the clergyman of which has not taken the oaths to Government, and does not pray for the Sovereign by name, and for the Royal Family, in the form prescribed in the liturgy of the Church of England; 19 Geo. II., c. 38, § 26. The peers present must qualify themselves for the election by taking the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. Those peers who have sent proxies or signed lists must have taken and subscribed those oaths before a sheriff-depute or substitute sitting in court; or in the Court of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, in England or Ireland; or before the lieutenant of any county, or any member of Privy Council in Great Britain or Ireland; or before any judge of a county court in England, or any British ambassador or minister at a foreign court, or the secretary of any embassy or legation, or before the governor, lieutenant-governor, or officer administering the government of any of Her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad, or any of Her Majesty's judges therein; and this must be certified by a certificate attached to the oaths, and produced along with the proxy or signed list at the meeting; 15 and 16 Vict., c. 35, § 2. No one is entitled to act as proxy for an absent peer, except a peer, who is himself entitled to vote at the election; and the same peer cannot act as proxy for more than two peers. The authority to act by proxy for another must be signed by the Scotch title only of the peer who grants it; and it must have been so subscribed in presence of witnesses, who also sign their names as witnesses. See 6 Anne, c. 23, §§ 4, 5, 6. At the meeting for election, no business whatsoever unconnected with the election of the representatives can be legally introduced. The peers at that meeting have no right to decide upon a disputed title; and therefore where any vote is tendered by a person not duly qualified, or where a vote has been improperly rejected, any peer present who is dissatisfied must, if he mean to try the question, enter a protest against the reception or rejection of the vote; which protest may be the foundation of a petition to the House of Lords, complaining of the return. Those protests must be received by the returning officer, who is also bound to give extracts, or copies of them, to such peers as demand them; but in the certificate no notice is taken of such protests. The same forms are observed, where, from death, or any other cause, it becomes necessary, during the existence of a Parliament, to supply vacancies in the representative peerage. The court of review, in all questions connected with the representation of the peerage of Scotland, is the House of Lords. See the Statutes 1707, c. 8; 6 Anne, c. 23; 10 and 11 Vict., c. 52; 14 and 15 Vict., c. 87; 15 and 16 Vict., c. 35; Wight on Elections, pp. 113–129; Bell's Election Law, pp. 3–25; and Robertson's Peerage of Scotland, passim.

II. THE ELECTION OF COMMISSIONERS FOR SHIRES (ACCORDING TO THE OLD LAW).

1. Qualification.—The act 1681, c. 21, in order so far to fix the qualification of the persons entitled to elect, or to be elected, commissioners of the shire, provided that the elector should be “publicly infeft in property or superiority, and in possession of a forty-shilling land of old extent holden of the king or prince, distinct from the feu-duties in feu-lands; or, where the said old extent appears not, shall be infeft in lands liable in public burdens for His Majesty's supplies for L.400 (Scotch) of valued rent, whether kirk lands now holden of the king, or other lands holding feu, ward, or blench, of His Majesty, as king or prince of Scotland.” And the statute 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 8, provided that no person should be entitled to vote, or to be put on the roll of electors for Scotland, “in respect of the old extent of his lands holden of the king or prince, unless such old extent is proved by a retour of the lands, of a date prior to the 16th September 1681; and that no division of the old extent made since the aforesaid 16th September 1681, or to be made in time coming, by retour or any other way, is, or shall be sustained as sufficient evidence of the old extent.” According to the construction which was put upon those statutes, two or more retours of different parts of the same lands, prior to 1681, amounting together to forty shillings of old extent, were sufficient for the statutory qualification; Malcolm, 23d Jan. 1776, Mor. p. 8592. That clause in the act 1681, c. 21, which requires the old extent to be “distinct from the feu-duties,” was held to mean, that the estate, independently of the feu-duty, must amount to a forty-shilling land of old extent; M'Ara, 24th June 1747, Mor. p. 8576; Wight on Elections, p. 179; Bell's Election Law, p. 55.

Where there was not a retour showing that the freehold was a forty-shilling land of old extent, the statutes required as the only other alternative, that the land should be holden of the king or prince, and rated in the valuation books of the county at L.400 Scots of valued rent, which was in all cases a sufficient qualification, whatever might have been the old extent of the lands. The most important questions connected with a qualification of the latter description related to the splitting of valuations, and to the different kinds of property on which valuation might be put. As to the first point, the commissioners of supply were empowered, on the application of those concerned, to split every cumulo valuation, and proportion the valuation according to the real rent of the respective parcels included in it; and it afforded no objection to this proceeding, that thereby the land-tax would be subdivided into too many fractions; Wight on Elections, p. 183, et seq.; Bell's Election Law, p. 196, et seq. Although, generally speaking, territorial property was the basis of qualification, yet that expression was interpreted with some latitude, and was held to comprehend a variety of subjects, which, although less or more attached to land, yet might be considered as falling more properly under the denomination of heritable estate than of land strictly so called. Thus mills, where they had been valued, might have made part of a cumulo valuation, wherever they had ascribed multures; where that was not the case, and where, in effect, they were mere machines for performing a part of agricultural labour, it was doubtful how far they could be considered as forming any part of a cumulo valuation. In like manner, fishings might have formed the basis of a qualification, whether they were salmon fishings or other fishings, such as oyster fishings, or even white fishings in the sea; Duff, 7th August 1773, Mor. p. 8656. Feu-duties also might have been the foundation of a qualification; and in splitting a cumulo of feu-duties, payable at the general valuation, a portion of the cumulo was appropriated to the feu-duties due to the superior. Teinds likewise might have afforded a qualification, when in the hands of the proprietor of the lands out of which they were due. Whether or not a third party, who had acquired right to the teinds payable out of another person's lands, could claim on such property, was an undecided question. But heritable offices, although feudalized and retoured, were not admitted as the foundation of a qualification; Wight, pp. 199–203; Bell's

Election Law, pp. 47–67. The valuation in the cess-books was proved by a certificate under the hands of two of the commissioners of supply for the county, and of the clerk of supply. The property which afforded the qualification must have been held immediately of the king or prince. But it was not enough that the vassal held of the king, supplendo vices of the immediate superior who had refused to give an entry; for the immediate superior retained right to all the casualties, and, consequently, remained superior, although, pro hac vice, the king supplied the defect occasioned by the superior's delay or refusal to enter his vassal; Mackenzie's Observations on the Statutes, p. 467.

The person claiming to be admitted on the roll of freeholders required not only to have been infeft in his freehold, but his sasine must have been recorded; or, if he had completed his title by confirmation, the charter of confirmation must have been expedite a year before his enrolment could take place; 12 Anne, c. 6, § 1; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 10. In reckoning the year, the maxim, Dies inceptus pro completo habetur, applied, and the claimant might have been enrolled, although some hours were wanting to complete the year; Telfers, Jan. 1781, Mor. p. 8793. In cases of that kind, the date of the entry of the sasine in the minute-book was held to be the date of the registration; and the certificate of the keeper of the record, as of that date, could not be redargued by parole evidence that there was actually an interval between the entry in the minute-book and the transcription into the record. See Bell's Election Law, pp. 262, 274, and statutes and cases there cited. The rule, that the voter required to be infeft before his name could be put on the roll of freeholders was subject to exceptions—1st, In the case of a husband claiming right to vote during his wife's life, in virtue of her infeftment, where it was not a mere liferent acquired by singular titles; 2dly, In the case of a widower claiming to vote on property having a freehold qualification, of which he enjoyed the liferent under the courtesy (see Courtesy); and, 3dly, In the case of an apparent heir in possession under the infeftment of his predecessor. See stats. 1681, c. 21; 12 Anne, c. 6, § 5; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 10; Wight, pp. 238–246; Bell's Election Law, pp. 128–147. To complete the qualification it was farther requisite that the freeholder claiming enrolment should be in possession of the subject of his freehold, either naturally, by labouring the ground, or civilly, by drawing the rent or feu-duty, or other reddendum, or by taking the necessary steps for enforcing them. Hence, in creating a vote on a mere right of superiority, a separation between the property and the superiority was made, before the superiority was conveyed to the intended voter. To accomplish this the Crown vassal might have granted a feu-right to a third person, and then conveyed what remained in himself (i. e., the superiority of the feu) to the intended voter. After this, the third person re-disposed the feu to the original Crown vassal, who thus became the intended voter's vassal in the feu; consequently leaving nothing in the voter but a mere superiority. Or the same object might have been attained by the Crown vassal disposing both property and superiority to the intended voter, who, having completed his title as vassal to the Crown, in the whole subject, granted a feu-right to the former Crown vassal. But, in the latter case, the disposition to the voter must have borne that he was under an obligation to grant the feu-right, otherwise he could not have been in circumstances to take the trust oath; Forrester, 9th Jan. 1755, Mor. p. 8755. Though the superiority and property of lands thus often came to be vested in different persons, and although, colloquially, they are distinguished by those names, or the former called the dominium directum, and the latter the dominium utile, yet as, according to strict feudal notions, the latter is only regarded as a burden on the former, and not as a separate independent right, it has been generally held that the proper mode of conveying the mere superiority is, to dispose the lands themselves, and to except the previously granted feu-right from the obligation of war-randice. It has been held, however, by the First Division of the Court (although contrary to the opinion of Lord President Hope), that a mere conveyance of the "dominium directum" is an effectual conveyance of the superiority, and hence, that it was sufficient to confer a title to vote; Lord Archibald Hamilton, 23d Feb. 1819, Fac. Coll. But the soundness of that judgment (which was to have been brought under review had the case not been compromised) has been doubted; and the question having afterwards occurred in the Second Division, the Court waived the determination of it, the case having been decided against the disponent on a separate ground; M'Queen v. Nairne, 23d Jan. 1823, 2 S. & D. 637. By the case of Gardner against Trinity House of Leith, however (Feb. 9, 1841, 3 D. 534), it is settled that infeftment in the superiority of the lands is a good title to the dominium directum. See Menzies' Lect. p. 639.

As a test of the freeholder's possession, and as a protection against nominal and fictitious voters, the statute 7 Geo. II., c. 16, § 2, prescribed the form of an oath, commonly called the oath of trust and possession, which every freeholder claiming to vote at an election, or in adjusting the rolls of electors, might have been required to take and subscribe, on the motion of any freeholder formerly enrolled. The oath was in these terms: "I, A. B. do, in the presence of God, declare and swear that the lands and estate of _____, for which I claim a right to vote in the election of a member to serve in Parliament for this county or stewardry, are actually in my possession, and do really and truly belong to me, and is my own proper estate, and is not conveyed to me in trust, or for or in behalf of any other person whatsoever; and that neither I, nor any person, to my knowledge, in my name, or on my account, or by my allowance, hath given, or intends to give, any promise, obligation, bond, back-bond, or other security whatsoever, other than appears from the tenor and contents of the title upon which I now claim a right to vote, directly or indirectly, for redispensing or reconveying the said lands and estate in any manner of way whatsoever, or for making the rents and profits thereof forthcoming to the use or benefit of the person from whom I have acquired the said estate, or any other person whatsoever; and that my title to the said lands and estate is not nominal or fictitious, created or reserved in me, in order to enable me to vote for a member to serve in Parliament, but that the same is a true and real estate in me for my own use and benefit, and for the use of no other person whatsoever; and that is the truth, as I shall answer to God." Any freeholder who refused to take and subscribe this oath was not allowed to vote; and his name was directed to be forthwith erased out of the roll of freeholders. Persons convicted of taking the oath falsely incurred the pains of perjury; 7 Geo. II., c. 16, § 3. As, however, a bare superiority of the requisite extent or valuation afforded a qualification to vote, it was enough to entitle a freeholder with safety to take the oath, that he was in receipt, and was the only person in receipt, of all that could be drawn from the estate which constituted the qualification, however illusory or trifling in value it might have been. In like manner, in reference to the terms of this oath, the possession of a liferenter was held to be the possession of the fiar; and the possession of an adjudger or adjudgers, before the expiration of the legal, was understood to be possession by the proprietor; Wight, p. 257; Bell's Election Law, p. 149, et seq.

No infetment taken upon any redeemable right whatsoever, except proper wadsets, adjudications, or apprisings, allowed by the act 1681, c. 21, entitled the person so infet to vote or to be elected; 12 Anne, c. 6, § 3. The provision of the act 1681, as to wadsetters, was, that proper wadsetters having lands of the requisite holding, extent, or valuation, should have right to vote; which right "shall not be questionable upon pretence of any order of redemption, payment, and satisfaction, unless a decree of declarator or voluntary redemption, renunciation, or resignation, be produced." Proper wadsetters were justly admitted to vote, because, prior to the period of redemption, they had the full enjoyment of the lands or estate precisely as if they had been absolute proprietors; whereas, on the other hand, improper wadsetters were excluded, because, being bound to account for the surplus rents of the subject, after payment of the interest,—or, in other words, to impute the surplus in extinction of the principal sum due to them by the reverser,—they could not, even before the term of redemption, be considered as proprietors. It was decided, however, that even a proper wadset of superiority, of the requisite valuation, redeemable in five years, did not afford a freehold qualification. The reason which weighed with the majority of the Court in that case was, that this was a mere temporary and fictitious right, given in order to create a vote for a particular election, and not a true wadset, or pledging of land for the loan of money, which alone was contemplated by the act 1681; Scott, 15th Jan. 1820, Fac. Coll. See also Wight, p. 240, et seq.; Bell's Election Law, p. 94, et seq. With regard to adjudgers, the provision of the act 1681 was, that they should have no vote during the legal; and that, "after the expiry thereof, the appriser or adjudger first infet shall only have vote, and no other appriser or adjudger coming in pari passu, till their shares be divided, that the extent or valuation thereof may appear; and that, during the legal, the heritor having right to the reversion shall have vote;" which right to vote, proceeding upon an adjudication of which the legal has expired, was declared, as in the case of proper wadsets, not to be questionable on the ground of payment, or satisfaction of the debt on which the diligence proceeded, unless a decree of declarator of redemption, or a voluntary renunciation or resignation should be produced. The reason of this enactment is obvious; for, until the legal expire, the right is redeemable at any time on payment of the debt, and might therefore be said to be dependent on the debtor's will; but after the expiration of the legal the right of redemption is foreclosed, and the legal transfer to the adjudger becomes absolute. It seems to be doubtful, however, whether, even after the expiration of the legal, the adjudger's title to vote could have been considered as unobjectionable, before he had obtained a decree of declarator of expiry of the legal; and, at any rate, it was settled that no adjudger, although the legal had expired, could be enrolled unless he was in possession of the subject. Wight, p. 237, et seq.; Bell's Election Law, p. 147, et seq.

By the special constitution of the shire of Sutherland, not only the immediate vassals of the king or prince, but those also who held of the Earl of Sutherland, and of other subjects-superior, had been in use to vote in the election of commissioners of the shire; and, by 16 Geo. II., c. 11, §§ 19, 20, and 21, it was enacted, that after the 1st September 1745, no person should be eligible as commissioner for that shire, or have right to vote at the election, unless he had been infett and in possession of lands liable to his Majesty's supplies, and other public burdens, at the rate of L.200 Scots, valued rent; that the same lands should not afford double qualifications; that, where the land was held of the king or prince, the vassal of the king or prince only should be entitled to vote, and not the vassal or sub-vassal to such Crown vassal. But if the king's vassal was a peer, or other person or body politic, who by law could elect or be elected, the proprietor of the land (that is, the person having the dominium utile), and not any of his superiors, should be entitled to vote; and no after alienation of the superiority of such lands in favour of a person capable to be a member, or to vote, should deprive the proprietor of his right of electing or of being elected, or entitle the purchaser of such superiority to elect or to be elected; and, lastly, It was enacted that land of the valuation foressaid, holden in part of the Crown, and in part of a peer, or other person or body politic, incapable to elect or to be elected, should in that county be a sufficient qualification to the proprietor of such lands. See Sutherland, County of.

Generally speaking, none could be elected but such as could elect. But where the person elected during the existence of the Parliament to which he was returned lost his qualification, or was actually struck off the roll of freeholders, he might nevertheless have continued to sit as member, until the dissolution of that Parliament; Wight, p. 289. The following persons could neither elect nor be elected:—1st, Fatuous persons or lunatics under tutory or guardianship. 2d, Minors; 1681, c. 21, and 1707, c. 8. 3d, Until 1829, Papists and persons refusing to subscribe the formula in the act 1700, c. 3. 4th, Persons who, within a year preceding the election, had been twice present at divine service in an Episcopal meeting where the king and royal family were not prayed for as in the liturgy of the Church of England; 19 Geo. II., c. 38, § 26. 5th, The eldest sons of Scottish peers; Lord Daer's Case, 26th March 1793, Parl.

Cases. They were eligible, however, for any county or burgh in England; and the disqualification, even in Scotland, did not extend to the eldest sons of British peers; Wight, pp. 270 and 290; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 343, et seq. 6th, Aliens; and even when naturalized by Act of Parliament (except when the act of naturalization followed on intermarriage with the royal family), the act must contain a clause, declaring that the naturalized alien shall not be enabled to sit in either House of Parliament; 1 Geo. I., stat. 2, c. 4. See Alien. 7th, All persons concerned in the management or collection of any duties or taxes due to Government, except commissioners of the land-tax, or persons acting under them. This incapacity continued for twelve calendar months after the person ceased to hold the appointment; 22 Geo. III., c. 41. But although such persons were disqualified to vote in the election of a member of Parliament, they were not prevented from acting as freeholders in any other respect; Wight, p. 278. 8th, Persons guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury; as also, any person who asked or received a reward of any kind whatsoever for giving or withholding his vote, besides being subjected to other penalties, was for ever disabled to vote in the election of a member of Parliament; 7 Will. III., c. 4; 2 Geo. II., c. 24.

2. Of the roll of electors.—A roll of the electors in each county was first ordered to be made up by the act 1681, c. 21; and the manner of continuing and revising those rolls in the different counties annually, at the Michaelmas head-court, or at meetings for election, was more fully prescribed by the statute 16 Geo. II., c. 11. The qualification necessary to entitle a person to have been put upon this roll, has been already adverted to; and no freeholder, whose name had not been regularly enrolled, could legally vote in the election of a commissioner for the shire. In some counties, it appears that the directions of the act 1681, in regard to the rolls of freeholders, had been disregarded; and it was therefore enacted, by 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 2, that those freeholders who stood upon the roll then last made up, whether at the Michaelmas head-court or at the last election meeting, should be the constituent members of the next Michaelmas or election meeting, to revise the rolls. The statute also contained provisions for purifying the rolls as they stood at that time, by summary complaint to the Court of Session; and, to prevent future irregularities in the time of holding the Michaelmas head-court, it was directed (§ 18) that every sheriff should, at least fourteen days before Michaelmas then next, appoint a precise day for holding that court in his county in the year 1743;

and that, on the anniversary of the day so fixed, the Michaelmas head-court in that county should be held in all time coming. The claim of enrolment sets forth the name of the claimant's lands, his titles thereto, and the dates thereof, with the old extent or valuation upon which his qualification rested; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 7. (See Claim of Enrolment.) A copy of the claim required to be left with the sheriff-clerk two calendar months at least before the Michaelmas head-court; and he was required to indorse on it the date of his receiving it, and give out copies of it when required, on payment of the fee of an ordinary extract of the same length; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 7. It was not necessary that the copy of the claim lodged with the sheriff-clerk, nor even the principal claim, should have been signed by the claimant; nor, indeed, the claimant to appear personally at the meeting of freeholders (any other freeholder might have appeared for him); and, when the claimant was in Scotland, the possession of his title-deeds was held as a sufficient mandate. Where he was abroad, a special mandate seems to have been requisite; Wight, p. 154; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 40. In like manner, any objection which was to be stated to a freeholder's remaining on the roll, on account of an alteration of circumstances, required to be left in writing with the sheriff-clerk two calendar months, at least, before the Michaelmas meeting; and, in the same manner as in the case of the claim, the sheriff-clerk indorsed on the objection the date of receiving it, and gave copies of it on the same terms. Neither the name nor the subscription of the objector was required; and such objections, as well as the claim of enrolment, required to be supported at the meeting by one of the freeholders, otherwise they might be disregarded; for it was no part of the duty of the sheriff-clerk to bring them under the notice of the freeholders; Wight, p. 154, et seq.; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 40. But, although claims of enrolment, or objections to freeholders standing on the roll, required to be lodged in this way two months before the Michaelmas head-court, yet such claims or objections might have been brought forward without any such previous notice, at any meeting for the election of a member of Parliament; and, accordingly, the claim was commonly addressed to the freeholders "at their next Michaelmas head-court, or at any meeting for electing a representative in Parliament, which may be held antecedent thereto." Claims or objections might be made at the election meeting de plano, and disposed of without lodging them with the sheriff-clerk; and the claimant, if duly qualified, was enrolled; or, if the objection was well-founded, the freeholder objected

A Michaelmas or election meeting of freeholders had no right to review the proceedings of a former meeting; but a claimant whose claim had been rejected by a former meeting, might have presented a new claim, and a subsequent meeting might have added his name to the roll. But where a meeting had improperly rejected a claim, or delayed the consideration of it, or had struck the name of a freeholder off the roll without sufficient reason, an appeal lay to the Court of Session. This appeal was brought before that Court in the form of a petition and complaint at the instance of the party who had been refused admission, or whose name had been struck off. It was served upon the person whose objection had prevailed; and it must have been presented to the Court actually sitting in judgment (Speirs, 21st Feb. 1823, 2 S. & D. 237), or to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in time of vacation, within four calendar months after the meeting whose proceedings were complained of. In like manner, if a person had been enrolled whose title was thought liable to objection, a similar petition and complaint might have been presented, within the same time after the enrolment, by any freeholder standing upon the roll. The respondent required to answer the complaint within fifteen days; and the case enjoyed the privilege of a summary discussion; 16 Geo. II., c. 11; 30 Geo. III., c. 17, § 4.

Where no such complaint was brought within four months after the name of a person had been added to the roll, or where it had been brought and dismissed by the Court, such person could not have been struck off the roll without a change of circumstances. A change of circumstances sufficient for this purpose must have been such a change as would have afforded, of itself, a sufficient ground for rejecting the claim, if made for the first time upon such a qualification. 1st, On the principle already explained in treating of the voter's qualification, a conveyance of the property or dominium utile, while the superiority continued in the freeholder, did not, in this sense, amount to a change of circumstances. 2d, Even a conveyance of part of the superiority of the estate on which the freeholder stood enrolled would not have warranted the meeting to strike him off, provided he could show that he had retained a sufficient qualification. 3d, A straightening of marches afforded no ground for striking the freeholder concerned in it off the roll; but, in the case of an excambion of a part of the freehold which required new title-deeds, evidence must have been brought that the retained property afforded a qualification. 4th, The execution of a new family settlement, under which a new Crown charter was taken out, was not necessarily an alteration of circumstances sufficient to invalidate the qualification of the maker. 5th, Even a disposition of the freehold estate, containing a double manner of holding, was not considered a fatal alteration, provided there was an express obligation on the disponent to refrain from making the right public by confirmation, or from executing the procuratory of resignation; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 111; Wilkie, 20th Nov. 1821, Shaw's Cases. But a conveyance of the estate to trustees, who were infeft with powers of sale for behoof of creditors, entitled the meeting to strike the name of the truster off the roll. See Wight, p. 279, et seq.; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 392, et seq.

Procedure at the Election of a Commissioner.

—When a new parliament is summoned, the Lord Chancellor sends his warrant to the clerk of the Crown, to issue writs for the election of members; which writs were directed to be forthwith transmitted to the sheriffs-depute, or their substitutes; the principal or high sheriff being expressly prohibited to officiate. When a vacancy is to be supplied during the existence of a parliament, the warrant to the clerk of the Crown is given by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Within six free days after receiving the writ, the sheriff was required to fix and intimate the time and place of election. Publication of the notice was made at the head burgh of the shire on a market-day, and in each parish-church in the county (or, if there were no service in the church, at the church door), on the Sunday immediately after the publication at the head burgh; the day of election appointed by the sheriff not being sooner than six free days, nor later than fifteen days, after the day of publication at the parish churches. In Orkney and Shetland, it was sufficient if the publication was made at the town of Kirkwall, and the twelve parish churches of the island of Pomona, or the mainland of Orkney only. By express statute, all public notices of the time and place of elections, required to be made within the hours of eight o'clock in the morning and four o'clock afternoon, from the 25th October to the 25th March inclusive, and between eight o'clock morning and six o'clock afternoon, from 25th March to 25th October inclusive, otherwise the notices were to be deemed invalid. The sheriff, on receiving the writ, indorsed on it the date of receiving it; and the precept, or warrant for the intimations, was signed by the sheriff-depute or substitute himself. The statutes as to the writs and intimations were, 6 Anne, c. 6; 12

Anne, stat. 1, c. 15; 16 Geo. II. c. 11; 10 Geo. III., c. 41; 33 Geo. III., c. 64; 35 Geo. III., c. 65. See also Wight, p. 302, et seq.; Bell on Election Law, p. 453, et seq. The freeholders being assembled in the court-room on the day appointed, between twelve noon and two o'clock afternoon, the sheriff produced the writ, and read it, or caused it to be read by the sheriff-clerk; and at the same time he produced the executions at the market-cross and parish churches. If there was any informality in the publication of the writ, the course, where it was practicable, was for the sheriff to appoint another day for the election, and to issue a new precept for the intimations. If the publication had been regular, the business commenced by the reading of the statute 2 Geo. II., c. 24, for the more effectually preventing bribery and corruption, and section 38 of the statute 16 Geo. II., c. 11. The sheriff-clerk then produced the book in which the roll of freeholders and the minutes of their proceedings were inserted, together with copies of the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and of the trust-oath; and here the official duty of the sheriff ended; Wight, p. 306; Bell's Election Law, p. 455, et seq. The freeholders whose names stood on the roll formed the constituent members of the election meeting, and their first business was, to make choice of a preses and clerk. This was done by the person who last represented the county in Parliament, or, in his absence, by the sheriff-clerk calling over the roll, and taking the votes for those who were to fill both offices; and, in case of an equality, the casting vote was given in the following order:—1st, To the last representative of the county in Parliament; 2d, In his absence, to the representative of the county in a preceding Parliament; 3d, To the freeholder who last presided at a meeting for election; 4th, To the freeholder present who last presided at a Michaelmas head-court; and, in absence of all those, to the freeholder present whose name stood highest on the roll; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 13. The preses and clerk being appointed, a minute was prepared, stating the fact; and this minute was signed by the last representative of the county, or, in his absence, by the sheriff-clerk, and delivered to the clerk of the meeting; after which the freeholders proceeded to take and subscribe the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and to sign the oath of assurance; or those oaths might have been put previously to the election of the preses and clerk. If any of the freeholders present required it, the trust-oath might also be put to any freeholder, before he gave his vote for the preses and clerk; 37 Geo. III., c. 138. The clerk elected took the oaths of allegiance and de fidei, and subscribed the assurance, and the oath that he had received no bribe for making a return, and that he would return the person duly chosen. Quakers, in place of their oaths, were permitted to declare the substance of them on their solemn affirmation; Bell's Election Law, p. 456, et seq.; Wight, p. 314, et seq. The next procedure of the election meeting was, to clear the roll of the names of those who had died since the former meeting. After that the objections to those who stood on the roll were disposed of; and then the new claims of enrolment which had been presented were taken into consideration. The questions arising on all of those points were determined by the votes of the majority; and, where there was an equality of votes, the preses, in addition to his vote as a freeholder, had a casting vote. A signed copy or extract of the roll thus made up, whether at an election or Michaelmas meeting, was then delivered to the sheriff-clerk, to be recorded in the sheriff's books; and thus far the procedure was the same at a Michaelmas head-court and at a meeting for election; Wight, p. 316; Bell's Election Law, p. 457, et seq. After the roll had been rectified, the preses of the meeting called it over, and took the votes of the freeholders present and enrolled, for the representative of the county; and, in case of an equality of votes, the preses, on this, as on every other question before the meeting, had a casting vote. The candidate having the majority of votes was declared to be duly elected, upon which instruments were taken in the hands of the clerk, and minutes of the whole procedure were prepared by the clerk of the meeting, and signed by the preses and clerk. The clerk, immediately after the election, made a return to the sheriff of the person chosen representative, alongst with which he produced to the sheriff a copy of the roll of freeholders made up at the last Michaelmas or election meeting, extracted and signed by the sheriff-clerk, and at the same time showed him the original minutes of the election of preses and clerk duly signed; and the sheriff, after annexing the return to the writ, transmitted them both to the Crown-office in Chancery; 6 Anne, c. 6, § 5; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, §§ 16, 17. The clerk of the meeting also delivered to the sheriff-clerk, gratis, a signed copy of the roll and minutes of election, to be inserted by him in the books kept for that purpose; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 11. The clerk of the Crown, on receiving the writ and return, and within six days after they came into his hands, was bound to enter them, without alteration, in a book kept in his office; which book was open to all and sundry, for payment of a reasonable fee; 7 and 8 Will. III., c. 7; 12 Anne, stat. 1, c. 15. The duties which were thus performed by the sheriff-clerk, by the preses and clerk of the meeting, by the sheriff, and by the clerk to the Crown, having been all exceedingly important in forwarding the return of the representative to Parliament,—the performance of them was required under heavy penalties. Thus, the member who presided in the election of preses and clerk was enjoined to call the roll regularly, under a penalty of L.300. The minute of the nomination of preses and clerk must have been fairly made up, and delivered to the clerk of the meeting, under a penalty of L.100. The clerk of the meeting for election was bound to make a faithful return to the sheriff, under a penalty of L.500; and the clerk of the Crown performed his prescribed duty also under a penalty of L.500. See the statutes 6 Anne, c. 6; 12 Anne, stat. 1, c. 15; 2 Geo. II., c. 24; 7 Geo. II., c. 16; 16 Geo. II., c. 11; 37 Geo. III., c. 138. And the same statutes contained sundry other provisions, fortified by penalties, calculated to enforce the faithful performance of their duty, on all the persons concerned in making up the rolls of electors, and in returning the representatives to Parliament; such as prohibitions against a separation of the minority of a meeting from the majority—against double elections of preses and clerk, and similar proceedings,—the object of all these enactments having been to guard, as far as possible, against the manœuvres usually resorted to on such occasions, and to secure to all parties the fair exercise of their legal rights. The limits of this work do not admit of a minute detail of those various statutory regulations; the leading statute was 16 Geo. II., c. 11; and the provisions of all the statutes, with ample references, will be found digested in the treatises of Mr Wight and of Mr Bell. See Wight, p. 318, et seq.; and Bell's Election Law, p. 455, et seq.

In closing the subject of meetings of freeholders, it may be observed, that no quorum was required to make a meeting. One freeholder might constitute a court, and go through the business, either of a Michaelmas or election meeting. Nor was there any method of compelling freeholders to meet at all, either at a Michaelmas head-court, or at a meeting for election; Wight, p. 156, 157. The proceedings at the meeting for election were subject to the review of the House of Commons, upon a petition complaining of the return, the merits of which were tried by an election committee. See Committee.

III. OF THE ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR ROYAL BURGHS (UNDER THE OLD SYSTEM).

of Union, art. 22, it was provided, that fifteen of the forty-five representatives for Scotland should be chosen by the royal burghs. Of these Edinburgh elected one, and the remaining sixty-five royal burghs were divided into fourteen districts, each of which returned a representative to Parliament. This was done by each royal burgh in the district choosing a delegate to meet with the delegates from the other burghs of the district, and those delegates, when so met, elected the representative to Parliament. The act 1707, c. 8, declared that, at this meeting of delegates, the delegate from the eldest burgh on the roll of the district should preside at the first meeting for election, and that the delegates from the other burghs in the respective districts should preside afterwards by turns, in the order in which the burghs were at that time called in the rolls of the Parliament of Scotland; and in this order, accordingly, the delegates in their respective districts continued to preside in rotation ever since, until the system was changed by the Reform Act of 1832.* This right to preside remained in the same burgh during the entire Parliament, that burgh being what is called the returning burgh, in such elections as might become necessary for supplying vacancies occurring prior to the dissolution of that Parliament; 6 Anne, c. 6, § 5. The right of electing the representatives of the royal burghs was vested in the magistrates and town-council of the different burghs. The magistrates and town-council of Edinburgh, therefore, elected the representative for Edinburgh, and the magistrates and council of each of the other royal burghs chose the delegate, who was to attend the meeting of delegates to elect the member for the district. As it was thus in the magistrates and council that the elective franchise for the burgh representatives of Scotland was ultimately vested, both Mr Wight and Mr Bell, in their works on Election Law, treat at some length of the former mode of electing town-councillors and magistrates. For the purposes of the present article, however, it is sufficient to observe generally, that the magistrates and council of royal burghs in Scotland were annually chosen from the burgesses, under a system of considerable antiquity, the prominent feature of which was, that the existing magistrates elected their successors. The constitutions or setts, as they were called, of the different burghs differed from each other in some minor particulars; but, upon the whole, the system was nearly the same in all; and, in order to preserve uniformity in the proceedings of each, the setts of all the burghs were, by order of the convention of royal burghs, recorded in the books of the convention at the time of the Union. Since that time many legislative provisions, intended to secure the purity of the election of the magistrates and council of the burghs, have been made; and when any of those regulations were infringed, redress might have been obtained, and the legal penalty imposed, in the Court of Session, on a summary complaint presented and moved in Court within two calendar months after the annual election of the magistrates; Henderson, 3d July 1821, 1 S. & D. 99. See also Wight, 330–360; Bell's Election Law, p. 474–494. For the present mode of electing the magistrates and council of royal burghs, see Burgh-Royal.

The sheriff, to whom, as in the case of the commissioners for the shires, a writ was issued, indorsed on it the date of receiving it; and, within four days, he was required to make out a precept to each royal burgh within his jurisdiction, commanding them to elect a commissioner or delegate to meet the other delegates at the presiding burgh of the district, on the 30th day after the teste of the writ, or, if that were a Sunday, on the day following, for the purpose of choosing a Burgess to serve in Parliament; and those precepts were, under a penalty of L.100, delivered to the chief magistrate of each of the burghs within four days afterwards. The magistrate, on receiving the sheriff's precept, indorsed on it the date of receiving it, and, under the like penalty of L.100, within two days called a meeting of the town-council, by giving notice to each magistrate and councillor then resident in the burgh, personally, or at his dwelling-place; and the council being assembled in consequence of this notice, appointed a day for the election of a delegate, it being necessary that two free days should intervene between the meeting of the council and the day so appointed by them for electing the delegate; 6 Anne, c. 6, § 5; 7 Geo. II., c. 16, § 5; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 40, et seq. At the election of the delegate, the statute 2 Geo. II., c. 24, was read. The magistrates and councillors then took the oaths to Government, and certain oaths for guarding against bribery and corruption; and proceeded to choose the delegate by a majority of votes. Any person might have been elected delegate; and the clerk of the burgh was directed to draw up a commission in favour of the person chosen, and to authenticate it with the common seal of the burgh. A penalty of L.500 was imposed, and six months' imprisonment, and perpetual disability to hold the office of clerk, were inflicted on the clerk if he failed in his duty; 2 Geo. II., c. 24; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 25, et seq. On the thirtieth day after the teste of the writ, or, if that were a Sunday, on the day following, the delegates from the different burghs met in the town-house of the presiding burgh, between the hours of eleven and twelve forenoon; and, after production of the precepts, and reading the statute 2 Geo. II., c. 24, the delegate for the presiding burgh administered the oaths to Government, and against bribery, to the clerk of the presiding burgh, as clerk of the meeting. The commissions to the delegates from the different burghs in the district were then read; and, if any objection was made, it entered the minutes of the election along with the answers, &c. The delegates then took the oaths to Government, and against bribery; and thereafter elected the representatives, the election being by a majority of votes—the delegate from the presiding burgh having a vote as delegate, and also a casting vote in case of an equality. In case of the absence or refusal to vote, of the delegate from the presiding burgh, the casting vote was given to the delegate from the burgh which last presided, and, failing him, by absence or refusal, to the delegate from the preceding one, and so on; 1707, c. 8; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 28. When the election of magistrates for the burgh which ought to have been the presiding burgh had been reduced, and not revived at the date of the election, the next burgh entitled to preside in turn was the presiding burgh, and the election took place there precisely as if it had been the presiding burgh by regular rotation; nor was that burgh, on its restoration, entitled to preside, until the other burghs in the district had in their turn successively presided, and the right had devolved upon it again in the ordinary course of rotation; 12 Geo. III., c. 81. Minutes of the procedure at the election were prepared, and signed by the preses and clerk. The clerk returned the person elected to the sheriff, under a penalty of L.500, and the punishment of six months' imprisonment and perpetual incapacity for the office of clerk to the burgh; and the sheriff subjoined the return to the writ, and transmitted both to the clerk of the Crown, in the manner already explained in treating of the election of commissioners for shires; Wight, p. 378. See also, on the form of burgh elections, Wight, p. 361, et seq.; Bell's Election Law, p. 509, et seq.

The form of electing the member for the city of Edinburgh differed from that in which the election was made by delegates, only in this, that instead of electing a delegate, the magistrates and town-council of Edinburgh elected a representative to Parliament by a majority of the whole council of thirty-three; 6 Anne, c. 6, § 5; Wight, p. 378, et seq.; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 495, et seq. By immemorial custom, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh enjoys a casting vote in cases of equality, in the ordinary decisions of the council; but his right to such a vote does not appear ever to have been tried in any election case.

As to the qualifications of the representatives of the burghs, although it was at one time understood that the member must have been a burgess of at least one of the burghs in the district, it was afterwards settled that such a qualification was not necessary, and that any person, whether a burgess or not, within the district, might be elected representative of Edinburgh, or of any district of burghs; Bell's Elec. Law, p. 516. But, although not a burgess of any burgh within the district for which he is returned, it appears from the terms of the statutes, that the representative must have been "a burgess" somewhere. See 6 Anne, c. 6; 16 Geo. II., c. 11, § 26, et seq.

In addition to the statutory regulations already explained, it may be mentioned, that bribery on the part of a Candidate, whenever it could be proved, vacated his election; and that every point where the temptation might be supposed to have been strongest, was, and still is, guarded by oaths and penalties; 7 Will. III., c. 4; 49 Geo. III., c. 118. To avoid the risk of any undue influence on the part of Government from the presence of a military force, it is also enacted, that all soldiers quartered in any city, burgh, &c., in which an election, whether of a peer or of a commoner, is to take place, must be removed to the distance of two miles one day at least before the day appointed for the election; and that they shall not approach nearer until the day after the election is over. This statute does not extend to the city of Westminster or borough of Southwark, in respect to his Majesty's guards, nor to any place where the King or Royal Family reside at the time, in respect to such troops as attend as guards, nor to any castle or fortified place where a garrison is usually kept, in respect to such garrison; 8 Geo. II., c. 30. With regard to the laws for the trial of controverted elections, see 7 and 8 Vict., c. 103; 11 and 12 Vict., c. 18 and c. 98. As to the laws relating to bribery and corrupt practices at elections, see 17 and 18 Vict., c. 102; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 84; 21 and 22 Vict., c. 88. As to the qualifications of members of Parliament, see 21 and 22 Vict., c. 26. For the present parliamentary election law, see Reform Act. See also Parliament. Registration.

Election. In the law of England one is said to have an election when it is optional to him to make his choice of two or more alternatives; but having made his election, he is bound by it, and cannot act inconsistently with his own determination. So also, in the law of Scotland, where a party has an election, and has made it, he must abide by it. He cannot approve and reprobate according to the Scotch law expression; that is, he cannot take the benefit conferred, and reject or evade the corresponding burden or privation. Tomlins, h. t. See Approbate and Reprobate.

Election of Magistrates. See Magistrate. Town-Council. Royal Burgh. 15 and 16 Vict., c. 32 and c. 35.

Elegit; is an English law term, signifying a writ of execution directed to the Sheriff, commanding him to make delivery to the creditor of a moiety of the debtor's land, and all his goods, beasts of the plough excepted. This writ may be sued out against a party who has moveable effects sufficient to satisfy the debt; and, under it, the creditor who is called a tenant by elegit, holds possession of the moiety of the land so delivered to him, until his debt and damages are paid. This form is analogous to the ancient apprising of the Scotch law. Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 431; Tomlins' Dict. h. t.; Kames' Equity, 286. See also Adjudication.

Ellenborough's (Lord) Act; 9 Geo. IV., c. 31; see also 10 Geo. IV., c. 38, and 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 85.

Emancipation; is a term borrowed from the Roman law; and, in the law of Scotland, applied to the liberation of a child from the patria potestas, or paternal authority. See Forisfamiliatio. Patria Potestas. Adoption.

Embargo or Imbargo; is a detention or arrest of ships or merchandise by public authority. An embargo is usually imposed on the breaking out of a war, or on the occasion of some difference with the state to which the shipping or merchandise so detained belongs. The term is also applied to the detention of ships for the service of the state, on some pressing emergency, on which occasion it has been held not to be inconsistent with the law of nations to make use of all vessels found in the ports of the state which resorts to this expedient. See Park on Insurance, c. 4. The Sovereign may lay an embargo on ships, or employ the ships of subjects in time of danger for the service and defence of the country; but a warrant to stay a single ship on a private account is no legal embargo. In time of war embargos on the shipping in the ports of Great Britain may be imposed by royal proclamation; but it is doubtful whether the same power can be legally exercised in time of peace. An embargo has not the effect of putting an end to the contract of affreightment; the freight is due in the same manner as it is where the ship is detained by contrary winds; and the master and crew are consequently entitled to their wages during the detention. See Tomlins' Dict. voce Imbargo; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 976; Bell's Com. i. 517, et seq., and 573.

Embassy. See Ambassador.

Embezzlement; is the fraudulent appropriation of the property of another by the person to whom it is entrusted. At common law this offence is not held to amount to theft, but is punishable arbitrarily as malversation or breach of trust. It has been found necessary, however, for the protection of several branches of trade and manufactures, to enact special statutes for the prevention and punishment of embezzlement and similar frauds; 17 Geo. III., c. 56; 2 Fraser's Pers. Dom. Rel., p. 511; Hume, i. 60; Hutcheson's Just. of Peace, B. iii. c. 7, where an enumeration of the statutes will be found; Brodie's Supp. to Stair, 1005; Bell's Com. i. p. 564; ii. p. 182. See also Fraud. Swindling. Theft. Breach of Trust.

Emblements; in English law, the profits of sown land. In a larger acceptation, any products springing naturally from the ground, as grass, fruit, &c. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Embracery; is an English law term, signifying an attempt unduly to bias a jury by promises, persuasions, or bribes. The punishment for the person committing this offence is fine and imprisonment. If a juror accept a bribe, he is punishable by a year's imprisonment, forfeiture of tenfold the value of the bribe, and perpetual infamy. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Emigration. Various statutes have within the last fifty years been passed upon this subject, with the view of securing the proper treatment of emigrants, and of facilitating emigration. The recent acts are 14 and 15 Vict., c. 91, and 12 and 13 Vict., c. 33. The earlier statutes will be found enumerated in Tait's Just. of Peace, p. 91.

Emphyteusis; was a right known in the Roman law, of the nature of a perpetual location of land, granted for payment of a yearly hire or rent, called canon emphyteuticus. The emphyteuta or tenant was not at liberty to sell without making the first offer to the dominus; but he was entitled to the full profits of the subject, which he might also impignorate for his debt without the consent of the dominus.

The right of the emphyteuta descended to his heirs. The close resemblance in principle between the emphyteusis and the grant in feu-farm has led Craig and other authors to apply the term emphyteusis to the feu-right. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 34; Bank, B. ii. tit. 3, § 53; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 4, § 6; Mackenzie, B. ii. tit. 4, § 6; Ross's Lect. vol. ii. p. 394, et seq.

Emptio, Venditio. See Sale.

Emulatio Vicini. A proprietor is entitled to make every lawful use of his property, however detrimental to his neighbour, provided the offensive or injurious act be not done in emulationem vicini. But no man is entitled, without profit or benefit to himself, to exercise his right of property wantonly to his neighbour's prejudice. Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 2; Bell's Princ. § 964; Illust. § 962; Kames' Princ. of Equity (1825), 36, 89; Hutcheson's Just. of Peace, vol. ii. p. 96. See Property.

Enach; an amends or satisfaction for a crime, fault, or trespass. Skene, h. t.

Encheseone; the cause, occasion, or reason wherefore anything is done; as when it is said that the vassal is in the keeping of his overlord by encheseon of warde. Skene, h. t.

Endowment. In English law endowment means the bestowing or settling of dower upon a woman. The same term is also sometimes applied to the settling of a provision upon a clergyman, or building a church or chapel, and setting apart tithes for his maintenance. Tomlin's Dict. h. t. See Churches.

Eneya; a French word for the first, chief, and principal part of the heritage. Jus eneyca also means the law of primogeniture. Skene, h. t.

English Debt. It is not unfrequently a matter of some difficulty with a creditor in Scotland to know what steps he ought to take for the recovery of a debt due to him in England; or how he is to claim on an English bankrupt estate; or to oppose the liberation of a debtor under the insolvent debtors' act. The following practical directions may prove useful:—Payment of what in England is called a simple contract debt, may be enforced by a Scotch creditor against his English debtor, by action to be commenced in England, by what is there technically called either bailable or serviceable process. The creditor ought to send written authority to the attorney employed by him to sue. The particulars of the debt, and a description of the character in which the creditor sues, whether in his own right, or as executor, trustee, &c., should also be forwarded to the attorney. If the debt arise upon a bill of exchange, promissory-note, or other written document, it ought to be transmitted. If the sum due exceed L.20, the debtor may be arrested; the creditor first making affidavit, setting forth the nature and amount of the debt. This affidavit must be sworn before a commissioner in Scotland, authorized, under 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 42, to take affidavits, or before a judge in Scotland; and in the latter case, the signature of the judge and authority to take the affidavit must be verified by the affidavit of some one resident in England. On this a judge of one of the courts at Westminster will make an order to hold the defendant to bail. Where, again, the object is to prove the debt, under a commission of bankruptcy, the creditor in Scotland must forward to his agent an affidavit, setting forth fully the nature of the debt, accompanied by the securities, if any, held by the creditor, and a copy of the account, if any, between the parties. And, finally, if the creditor wish to oppose a debtor who is seeking the benefit of the acts passed for the relief of insolvent debtors, he must give notice of his intended opposition; in which case he is at liberty, either personally or by counsel, to oppose the debtor's discharge. The preceding directions, for which the compiler is indebted to an eminent English solicitor, will be sufficient to enable a party in Scotland, or his agent, to take the requisite preliminary steps; and as to the various forms of action and relative procedure, the following authorities may be consulted:—Archbold's Practice of the Common Law Courts, by Thomas Chitty; Starkie on Evidence; Roscoe's Digest of the Law of Evidence; Archbold's Practice in Bankruptcy; Montague and Ayrson on Bankruptcy; Chitty's Practice. See Affidavit.

Engraving. The property of engravings and prints is secured to the inventors by laws similar to those enacted for the protection of literary property; 8 Geo. II., c. 13; 7 Geo. III., c. 38; 17 Geo. III., c. 57; 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 59. These acts extend to lithographic and other prints; 15 Vict., c. 12, § 14. The makers of new models and casts of busts, &c., are in like manner vested with the sole right of property in them; 38 Geo. III., c. 71; 7 and 8 Vict., c. 12; 9 and 10 Vict., c. 58; Bell's Com. i. p. 123; Bell's Princ. § 1361; Illust. ib. See Literary Property. For the protection of bankers and banking companies, the offence of engraving, making, using, or possessing plates for bank-notes, intended to be fraudulently circulated, is, under special statutes, punishable by imprisonment or transportation beyond seas; 41 Geo. III., c. 57; 45 Geo. III., c. 89; both of which statutes extend to Scotland; 1 Hume, i. 141. See Forgery.

Engrosser. An engrosser or regrater, is a person who buys corn, victual, flesh, fish, or other vivres, in a fair or market, and sells them again either in the same fair or in any other fair within four miles thereof; or who, by buying, contract, or promise, gets into his hand the corn growing in the field. Under the Act 1592, c. 150, this offence is made punishable by fine and escheat of moveables; but there are no recent examples of prosecutions under this statute. Hume, i. 503. See Forestalling. Regrating.

Enlisting; is the act of entering voluntarily into the military service of the State. All persons enlisted for the land service of Great Britain must go, within ninety-six hours (Sundays not being counted), and not sooner than twenty-four hours after enlistment, along with an officer or soldier of the recruiting party, before a justice of the peace, or the chief magistrate of the place of enlistment, not being an officer of the army; and on that occasion the person enlisted is entitled to declare his dissent to the enlistment, and, on his returning the enlistment money, and paying twenty shillings for charges, and defraying any other expense he may have occasioned, he will be forthwith discharged. If he fail, within twenty-four hours after declaring his dissent, to return and pay the money, he is to be held as enlisted; and, in that case, or if he voluntarily enlists, the magistrate must then read, or cause to be read, to the recruit, the 3d and 4th articles of the second section, and the 1st article of the 6th section of the articles of war; and thereafter administer the oath of fidelity, and certain other oaths contained in the mutiny act. The magistrate certifies the enlisting and swearing, and the other particulars required by the mutiny act; and if the recruit refuse to take the oath of fidelity, the officer may detain him till he take it. In case the recruiting party has left the place, or if, from any other cause, an officer or soldier of the party cannot be found, the recruit may go by himself before the magistrate, within four days after enlistment, and before taking the oaths, and declare his dissent, and deposit the money in the hands of the magistrate. Persons receiving enlisting money, and absconding, or refusing to go before the magistrate, are held duly enlisted. If apprentices enlist, and state to the magistrate that they are not such, they may be punished by the judge ordinary for fraud, and, on expiration of their indentures, are liable to serve in the army. If they are bound for four years, their masters, in Scotland, may recover them under certain conditions detailed in the mutiny act. If the master consent to the enlistment, he is entitled to part of the bounty. (See Apprentice.) Servants enlisting before the expiration of the term of their engagements are, under the mutiny act, but not at common law, held to be validly enlisted, and are entitled to wages up to the date of their enlistment. Such are the usual provisions of the mutiny act on this subject; but, as that act is renewed annually, variations may occur; so that it is proper, on all occasions, to consult the existing act; Hutch. Justice of Peace, B. v. c. 3; Tait's Justice of Peace, p. 362. See also Soldiers. By 9 Geo. II., c. 30, and 29 Geo. II., c. 17, it is declared a capital felony for any British subject to enlist as a soldier with any foreign state without Her Majesty's leave; or for any person to procure a British subject to enlist, or to retain or hire him with intent to make him list, or procure him to embark or go beyond seas to be so enlisted; and this whether enlistment money has been paid or not; Hume, i. 551. By 1 Vict., c. 29, the enlistment of foreigners into the British service is permitted, provided that, in any regiment, battalion, or corps, their number shall not exceed the proportion of one to fifty, of natural-born subjects.

Enmity to Panel; in criminal process, is one of the grounds for rejecting a witness. To establish this ground, he must be proved to have been hostile in act and deed to the panel; or at least a sufficient cause of capital enmity between them must be proved. The person injured is not disqualified, even though there may have been animosities between him and the panel previous to the act, though, in this case, he is not entitled to implicit belief. Mere expressions of enmity, however violent, do not disqualify, but may affect the credibility of the witness. If the witness avows enmity in his examination in initialibus, he will be excluded, unless the enmity is not such as to induce him to swear falsely. Enmity to the panel is likewise a valid objection to a juror; and it will be sufficient that the animosity has been evinced by words; since there is not the same reason for overlooking such expressions in the case of a juror as in that of a witness, the loss of whose evidence often cannot be supplied. Hume, ii. 357, et seq.; Alison's Prac. 80, 285, 478; Steele, 18; Dickson on Evid., p. 879. In civil cases enmity in a witness is also a disqualification. See Evidence.

Enrolment, Claim of. See Claim.

Entail. In its most comprehensive sense, an entail or tailzie is any deed by which the legal course of succession is cut off, and an arbitrary one substituted. But the term, in its more ordinary acceptation, is applied to a deed framed in terms of the statute 1685, c. 22, and intended to secure the descent of an heritable estate to the series of heirs or substitutes called to the succession by the maker of the tailzie. This subject is fully treated of under the article Tailzie. See also Destination. Substitution.

Entry of an Heir. In feudal law, this term is applied to the entry of the heir of the vassal with the superior. On the death of the vassal, the property, or dominium utile, according to feudal principles, returns to the superior, by whom it must be again given out to the heir of the vassal before he can complete a feudal title as heir to his predecessor. It is not, however, optional to the superior to refuse an entry; on the contrary, he is bound to grant a warrant for infeftment the heir in the dominium utile to which he has succeeded. The person whom the superior is obliged so to enter is the heir pointed out by the original investiture, that is, by the charter, in virtue of which the dominium utile is held of the superior. The charter is usually conceived in favour of the vassal and his heirs whomsoever; and in that case, the legal destination is followed, and the heir-at-law is the person whom the superior is bound to enter. Where, again, a special destination is contained in the charter, it is the heir of that destination whom the superior is bound to receive as his vassal. In either case, the proper legal evidence of the heir's title to receive an entry is a service as heir to his predecessor in the particular character pointed out by the investiture; although the superior, if he chooses, may proceed on his private knowledge of the heir's propinquity, and give a precept for infeftment him without requiring a service. See Clare Constat. The heir's entry is completed by infeftment proceeding on the superior's precept; and the consideration or fee to which the superior is entitled for this transmission of the property is called the casualty of relief. Its amount is regulated by the reddendo clause in the original charter; and it is almost invariably fixed at a double of the feu-duty; that is, the heir, on receiving from the superior the warrant of infeftment, pays him a sum equal to one year's feu-duty as relief-duty. See Relief. As to the form by which heirs in burgage property are entered, see Cognition and Sasine. See the subject of this article, and the respective rights of superior and vassal, more fully treated of under the following articles:—Superior and Vassal. Charter. Clare Constat. Charge against Superiors. Heir Service. Infeftment. As to the entry of an heir cum beneficio inventarii, see Beneficium Inventarii. For the changes introduced in the completion of titles under the Act 21 and 22 Vict., cap. 76, see the article Titles to Land.

Entry of a Purchaser. The entry of the purchaser of an heritable subject, like the entry of an heir, is completed by infeftment, either proceeding on the warrant of the seller's superior, or recognised and confirmed by him. But as this subject has been fully considered in other articles, it is unnecessary here to do more than merely to refer to them. See Disposition. Composition. Base Right. Public Right. Confirmation. Resignation. Consolidation. Infeftment. For the recent changes in completing titles, see the article Titles to Land.

Episcopacy; that form of church government in which diocesan bishops are established, as distinct from, and superior to, priests and presbyters. Encyc. Brit.

Episcopalian. In Scotland, persons professing the religion of the Church of England are called Episcopalists or Episcopalianists, in contradistinction to Presbyterians, and the members of other religious persuasions, whose form of church government does not recognise the authority of bishops. The Toleration Act, 10 Anne, c. 7, authorizes Episcopalianists to meet for divine worship according to the liturgy of the Church of England; and, by the same statute, clergymen of that persuasion are permitted to perform the ceremony of marriage in Scotland, and to administer the sacraments. But political considerations rendered it necessary to put the toleration thus granted, under such regulations as might prevent danger to the State; and, accordingly, the statute 10 Anne, c. 7, and the more recent statutes, 19 Geo. II., c. 38, and 32 Geo. III., c. 63, contain sundry provisions for preserving the purity of this form of worship, and for securing the ministry of pastors well affected to the Government. The leading statutory provisions on this subject are,—1st, That the pastor must have received holy orders from a Protestant bishop of the Church of England or Ireland, and have subscribed, before officiating, the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, and the assurance, along with the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England. 2^{dly}, The congregations or assemblies for worship must meet with doors unfastened—any meeting where five or more persons besides the household (if the meeting be in a private house) assemble to hear divine service performed by a pastor of this communion, being deemed an Episcopal meeting-house within the meaning of the statutes. 3^{dly}, The statutes require the clergyman to pray for the king by name, and for the royal family, in the form prescribed by the liturgy of the Church of England. The statutory penalties are, fine, imprisonment, or transportation; but the political necessity which dictated many of those enactments having ceased, the details of the several statutes are now of less importance. Episcopacy, as the national religion in Scotland, was finally abolished by the Act 1689, c. 3. See Hume, i. 571; Hutch. Justice of Peace, B. iii. c. 15. See also Nonconformity.

Equipollent; is a term sometimes used in legal phraseology to signify equivalent, or similar in effect. Thus, for example, where statute or express paction has prescribed a particular form or ceremony to be observed, equipollents, as they are termed, are, in the ordinary case, inadmissible; that is, acts tantamount in effect will not be accounted legal compliance with the prescribed form.

Equity. Equity, in its more enlarged acceptance, has been correctly termed the soul and spirit of all law—positive law being construed by it, and rational law made by it. But, in a more limited sense, and (although somewhat incorrectly) as contrasted with law, equity is defined to be the correction of that wherein the law, by reason of its universality, is deficient. In the latter sense, it is said to be the province of equity to extend the words of the law to cases similar in principle, although not within the letter of the law, or to qualify the rigour of the law where a literal construction of it might lead to unforeseen and inequitable consequences. But although, generally speaking, a distinction such as this has been, to a certain extent, recognised between pure law and equity, nothing can be more erroneous than the idea, sometimes entertained, that equity is administered at the discretion of the judge, according to the particular circumstances of each case, without regard to rules or precedents. On the contrary, wherever the dispensation of justice has made any progress, equity, whether it be administered in a court specially constituted for the purpose, or dispensed, alongst with law, in the supreme civil court, must, in order to attain the ends of justice, be governed in its application by an inflexible regard to legal principle, as well as to judicial precedents; otherwise, as has been justly observed, “it would be above all law, either common or statute, and be a most arbitrary legislator in every particular case.” The distinction between law and equity, as administered in separate courts, seems to be peculiar to England; and although there can be little doubt that the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in that country was originally of the nature of a legislative correction of the rules of law, emanating from the Sovereign as the fountain of justice, yet, it is obvious that such a tribunal is not suited to a period when the principles of legislation and the art of administering justice come to be better understood. Hence, it may almost be said, that the ancient distinction between law and equity as administered in England no longer exists; but that justice, whether under the name of law or equity, is dispensed, not according to arbitrary or fluctuating rules depending upon the conscience or discretion of any individual, but under an artificial system of great perfection, in which the principles of rational and enlightened jurisprudence are brought into full and efficient operation, in a manner eminently calculated to give stability and permanence to the law of England. In Scotland, the Court of Session, as the supreme civil court of the country, combines in itself all the functions of the English courts, both of law and equity. The doctrine of the Scotch institutional writers is, that the Court of Session is a court of equity as well as of law, abating the rigour of the law, and giving aid where no remedy could be had in a court of pure law. This equitable power is, in Scotland, called the nobile officium of the Court, a term derived from the Roman law. The nobile officium, or judicium nobile of the Roman law, was the power vested in the prætor, in virtue of which he exercised a species of legislative control over the law; and, in like manner, the nobile officium of the Court of Session seems originally to have encroached considerably on what may be considered as more properly the province of the Legislature. But now, the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Session is governed by well-defined principles, and with all the regard usually had in Scotland to precedents. The examples of the exercise of this jurisdiction most frequently given, are those cases in which the Court interposes to modify exorbitant conventional penalties, or to permit legal or conventional irritancies to be purged at the bar, or the like; or where, in the exercise of its paternal authority, the Court interferes in extraordinary circumstances, by interdict or otherwise, for the protection of the property or rights of individuals. Hence, Scotch authorities have defined equity to be, the favourable modification of the law, whether it be that to which the parties limit themselves in their covenants, or the general law of the nation. At the same time, every one interested in preserving the purity of the law, must deprecate any approach to an union of the legislative and judicial functions; and, as a protection against such a danger, it is of much importance to avoid the too hasty adoption of what have been termed “principles of equity,” which, however well fitted they may be for the consideration of the Legislature, generally do more harm than good, when permitted to influence the determinations of a court of justice. See, on the subject of this article, Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, § 1, et seq.; Bank, B. iv. tit. 7, § 22, et seq., and B. iv. tit. 45, § 149, et seq.; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 28; Ross's Lect. vol. i. p. 360, et seq.; Blackstone, vol. i. pp. 61 and 91, and vol. iii. p. 426, et seq.; where an exposure will be found of the errors into which Lord Kames has fallen in his “Principles of Equity.” See also Law.

Equivalent. At the union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland, it was provided by article 15 of the treaty of Union, that Scotland should have an equivalent, or compensation in money, for such parts of the public debt of England contracted before the Union, as the taxes levied in Scotland should be applied to extinguish; and, for that purpose, commissioners were appointed under statute to examine and state the debts, and to dispose of the equivalent. See Articles of Union, art. 15; also the Scotch Acts 1707, caps. 15 and 16; Statutes 1 Geo. I., c. 26; 3 Geo. I., c. 13; 5 Geo. I., c. 19. The Act of Seiderunt 21st June 1707, regulates the manner of intimating assignations by those pretending right to the equivalent, and of laying arrestments in the hands of the Commissioners. By 13 and 14 Vict., c. 63, the annuity (£10,000) payable to the "Equivalent Company" is redeemed.

Erasures. Deeds or other formal writings erased in substantialibus are not deemed probative; and such defects are not suppliable by parole evidence. Various legal questions having arisen as to the effect of erasures in instruments of sasine, and of resignation ad remanentiam, the stat. 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 33, in order to increase the security afforded by the public records of deeds and instruments concerning land-rights in Scotland, enacted, that instruments of sasine or of resignation ad remanentiam, should not be challengeable, on the ground that any part of these instruments is written on an erasure; unless it should be averred and proved that such erasure was made for the purpose of fraud; or unless the record thereof is not conformable to the instrument as presented for registration. The statute does not affect judgments pronounced before 12th May 1835. Neither does it extend to instruments of sasine, or of resignation and sasine propriis manibus. Nor does it affect the validity of feudal titles of property or titles in security, which have been completed in order to remedy or supply defects arising from erasures in instruments of sasine. Bell's Com. i. p. 675; Bell's Princ. § 344; Illust. § 344, 827; Ross's Lect. i. 145; Thomson on Bills. See *Deed. Erectare essonia ab aliquo facta; to reckon, esteem, or judge essonzies, or accusations made by any person. Skene, h. t.

Erection, Lords of. Those of the nobility, or others of the laity, to whom, after the Reformation, the king, jure coronæ, made grants of the lands or tithes which had formerly belonged to the Popish ecclesiastical establishment, were called Lords of Erection, and sometimes Titulars of the Tithes; because, under their grants, they had the same rights to the erected benefices, both lands and tithes, which were formerly vested in the monasteries or other religious houses. Those grants were made under the burden of providing competent stipends to the reformed clergy, an obligation which, prior to the dates of the decrees-arbitral by Charles I. in 1629, was much neglected by the grantees. See Stair, B. ii. tit. 8, § 35; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 10, § 18; Connell on Tithes; Bell's Princ. § 1147.

Erection of a Barony. Lands cannot be erected into a barony except by the sovereign; nor, after the erection, can the privilege of barony be communicated by any base or subaltern infestment to be held of the baron; because no feudal erection importing a dignity (as baronies formerly did) can be conferred but by the Crown, or enjoyed but by those holding immediately of the Crown. Hence, a barony cannot be conveyed so as to confer the privileges, unless by disposing it to be held of the Crown. When lands are to be erected into a barony, a petition must be presented to the Lords of the Treasury, which is remitted for consideration to the Barons of Exchequer in Scotland; and, if they approve of it, the signature is superscribed by the King (or Queen.) In the Crown charter of the barony, after the description of the lands, it is declared, that his or her Majesty creates, unites, erects, and incorporates the lands, &c. into one whole and free barony, to be called by such a name. This charter confers on the lands, thus united and erected, all the privileges of barony, and had the effect not only of uniting them when discontinuous, but one sasine taken upon the barony was sufficient for all the subjects comprehended in it, however distinct they may be, such as lands, patronages, and the like, which could not be accomplished by a simple charter of union without a special dispensation. The alienation of a part of the barony does not prejudice the right of barony as to the remainder; but the part disposed has not the privilege without a new erection. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 45, and tit. 4, § 18; More's Notes, xcii.; *Bank. Error in Essentials. An error in any essential point vitiates a contract; because those who err as to the substance of their agreement have not interposed that consent on which the validity of all contracts depends. This rule applies whether the error regard the person of one or other of the contracting parties, or the subject-matter of the contract; but if the error be in accidental qualities merely, the contract is valid. Error calculi may always be rectified, because it must be presumed that the parties never intended to consent to an error of this description. Stair, Error, Summons of. Where one was served heir to a deceased person while a nearer heir existed, the erroneous service was formerly in use to be set aside by a process, commencing with what was called a summons of error; in which the pursuer, on the ground that he was a nearer heir than the person wrongfully served, craved that the service, and all following on it, might be reduced, and the inquest who served found to have erred. The summons was drawn in Latin. Of old, the reduction of services was proceeded in by an assize of error, or grand inquest of landed gentlemen, on a precept out of Chancery; the object of the proceeding being, not only to set aside the service, but to have the former inquest punished under the act 1471, c. 47, as temere jurantes super assisam. Such was also the practice as to inquests in criminal causes; but assizes of error, having been included in the list of grievances presented to William III. by the states of the kingdom in 1689, have not been used since the Revolution. And now, instead of a summons of error, an erroneous service is set aside in an ordinary action of reduction in the Court of Session. *Mackenzie's Inst. Error, Writ of. A writ of error is an English law term, signifying a commission to the judges of a supreme court, by which they are authorized to examine the record upon which a judgment was given in an inferior court; and, on such examination, to affirm or reverse the same according to law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Escape; is a secret or a violent evasion out of lawful custody or confinement. See Breaking of Prison. Those who aid or assist persons committed for capital crimes, in escaping, or attempting to escape, though they succeed not, are guilty of felony, and punishable by transportation for seven years. If the prisoner be committed for a minor offence, or for debt, those aiding him in his escape, or in attempting to escape, besides being civilly liable for the debt, where the imprisonment is for debt, are guilty of a misdemeanour, and punishable by fine. The prosecution must be commenced within a year after the offence; 16 Geo. II., c. 31. The offence of assisting a prisoner of war to escape, either out of prison or from the limits to which he is confined by his parole, is punishable arbitrarily at common law; and, by statute, the punishment is made transportation for life, or for fourteen or seven years. The crime is committed although the prisoner, after his escape, may have been prevented, by arrest, or otherwise, from leaving the country; 52 Geo. III., c. 156; Hume, i. 519, note 3. A messenger-at-arms, who, through negligence or collusion, allows a debtor to escape after he has, or might have, taken him into custody, will be liable for the debt in the caption, provided the escape has not been effected by means of violence or resistance sufficient to overpower the messenger and his assistants. *Bank. Escheat; from the French word echoir, to fall, signifies any forfeiture or confiscation whereby a man's estate, heritable or moveable, or any part thereof, falls from him. Single escheat is the forfeiture to the Crown of one's moveable estate, incurred not only on conviction of certain crimes, but which, until 1748, followed upon denunciation for non-payment or non-performance of a civil debt or obligation. Liferent escheat is the forfeiture to the superior of the annual profits of the vassal's lands during his life, or while he remains unrelaxed, which, in like manner, formerly fell when a denounced debtor had remained year and day at the horn, unrelaxed. A total forfeiture to the Crown of all one's property, heritable and moveable, is a penalty which, in Scotland, is peculiar to the crime of high treason. By the statute 20 Geo. II., c. 50, the casualties of single and liferent escheat, incurred by horning and denunciation for civil debts, were abolished from and after the 25th March 1748. But both single and liferent escheats are still incurred in the case of crimes. Thus single escheat is one article of the statutory pains of deforcement, bigamy, perjury, and some other offences. It also falls upon denunciation following on a sentence of fugitation or outlawry; and, if the rebel remain a year in this condition, the liferent escheat falls to his superior—not, however, as a punishment for the crime with which he is charged, but on account of his contumacy and rebellion, in failing to appear and underlie the law. Single escheat also follows every sentence for a capital crime; and in case, after sentence, the convict should make his escape, there seems to be ground for holding that, until he surrender himself to justice, his liferent escheat will accrue to his superior. Espousals. Espousals, or sponsalia, are a contract or mutual and solemn engagement between a man and a woman to marry each other. By the law of Scotland all promises of marriage, whether private or contained in written contracts, may be resiled from, provided a copula has not followed on the promise; for in that case the marriage is complete. But the party resiling from such an engagement, without just cause, will be liable to the other in damages for breach of promise, to the extent not only of any pecuniary loss which may have been sustained, but in solatium of his or her injured feelings. Stair, B. i. tit. 4, § 6; Bank. B. i. tit. 5, § 2; Ersk. B. i. tit. 6, § 3; Hogg against Gow, 27th May 1812, *Fac. Esquire; a title of dignity next in degree to that of knight. This addition is now conferred by courtesy, without regard to any particular qualification, or authority for using it.

Essonzie; an old law term met with in the Regiam Majestatem, and the earlier statutes of the Scotch Parliaments, signifying an excuse, by reason of sickness or other sufficient cause, for the non-appearance of a party in an action or court to which he is cited, or where he is bound to attend. The term has a similar import in the law of England. See Tomlins' Dict. voce Essoign.

Estate. The term estate, in its most ordinary acceptation, signifies a person's land estate; but it is also frequently applied to moveables. Thus, a man's personal estate comprehends both his moveable effects and the personal debts due to him. Bank. B. ii. tit. iii. p. 597.

Estates of the Kingdom. The ancient Parliament of Scotland consisted of the King and the three Estates of the Kingdom, viz.,—1st, The archbishops and bishops, and, before the Reformation, all abbots and mitred priors; 2d, The barons, comprehending all the nobility as well as the commissioners for shires and stewartries; and, 3d, The commissioners from the royal burghs. All the three Estates assembled in one house, forming one aggregate meeting, by a majority of the votes of which, in ordinary cases, all matters, whether legislative or judicial, were determined.

Through ignorance or inadvertence the three Estates of the realm are frequently spoken of as consisting of King, Lords, and Commons. This is a mistake. The three Estates are—the Lords temporal, the Lords spiritual, and the Commons. Mackenzie's Inst. B. i. tit. 3, § 3; Bank. B. iv. tit. 1, § 2; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 2, et seq. See *Parliament. Estoppel; in English law, an impediment or bar to a right of action, arising from a man's own act. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Estoverium; sustentation, nourishment. A vassal in ward was entitled to an estoverium from his superior, proportioned to the quantity of the heritage. Skene, h. t.

Estrays; valuable animals, not wild, found straying without a known owner. The finder of such animals must forthwith acquaint the sheriff, that he may have them proclaimed at the market-cross of the county town, and at the parish-church; and, if the owner do not claim them within year and day after such notice, they are held to be derelinquished, and fall to the Crown, or the donatary of the Crown. Bank. B. i. tit. 8, § 2, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 1, § 12. Estreat; is an English law term, signifying the true extract, copy or note of some original writing or record, and especially of fines, amerciaments, &c., entered on the rolls of a court, to be levied by the officers of the law. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Eve et Treve; slaves or servants, whose father, gudesire, grandsire, and forbears, have been servants to any man and his predecessors. Skene, h. t.

Eves Droppers. See Eaves Droppers.

Eviction; is the dispossessing one of property, whether in land or in moveables, in virtue of a preferable legal title in the person of him by whom the eviction is made. The dispossessed party will be entitled to institute an action against his author, the extent of the pursuer's claim in which action will be regulated by the nature of the warrandice given. Where the warrandice has been absolute, which is the implied warrandice in all onerous contracts, he from whom the property has been evicted will have a claim against his author, or his author's representatives, to the full extent of the value of the evicted property as at the period of eviction, and for all loss or damage which he may have sustained through the defective title. Stair, B. ii. tit. 3, § 46; More's Notes, p. xci.; Mackenzie, B. ii. tit. 3, § 12; Bank. B. ii. tit. 3, § 120, et seq.; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 25, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 645; ii. 279; Bell's Princ. §§ 121, 126; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 2d edit. p. 56; Kames' Equity, 116, 183; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, ii. 261. Evidence; is the proof, either written or parole, which the parties in a civil or criminal cause, may legally adduce in support of the facts and circumstances on which their respective pleas or defences depend. In this article the subject will be considered under the following arrangement:—

1. Evidence by writ.
2. Evidence by oath.
3. The order in which evidence is to be received; with some general rules as to evidence.

I. OF EVIDENCE BY WRIT.

The evidence afforded by writing is accounted the highest description of legal proof. It may be considered under the following heads:—1. Of a formal deed; 2. Of notarial instruments, and the executions of officers of the law; 3. Of acts of court, extracts from judicial records, &c.; 4. Of public instruments and documents not by officers of the law; 5. Of merchants' books; 6. Of writings in re mercatoria.

1. Of a formal deed.—A formal deed, signed and authenticated according to the rules prescribed by the law of Scotland, affords complete legal evidence of the contract, obligation, or other transaction which it sets forth. Such a deed is held in law to be a higher species of evidence than parole testimony; and, for that reason, it is the only evidence admitted to prove the constitution or transmission of a right to heritable property; nor will parole evidence be received to qualify the terms or conditions of the written deed. When the authenticity or validity of a formal deed is disputed on any ground not apparent ex facie of the instrument, the challenge must be made in the form of a regular action of reduction; and, until decree is obtained in that action, setting aside the deed, the evidence it affords remains unimpeachable. The legal rules for the authentication of deeds, so as to render them fully probative—the effect given to holograph writings—to deeds subscribed by initials, or by notaries for the parties—to writings in re mercatoria—or to deeds defaced or vitiated, or otherwise defective in the statutory or consuetudinary formalities—and the consequence of rei interventus or homologation, as validating informal writings—are explained under the following articles:—Deed. Writ. Holograph Deed. Testing Clause. Privileged Deeds. Rei Interventus. Homologation. Erasures.

2. Of notarial instruments, and the executions of officers of the law.—A notarial instrument is a written attestation, under the hand of a notary, of a fact or of facts falling within his observation. In some cases such an instrument is an indispensable solemnity. Thus, the fact of infestment having been given in heritable property, cannot be proved otherwise than by a notarial instrument of sasine. In like manner, instruments of resignation, of requisition, of consignation, of intimation of assignations, of protests on bills of exchange, and the like, are deemed fully probative; and, although all such instruments may be set aside by reason of informality, or improved in an action of reduction on the ground of falsehood, yet parole evidence will not be admitted by way of exception to disprove the facts set forth in them, of which they are the proper and only legal evidence. Notarial instruments, however, cannot be effectually founded on as legal evidence of anything more than the mere act which the law requires to be so proved. Thus, an instrument of sasine will not be received as evidence of the charter on which it proceeds; nor will a notarial instrument, where it is not essential as a solemnity, relieve the party producing it from the necessity of legally proving the fact asserted on it, or prevent the opposite party from disproving it, either by written or by parole evidence. By consent of the opposite party, notarial copies of deeds or other writings are sometimes admitted as evidence; but such copies are not sufficient if objected to. See as to the evidence afforded by notarial instruments, Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 9; B. ii. tit. 3, § 16; and B. iv. tit. 2, § 8; Bank, B. iv. tit. 27, § 3, et seq.; and B. iv. tit. 5, § 6; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 5, et seq.; Tait on Evidence, pp. 21–41, and p. 214. See also Notary-Public, and authorities there cited.

Executions by messengers-at-arms, or other officers of the law, are attestations under their hands that they have given the citations, or executed the diligences conformably to their warrants; and wherever the execution is by law essential, it affords evidence which cannot be redargued except by improbation in an action of reduction. But even where such executions are essential solemnities, they will not, more than notarial instruments, be received as evidence of extrinsic facts which have no relation to the solemnities of the execution. Bank, B. iv. tit. 6, § 9, et seq.; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 5; Tait on Evidence, pp. 4–21, and authorities there cited. See also Execution. Messenger-at-arms.

3. Of acts of court extracts from judicial records, &c.—All acts and deeds under the hands of clerks of court, and keepers of public records, are, generally speaking, held to be probative. Extracts of judicial proceedings from the records of a court, the warrants of which are in the custody of the Court, are admitted to prove what was done in court, or alleged by the parties, but not to prove the truth of those allegations; and the decrees and the judicial acts of the courts of a foreign country are, ex comitate, admitted to be proved by exemplifications or extracts, probative according to the law of that country. On the same principle, judicial transumps, whether made under authority of the supreme or of an inferior court, are probative in all ordinary cases. See Transumpt. An extract of the deed, authenticated by the proper officer, whether it be in the record of the supreme or that of an inferior court, is as good evidence as the deed itself. Such, for example, is the case (except in improbations) with respect to private deeds having a clause of registration. But where there is no such clause, and where the deed is merely recorded as a probative writ, the principal deed being returned to the party at whose desire it was recorded, the general rule is, that the extract of such a deed is not admissible as evidence, the party being in possession of the principal deed, which he may produce. Even this rule, however, is subject to several exceptions. Thus, charters by subjects, dispositions, bonds, contracts, tacks, and, in general, all other probative writs, although not having a clause of registration, are, by special statute, allowed to be registered as probative writs, and an extract under the hand of the keeper of the record, declared to make faith in all cases except that of improbation; 1698, c. 4. Public instruments appointed to be registered for publication are also excepted; and although the principals are returned to the parties, extracts from the record of sasines, reversions, or regresses, and the like, are declared to be probative in all cases, except where the writ so recorded is sought to be improven; 1617, c. 16; 1669, c. 3. The same exception extends to the register of inhibitions and interdictions; 1581, c. 119, No. 1; to summonses to interrupt the prescription of real rights; 1696, c. 19; and to the register of hornings and relaxations; 1579, c. 75. Extracts under the hands of the proper officers in Chancery, of charters of lands held of the Crown, retours of services, &c., which are recorded in Chancery, are probative except in improbations; 49 Geo. III., c. 42, § 16. In reduction-improbation, although an extract of a deed or instrument under the hand of the proper officer, or even a specification by the defender of the register in which it is recorded, will stop the certification, yet it is ultimately incumbent on either the defender or the pursuer to obtain a warrant for the production of the principal deed from the record, and that whether the deed has been recorded merely as a probative writ, or in virtue of a clause of registration. Where the registration has been made in the books of an inferior court, the Court of Session will grant a warrant to transmit the principal writing to the clerk of the process. See Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 10; Bank. B. iv. tit. 4, § 21; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 43, and B. iv. tit. 1, § 53; Tait on Evidence, pp. 184–197, and 200, and authorities there cited.

4. Of public instruments and documents not by officers of the law.—Entries in public records, not judicial, where certified by the proper officers, are, in the ordinary case, admitted as evidence. Such are entries in the journals of the Houses of Lords and Commons—in bank books—in parish registers of deaths, baptisms, or marriages—in prison books—in corporation books—and the like. Public acts of Parliament are presumed to be known to all; and the statute book, printed by the Queen's printer, may be judicially referred to. Private acts of Parliament, neither printed in the statute book, nor declared public acts, nor specially directed to be printed by the Queen's printer, and to be admitted as evidence by all judges, must be proved by examined copies from the parliamentary rolls; but, to obviate that inconvenience, a special clause is usually inserted in every private act, declaring it public to that extent. Royal proclamations, the articles of war, and the like, as printed by the Queen's printer, or in the Gazette, are held to be probative, without production of the proclamations themselves; and in the same way addresses from the people to the Crown may be proved. But gazettes are not evidence of private titles or interests, such as presentations to clergymen, or grants by the Sovereign to individuals. Tait, 50, et seq., 201.

Histories are admitted to prove ancient facts, such as propinquity of blood, primogeniture, &c., if authentic and uncontradicted by other histories of equal authority. Stair, B. iv. tit. 42, § 16; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 7.

5. Of merchants' books.—In general, a merchant's books will be held as good evidence against himself; and where they appear to have been regularly and accurately kept, they will afford what is called a sempilena probatio in his favour, or that degree of evidence by which, in matters admitting of parole proof, a fact may be legally proved by one witness, and the oath of the party himself in supplement. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 4; Bank. B. iv. tit. 27, § 6; Bell's Com. i. 330; Tait, 122; Hall, Dow's App. Cases, ii. 376; Smith, ib. 538; Dunbar, Bligh, ii. 351. See Book Debts.

6. Of writings in re mercatoria.—Under this description are included orders for goods, mandates, procurations, guarantees, offers, and acceptances to sell or buy, or transport merchandise; fitted accounts between merchants, and, in general, all letters, engagements, receipts, acknowledgments, and the like, which the various exigencies of trade may require, as to all of which the law, from favour to trade, has relaxed the rigour of the ordinary rules of authentication. Hence, such writings are probative, although not holograph, and although they want the name and designation of the writer, and are not subscribed before witnesses, a privilege which is not extended to missives or to settlements of accounts unconnected with mercantile transactions. In like manner, mercantile writs, such as bills of exchange or promissory-notes, checks upon bankers, and the like, whether arising out of mercantile transactions or not, are valid, although neither holograph nor tested. In connection with this head it may be observed, that receipts and discharges granted to tenants for rent, however large the sum, are probative, although neither holograph nor tested; and, in practice, although perhaps incorrectly, it is usual to grant similar receipts for termly payments of interest, annuities, and the like. The privilege is said to be extended to tenants on account of their ignorance of business. Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, §§ 23-24; Bell's Com. i. 330; Tait, 112, et seq., and cases and authorities there cited. See also Privileged Deeds.

II. OF EVIDENCE BY OATH.

Evidence by oath formerly consisted,—1st, Of the oaths of persons unconnected with the parties in the cause, and having no disqualifying interest in the decision; and, 2d, Of the oath of party.

1. Of the Oaths of Witnesses.—The testimony of witnesses is called parole proof; and on this branch of the subject it is proper to inquire,—1st, Who can be received as witnesses? 2d, In what manner their testimony is taken? 3d, In what cases, and to what points this species of evidence is admitted? and, 4th, to say something of the nature and effect of circumstantial and presumptive proof.

1. Who can be received as witnesses.—The general rule formerly was, that all persons of legal age and of sane mind, who believed in God and a future state of rewards and punishments, whether Christians or not, and who were not liable to any objection on the grounds of relationship, enmity, infamy, or of interest in the issue of the cause, might bear testimony. For recent changes in the law of evidence, see Infra. The following enumeration comprehends the objections which formerly might be stated to the admissibility of a witness:—(1.) From age or sex.—Persons under fourteen years of age, as being incapable of understanding the moral obligation of an oath, are, in the ordinary case, inadmissible. Exceptions to this rule have been sometimes admitted, where the individual seemed to understand the nature of an oath, and was above twelve years of age; and, in criminal cases, children even under that age have been sometimes examined, but not upon oath; the weight to be attached to the declarations of such witnesses being left to the jury. By our more ancient practice, women were inadmissible as witnesses; but the practice in that respect has changed, and, both in civil and criminal cases, female witnesses are admissible. A female, however, cannot be an instrumentary witness to the subscription of a deed or other written instrument; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 7-9; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 5; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 22-27; Tait, 84-342; Hume, ii. 329-330. (2.) From mental incapacity.—All persons deprived of reason, whether idiots or furious persons, are inadmissible. But the testimony of a person subject to occasional fits of derangement will be admitted, cum nota, as to occurrences during a lucid interval, provided no fit of derangement have intervened between the fact sworn to and his deposition; Hume, vol. ii. p. 329; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 7; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 5; Tait, 342. See Idiot. (3.) From infamy.—The testimony of infamous persons, infamia juris,—i.e., by being convicted of crimes inferring infamy, was formerly inadmissible, and unless a pardon had been granted, infamy was a perpetual disqualification; Black, 22d Dec. 1815, Fac. Coll. But now, where the party convicted has endured the punishment (unless the crime has been perjury or subornation of perjury), he is not inadmissible by reason of his conviction, but may be a competent witness in any court or proceeding, civil or criminal; 1 Will. IV., c. 37, § 9. And moral infamy, or bad moral character, is no disqualification. The evidence of such witnesses, however will be received cum nota; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 23; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 7; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 4. See Infamy. (4.) From relationship, connection, legal confidence or dependence.—Formerly, all who stood within those degrees of relationship to the party, which, in the case of a judge, would authorize a declination, were incompetent witnesses for their kinsman, although they might be received against him. See Declination. Husband and wife, however, were in no case allowed to bear testimony, even against each other, except in criminal prosecutions for crimes committed by the one against the other; and it would rather seem that the evidence of children against their parents, and of parents against their children, was inadmissible, unless in the case of domestic crimes or occult facts (see Domestic Crimes)—the principle of the law of Scotland being, that unless the ends of justice absolutely required it, a witness was never to be placed in a situation where he might be tempted to commit perjury. Natural children were not, in law, recognised as the children of their reputed father; but an objection to their testimony, on the ground of actual relationship to the party adducer, was good; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 24; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 9-11; Hume, vol. ii. p. 337; Tait, 362. See Relationship. Tutors and curators were formerly inadmissible as witnesses in favour of their wards, where they had an interest to prove acts and deeds done by themselves, or where they had taken an active part in the process in which they are proposed to be adduced. Formerly, agents could not be witnesses for their clients in the causes in which they were employed; although they might be witnesses for the same party in other causes. See Partial Counsel. They are still incompetent witnesses against their clients to prove confidential communications; and, on the same principle, as well as on account of the object of the communication, a clergyman to whom a prisoner has confessed a crime, in order to obtain spiritual consolation, cannot be called as a witness to disclose what has been so communicated to him; but similar confessions to other confidential persons, such as surgeons or physicians, or intimate friends, may be proved by the testimony of such persons. See Confidentiality. Attorneys or trustees who had not given partial counsel, and who had no personal interest in the action, were admissible for their constituent. The testimony of domestic servants and of tenants at will, in favour of their master or landlord, was formerly rejected on account of their supposed dependence; but such persons are now admissible witnesses. Artificers or labourers hired by the day or week, are competent witnesses for their employers; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, §§ 24, 25; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, §§ 12, 13, 21; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 9; Hume, vol. ii. pp. 324, 331, 338; Tait, 366, et seq. (5.) From partial counsel, or being ultroneous.—Witnesses who had given partial counsel,—i.e., who had instigated the plea, or advised with the party or his agents as to the method of conducting it, or been present at consultations, were objectionable. The recent practice in this respect was not, however, so rigid as the older practice was, the course being rather to admit the witness cum nota. Ultroneous witnesses,—i.e., witnesses who offer their testimony without being regularly cited,—were formerly inadmissible; but this objection afterwards only affected their credibility; and, at any rate, it was competent to remove the objection, by giving the witness a citation at any time before he was sworn, even after he had come into court to be examined; Tait, 369. And in criminal trials, it was declared, by statute, to be no longer competent to state any objection to a witness on the ground of his having been irregularly cited, or having appeared without citation, provided his designation is correct in the list of witnesses served on the panel; 9 Geo. IV., c. 29, § 10; Alison's Prac. 394. See also Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 9; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 7; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 28; Hume, vol. ii. p. 339; Tait, 368, et seq., and cases there cited. See Partial Counsel. (6.) From interest.—Formerly a person having any present interest in the issue of the cause, or whose character might be affected by his testimony, was inadmissible as a witness. Magistrates and other officers of royal burghs could not be witnesses in causes concerning the common good of the burgh; but members of council were admitted cum nota. Private burgesses, except where they had a patrimonial interest, were admissible. In criminal cases, a socius criminis is admissible as a witness against those concerned along with him in the commission of the offence; commonly, however, with a reservation as to his credibility; and the mere act of calling such a person as a witness liberates him from all future prosecution on account of his accession to that offence; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 25; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 6; Tait, 349, et seq.; Hume, ii. 351-354. See Interest, and authorities there cited. (7.) From enmity.—Enmity to the party against whom the witness is adduced will disqualify; but the enmity must be substantial, arising from injury done or attempted, and not inferred from mere expressions of ill-will. Where, however, expressions inferring enmity are proved, although they will not disqualify, they will be admitted to influence the credibility of the witness; Hume, vol. ii. pp. 345-351; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 7; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 6; Tait, 370. See Enmity. (8.) From bribery, and instructing how to depone.—A witness, otherwise unobjectionable, will be disqualified if the party adducing him has given, or promised or offered him, a reward or bribe for his testimony; or if he has tutored or instructed him as to what he is to swear; and this disqualification will operate, in odium corruptentis, even where the bribe has been refused and the instructions disregarded. Although, therefore, a party is fully entitled, before citing a witness, to question him as to his knowledge of the facts in dispute, yet care should be taken to avoid anything which may bias or embarrass the witness in giving his testimony. Hence, although not an absolute disqualification, it is dangerous to take down, in presence of the proposed witness, a written statement of what he can say; and if he subscribe statements of this kind, it may even amount to a total disqualification. Where a witness, as sometimes happens, has emitted a deposition which has been committed to writing, or where he has subscribed any written account whatever of the transaction concerning which he is again to be examined as a witness; before deposing of new he may require that his former deposition or declaration shall be cancelled, although, even if it were not cancelled, it never could be used against him, or appealed to as discrediting his subsequent testimony. It may disqualify the witness altogether if, before his re-examination, his previous written statement or deposition be shown to him; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 28; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 7; Hume, vol. ii. pp. 363-367; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 9; Tait, 379, and authorities there cited. (9.) From indigence.—Witnesses who were not worth the king's unlaw, as it was termed,—that is, L.10 Scots (16s. 8d.),—were, by our former practice, inadmissible; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 9; Hume, vol. ii. p. 355. (10.) From irregular citation, misnomer, &c.—It was at one time an objection to the examination of a witness on the particular trial, that he had been irregularly cited; but that objection has been so far removed, in the manner above explained. There never was any fixed inducia for the citation of witnesses; Hume, ii. 356-357; 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 16. Several of the disqualifications here enumerated, particularly those founded on relationship, agency, dependence, and the like, were sometimes disregarded in cases of occult or private facts, where there was a penuria testium, especially in the case of occult or domestic crimes, the witnesses thus admitted being received cum nota—i. e., with a certain degree of suspicion of their credibility; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 8; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 26; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 15. See also Domestic Crimes. Objections to the admissibility of a witness ought to be stated before he deposes; and they are usually proved by the examination of the witness himself in initialibus. But they may also be proved by other unexceptionable witnesses, either instantly adduced, or (if reprobaters have been protested for) examined afterwards in a process of reprobator, of which process, however, there is no recent example: See Reprobator. With regard to the disqualifications of witnesses, there was a distinction between those objections which concerned the admissibility and those which went to the credibility only of the witness. Under the latter class of objections were included all circumstances likely more or less to bias or influence the witness, which, although they might not amount to absolute disqualifications, yet might relevantly be brought into view to the effect of admitting the full application of the maxim, Testimonia ponderanda non numeranda sunt; and it may be observed generally, that the inclination of modern practice was, to allow all objections to go rather to the credibility than to the admissibility of witnesses. Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 9; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 26; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 18; Tait, 398.

Qualifications of the former law.—Recent legislation has introduced some changes in the law of evidence. By the act 3 and 4 Vict., c. 19, 1845, it is no objection to the admissibility of any witness, that he or she is the father, or mother, or son, or daughter, or brother, or sister (by consanguinity or affinity), or uncle, or aunt, or nephew, or niece (by consanguinity), of any party adducing such witness; and it is incompetent for any witness to decline to give evidence on the ground of any such relationship. It is now no longer necessary to examine a witness in initialibus, although it is competent to do so. The presence of a witness in Court during all or any part of the proceedings is now an imperative ground of disqualification; but it is competent for the Court, in its discretion, to admit such witness, where it shall appear that his presence was not the consequence of culpable negligence or criminal intent, and that he has not been unduly instructed or influenced by what took place during his presence in Court, or that injustice will not be done by his examination. The party against whom a witness is adduced and sworn in causa is entitled to examine such witness not in cross merely, but also in causa.

By the 15 and 16 Vict., c. 27, 1852, no person adduced as a witness is excluded from giving evidence by reason of having been convicted of, or having suffered punishment for crime, or by reason of interest, or by reason of agency, or of partial counsel, or by reason of having appeared without citation, or by reason of having been precognosed subsequently to the date of citation; but such witness may be examined on any point tending to affect his credibility. A witness may be examined as to whether he has, on any specified occasion, made a statement on any matter pertinent to the issue tried different from the evidence given by him at the trial; and evidence may be adduced to prove that the witness has made a different statement on the occasion specified. It is now competent for the judge, or other person taking the proof, on the motion of either party, to permit a witness to be recalled who may have already been examined.

By the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 20, 1853, any party to an action, or the husband or wife of any such party, may be examined as a witness whether they are individually named in the record or proceeding or not. But the husband or wife of any person who, on any criminal proceeding, is charged with the commission of an indictable offence, or any offence punishable on summary conviction, is incompetent to give evidence for or against himself or herself, his wife or her husband, except in so far as it was formerly competent to do so; nor is any person compellable to answer a question tending to criminate himself; nor is a husband or wife competent to give evidence against each other, of any matter communicated to them during the marriage. All actions in consequence of adultery, or for dissolving any marriage, or for breach of promise of marriage, or action of declarator of marriage, nullity of marriage, putting to silence, legitimacy or bastardy, or action of adherence or separation, are excluded from the operation of the statute. The adducing a party as a witness by the adverse party has not the effect of a reference to the oath of the party so adduced; but if a party calls and examines the adverse party as a witness, he is not entitled to refer the cause, or any part of it, to his adversary's oath. In all other respects the right of reference to oath remains as before, and the authority and practice of the courts remains unaltered and unaffected.

2. In what manner evidence is taken.—Parole evidence in the Court of Session was, until lately, with few exceptions, taken by a commissioner under a warrant from the Court or from the Lord Ordinary. When evidence is so taken, the witnesses are compelled to appear to give their testimony, by letters of diligence issued under warrant of the Court; and in virtue of which, in case of contumacy, the witness may be imprisoned. See Diligence. On his appearance before the commissioner, and the counsel and agents for the parties, the witness is sworn in these terms to tell the truth: "I swear by Almighty God, and as I shall answer to God at the Great Day of Judgment, that I will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in so far as I know and shall be asked in this cause." Formerly the commissioner then asked the witness whether he was acquainted with the parties in the cause—whether he bore any malice or ill-will to the party against whom he was called—or had received any reward, or promise of reward, for his evidence—or had been instructed as to what he was to say. If he answered these questions satisfactorily, he was then examined in the cause by the counsel or agent of the party by whom he was adduced, subject to the cross questions of the other party after his examination in chief is concluded. If the opposite party had any disqualifying objection to the witness, it was stated at this stage of the proceedings, and supported either by the examination of the witness himself in initialibus, or by other witnesses. The witness under examination is bound to answer all pertinent interrogatories, the answers to which do not tend to criminate himself, or to involve him in any criminal charge inferring infamy; but he is not entitled to decline answering a question merely because the answer may infer against him fraud or damage. The import of the witness's testimony, as nearly as possible in his own words, is taken down in writing; and the deposition, after being read over to the witness, to enable him to correct any inaccuracy in taking it down, is signed by the witness, the commissioner, and the clerk. When the proof is completed, the report of the evidence, authenticated by the subscription of the commissioner and clerk, is transmitted to the clerk of the process and reported to the judge, who is to decide on its legal effect. The duties of commissioners in taking proofs, under authority of the Court of Session, are pointed out by the acts of Sederunt 11th March 1800, and 22d June 1809. In the inferior courts, parole evidence was taken either on commission, granted in the ordinary case to the clerk of the Court, or before the inferior judge himself; but by the act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, 1853, § 10, the sheriff is directed to take a note of the evidence with his own hand, and proof by commission is disallowed. The testimony of the witnesses is committed to writing, except in the case of proceedings before justices of the peace or sheriffs, or under the small debt acts, or before justices or other magistrates vested with the power of summary conviction and punishment for minor delinquencies, without the intervention of a jury. In the Court of Justiciary, the testimony of the witnesses examined before the jury was formerly committed to writing by the clerk of Court; but by the statutes 21 Geo. II., c. 19, and 23 Geo. III., c. 45, this practice was abolished, reserving power to the Court to resort to the former practice when they see cause, and now no such record of the testimony of the witnesses is preserved. In criminal cases, witnesses, whether resident in Scotland, in England, or in Ireland, may be compelled to attend and give evidence, under letters of second diligence issued in Scotland, and indorsable in the courts of Westminster and certain other courts; 54 Geo. III., c. 186; Hume, ii. 362, 368. In civil causes, until 1816, parole evidence was almost invariably taken by a commissioner. But the introduction of jury trial in civil causes, under the statutes 55 Geo. III., c. 42, and 59 Geo. III., c. 35, made a very important change on the former practice; and although neither of those statutes deprives the Court of Session of the power of granting commissions for taking evidence, yet, in prac-

When a proposed witness is so far advanced in age, or where his health is so precarious, as to render it probable that his evidence might be lost by delay, or where he is about to leave the country, as soon as a process has been raised, a warrant may be obtained for his examination. The Court is even in use to authorise such an examination before the case has come into Court. Formerly, authority to this effect could not be obtained during vacation or recess; but by A. S. 11th July 1828, § 117, it is declared competent to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in time of vacation or recess, on an application duly intimated, forty-eight hours before, to the known agent of the opposite party, and on production of a process depending before a Lord Ordinary, or other judicial procedure, to grant commission and diligence for taking the examination of witnesses, whose evidence, owing to great age (not under seventy years), or to severe indisposition, or to their intending to go abroad, and remain abroad for a considerable time, is in danger of being lost. Such examinations are sealed up by the commissioner, and lie in retentis, subject to the future orders of Court. They are limited to matters of fact to be set forth in a condescendence for the applicant, with or without answers. The applicant must state, and, if required, show, to the satisfaction of the Lord Ordinary, that he was unavoidably prevented from making the application to the Lord Ordinary in the cause, or to the Court during session. These depositions will not be received as evidence at the trial, or otherwise, unless it be satisfactorily proved that the witnesses cannot be adduced in consequence of death, sickness, or continued absence from the country. Mr More's Notes on Stair, p. cccxv.; Darling's Prac. i. 228; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 88, 186; Tait, 412-7; Maclaurin's Form of Process, 185. See Commission to take a Proof.

3. On what points parole proof is admitted.—Contracts in regard to land (except leases for one year), or the borrowing of money, or contracts where it is pars contractus, that they shall be reduced to writing, cannot be established by parole evidence. But contracts of sale, barter, and location of moveables, and, in general, all contracts with known prestations in regard to moveable subjects, however valuable, may be proved by witnesses, except contracts for the transference of ships, or of goods in a bonded warehouse, in the actual possession of the owner, and for the conveyance of a copyright, which, by special statutes, require writing; 54 Geo. III., c. 156; 6 Geo. IV., c. 37; and 6 Geo. IV., c. 112. Submissions and transactions, or compromises with regard to moveables, are not, in the ordinary case, proveable by witnesses. Verbal submissions and decrees-arbitral, however, in matters of small importance, have been admitted to be proved by parole testimony. See Arbitration. Marriage, that is, the exchange of mutual consent de præsenti, or cohabitation, or habit and repute, may be proved by witnesses. But a promise of marriage, if a copula has not followed, can, like other promises, be, in the ordinary case, proved only by writ, or by oath of party. Nuncupative legacies to the extent of L.100 Scots (L.8, 6s. 8d. sterling), or onerous verbal agreements to the same amount, may also be proved by witnesses; but this description of evidence is inadmissible to prove gratuitous promises, however small the sum. The fact that a conveyance of heritable property, or of rights of a personal nature, such as assignments of debts due by bond and the like, was made in trust, is, by express statute, proveable by writ or oath of party, and not otherwise; 1696, c. 25. But the statute has been held not to apply to trust in the ipsa corpora of moveables. Fraud is proveable by evidence prout de jure. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 20, and B. i. tit. 6, § 5; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 4; Bank. B. i. tit. 18, § 12, and B. iv. tit. 27, § 10, and tit. 30, § 1; Tait, 295, et seq.; Dickson on Evidence.

Parole evidence will not be admitted to extinguish or qualify an obligation constituted by writing. Thus, the payment of the whole, or of any part of the contents of a bond for borrowed money, is not proveable by witnesses, except where the payment to the creditor has been made by the hands of another; e. g., where the debtor's tenant has made the payment on account of his landlord, the oath of the tenant will be admitted to prove payment of the debt. In like manner, implement of a written obligation to perform special facts,—e. g., to deliver a quantity of grain, to build a bridge, a ship, or the like,—may be proved by witnesses. So also consignment of money in the hands of a clerk of Court is proveable by witnesses. Payments of debts under L.100 Scots, or, if the whole debt be more, a payment not exceeding that sum, may be proved in the same manner; but in whatever way the debt may be constituted, its extinction beyond L.100 Scots can be proved by writ or oath of party only, and not by witnesses; A. S., 8th June 1597. A payment exceeding L.100 Scots, however, may be proved by parole evidence, where the payment is made unico contextu with the bargain, as in the case of purchases in public market, paid for on the spot, or even after an interval, where the payment is made on delivery of the article. Erskine seems to consider parole evidence admissible to prove the creditor's renunciation of, or consent to pass from, an obligation not constituted by writing; but, except to the extent of L.100 Scots, this doctrine seems questionable. See Ersk. B. iii. tit. 4, § 8; and Tait on Evidence, p. 253; and on the subject of parole evidence generally, see Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 4; Bank. B. iv. tit. 27, § 10; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 21; Tait, 336, et seq.; Bell's Com. i. 318, 622, 5th edit.; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, 281-7; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 196; Bell on Leases, 4th edit. i. 282-3; McAdam, Dow's Appeal Cases, i. 185. See also Payment. Discharge. Dickson on Evidence.

4. Of the nature and effect of circumstantial and presumptive evidence.—Circumstantial evidence, or indirect proof, may be resorted to in certain cases where direct proof cannot be obtained; but where other facts are proved or admitted, having relation to the fact sought to be established, and from which the existence of that fact may be inferred, the conviction produced by this description of evidence is sometimes even stronger than that arising from the most direct testimony; for the facts and circumstances sworn to may be so connected, and, at the same time, may contribute so effectually to establish the fact inferred from them, as to remove all suspicion of collusion amongst the witnesses, which is not always the case where direct testimony is adduced. So great, indeed, is the force of circumstantial evidence, that payment, performance, or discharge, of formal written obligations, has been frequently held to be proved by facts and circumstances, without any direct proof of the extinction of the obligation; and, upon the same principle, although circumstantial evidence will not be received to qualify an express clause or stipulation in a deed, yet such evidence has in some instances been admitted to overcome the legal inference arising ex facie of a formal deed. Thus, in a question between two co-obligants in a bond, facts and circumstances have been admitted to prove, that, notwithstanding the terms of the bond, one of the co-obligants was only a cautioner for the other; Smollet, 21st Feb. 1793, Mor. p. 12, 354. For a further illustration of the weight attached to this species of evidence, see Stair, B. iv. tit. 45; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 34; Hume, vol. ii. p. 370-372; Tait, 434, et seq. See also Circumstantial Evidence.

In connection with circumstantial evidence, it may be observed, that the law of Scotland recognises certain presumptions founded on general conclusions, established by practice or statute, or deducible from the ordinary inferences of common sense. Of these there are,—1st, The præsumptio juris et de jure,—i.e., a presumption of the fact, against which no evidence can be received; and hence such a presumption may be more correctly characterized as a legal doctrine, resting on an unchallengeable assumption of fact. Such is the presumption that a pupil is incapable of managing his affairs, which presumption cannot be redargued by proof, however strong, of his ability. The presumed incapacity on which the law of deathbed is founded, and the presumed fraud, which the act 1696, c. 5, is intended to guard against, are presumptions of the same kind. See Deathbed. Bankrupt. 2d, The præsumptio juris, which is an assumption that the fact is so, but which may be overcome by contrary proof or stronger presumption. Such are the presumptions that the possessor of moveables is their proprietor—that the child born of a marriage is legitimate—in criminal law, the presumption of innocence until guilt be proved; and the like. Lastly, The præsumptio hominis vel judicis, which is no more than an inference or bias arising from the particular circumstances of the case, and the ordinary conduct of mankind, such as the trite presumption that a man will not voluntarily do a deed to injure himself; all which presumptions of course must yield to positive proof, or stronger presumptions the other way; Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, § 9, et seq.; Bank. B. iv. tit. 34; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 35, et seq.; Tait, 447, 497. See also Presumptions. Prescription.

II. Of the oath of party.—The oath of party may be taken either upon a reference by the opposite party, or by order of the judge; and, with these exceptions, it was formerly a general rule of law, that no person could be admitted to give evidence in his own favour.

1. Oath on reference of opposite party.—Where the opposite party refers the fact at issue to his adversary's oath, and the oath so given is explicit, it is decisive of the cause. This arises, not from the superior weight attached to this species of evidence, but is founded on the judicial contract between the parties, whereby the referrer is held to have bound himself to allow the cause to be decided on the evidence of his antagonist. So binding, indeed, is this contract held to be, that no evidence whatever is admissible to impugn the testimony of the party to whom the reference is made. Even direct proof that he has sworn himself, although it might serve to convict him in a criminal prosecution for perjury, will not affect the decision of the civil action, which must be determined by the import of his oath. But in such a case, the private party who made the reference might, with the requisite concurrence of the public prosecutor, insist in a criminal prosecution for the pains of law, with the damages and expenses he has suffered by the perjury; Hume, i. 367; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44; Bank. B.

iv. tit. 32; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 9, et seq.; Tail, 217, et seq.

Where the oath of the party is not precise or decisive, or where it contains matters foreign to the point at issue, questions of great nicety arise as to what are called intrinsic and extrinsic qualities in the oath. It cannot be expected that such a subject (which, indeed, is more matter of law and interpretation than of evidence) should be treated here much in detail; but, in general, it may be observed, that where the qualification cannot be separated from the fact sworn to, it will be held as an intrinsic quality. Thus, if the fact that a party promised to pay a certain sum of money be referred to his oath, and he swear that he made the promise conditionally, and that the condition has not been purified, the condition cannot be separated from the promise, and will therefore be accounted an intrinsic quality in the oath. Where, on the other hand, the fact of the existence of a debt is referred to the oath of a party, and he swears that the debt is due, but that he has a counter claim which extinguishes it by compensation, the counter claim so stated will be held an extrinsic quality; because compensation, although a valid defence, must be established otherwise than by the oath of the party who pleads it; hence, it cannot be admitted to qualify an oath which distinctly admits the existence of the debt. The decision of questions of this kind, however, necessarily depends upon the true meaning and extent of the reference, which must be ascertained by an accurate discrimination of the facts which the party referring intends, or is bound by this mode of procedure to peril, on the good faith of his adversary. See the subject fully treated, Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, §§ 11-14; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 14; Bank. B. iv. tit. 32, § 16; Tail, 240.

Reference to oath of party is not admissible to supply the want of public instruments required as solemnities, such as instruments of sasine, of requisition, and the like. In like manner, where matters are entire, the want of writing in transactions concerning the titles to heritable subjects, including leases exceeding one year's endurance, cannot be supplied by oath of party. Writing is also indispensable, and not to be supplied by oath of party, in the nomination of an executor; but verbal legacies to any amount are good, if admitted by the party liable to pay them, and may be proved by reference to his oath, although not by witnesses, if they exceed L.100 Scots; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 7. Where there are manifest errors or inaccuracies in a deed, its contents may be overruled or controlled by oath of party; but it seems more doubtful whether a cause or obligation can, on such evidence, be added to a finished written agreement; Tait, 225, and cases there cited. In almost all cases, however, in which writing is essential to bind the parties, they will be bound without it, if there have been a rei interventus, or performance, total or partial, by either party, on the faith of the contract; and after such a rei interventus, the contract, if denied, may be proved by oath of party, and in some cases even by witnesses. Thus, a rei interventus has been held sufficient to supply the want of writing, both in leases exceeding a year, and in sales of heritage—in the constitution of servitudes—in submissions concerning heritage—in cautionary obligations—in agreements where writing was pars contractus—and the like; not, however, in sales of ships, even although the price had been paid, and possession given—writing being in that case a statutory requisite; Tait, 227; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 5; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 9.

In criminal prosecutions, a party cannot be required to swear upon a reference to his oath in any matter in which his confession of guilt would infer infamy or personal punishment. By express statute, however, such a reference is competent in a trial for usury; 1600, c. 7; and in all criminal prosecutions concluding for fine only, or restricted to that by the prosecutor, the defender may be required to swear on a reference to his oath. In criminal cases it seems to be incompetent for the accused to refer the truth of the charge generally to the oath of the prosecutor, public or private, this being a species of contract on the panel's side hardly reconcilable with the principles of criminal jurisprudence; Hume, i. 368, and ii. 325 and 387. In civil actions reference to oath is excluded in all cases of an infamous nature, such as theft, swindling, and the like, and even in cases which, although not infamous, may, if prosecuted criminally, involve the party in personal punishment. Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 5; Bank. B. iv. tit. 32, § 4; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 9, and tit. 4, § 94; Tail, 233.

The reference to oath is a bar to any new process upon the same interest and cause of action, but will not affect third parties who have not sanctioned it. To this rule there is an exception in the case of arrestments; for the arrestee may refer his defence against the arrester, to the oath of the common debtor; and by that oath the arrester will be bound; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 6, § 16. The oath of a bankrupt, upon reference by an alleged debtor to his estate, rather appears at one time to have been thought admissible against the estate, where there was no objection on the ground of relationship to the party referring, or other suspicious circumstances; Bell's Com. ii. 484.

So also where a creditor of the estate proposed to refer the debt to the oath of the bankrupt, the competency of the reference seems at one time to have depended on the question, whether or not the bankrupt had an interest in the issue, the distinction between the oath of a witness and the oath of party being, it was stated, that interest in the witness formed the ground of exclusion; whereas, in reference to oath, interest was the ground on which it rested. Hence it was thought, that if the fact in dispute be proveable by parole evidence, the party might refer to the bankrupt's oath, if he had an interest, and might have the benefit of his evidence as a witness, if his interest be at an end. See, on this subject, Mein, 11th July 1829, 7 S. & D. 902, and authorities there cited. It seems now, however, to be held, that reference to the oath of a bankrupt is incompetent, on the ground that, by the sequestration, he is divested in favour of his creditors, and is no longer a party. See the case of Adam v. MacLachlan, Jan. 29, 1847, 9 D. 566. The admission of one co-obligant or co-creditor, on a reference to his oath, does not bind the others; nor will the other co-obligants or co-creditors be bound by the deposition, in a reference made to oath by one of their number. But the rule appears to be different as between principal and cautioner; for the cautionary obligation, being merely accessory, must stand or fall with the principal obligation, and, consequently, may be affected either by the oath on reference, or by the reference to oath, made by the principal debtor; Tait, 258. The oaths on reference of guardians, trustees, and managers for others, or the references to oath made by them in matters within their administration, bind their constituents; e.g., the oaths or references of guardians for minors bind their wards; the oaths of wives proposita rebus domesticis, or of children in familia, to prove necessary furnishings, bind the husband or father; the oaths of magistrates, although functi officio, to prove contracts made by them while in office, bind the corporation; and the like; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 10; Bank. B. iv. tit. 32, § 3; Tait, 264. The assignee, until intimation of the assignation, will be bound by the cedent's oath; but, after intimation, the cedent's oath is inadmissible to prove compensation, payment, or any other direct defence against the debt; except—1st, Where the assignation has been gratuitous, or in trust for the cedent; 2d, Even where the assignation is onerous, if it have been made after the subject of it has become litigious by an action (not a mere citation), at the instance of the debtor against the cedent, on the same grounds on which the debtor afterwards disputes the assignee's claim; 3d, If the assignee have followed out diligence commenced in name of the cedent; 4th, If compensation against the cedent have been proved scripto, and the assignee pleads recompensation in the person of the cedent, the cedent's oath is admissible against the assignee to elide the plea of recompensation—upon the principle that the ground of recompensation is still in the person of the cedent unassigned; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 5, §§ 9, 10; Stair, B. iii. tit. 1, § 18; Bank. B. iii. tit. 1, § 25. A reference to oath by the public prosecutor in a criminal process, with a negative oath by the accused, will not defeat the private party's civil claim for damages; nor, on the other hand, will a similar reference by the private party in a civil action compromise the right of the public prosecutor to insist against the defender ad vindictam publicam; Tait, 272. See farther, on the subject of this section, Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 8; Bank. B. iv. tit. 32, §§ 5 and 6; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 10.

Where a reference to oath is proposed, the usual course is, for the party referring to put into process a minute of reference, which is seen, and, if necessary, answered, or objected to, by the opposite party; and the terms of the reference being finally adjusted and approved of by the judge, the deposition is taken by the judge or by a commissioner, in the ordinary manner, and the cause decided according to its import. Reference to oath, where otherwise competent, may be made at any time before extract, and, according to some authorities, even after extract, if offered in a suspension. It has also been decided, that such a reference is admissible after a verdict in the Jury Court against the party referring, on account of his failure to prove his case; Clark, 20th Nov. 1819, Fac. Coll. Hitherto, however, it has not been expressly settled whether or not a reference to oath can be competently made where the party referred to has already proved his case by witnesses; Tait, 235.

2. Oaths required by the judge.—The oaths of this description are the oath in supplement and the oath in litem. The oath in supplement is admitted to supply deficiencies in legal evidence, where the party whose oath is allowed has brought what is called a semiplena probatio. The ordinary cases in which such an oath is admissible are those in which the oath of a merchant, in supplement to regularly kept books, is admitted to prove furnishings made by him; or where, in questions of filiation, the oath of the mother of an illegitimate child is admitted to establish the paternity, provided she has been enabled, by other evidence, to prove such intimacy or familiarity between herself and the putative father, as raises not a suspicion merely, but a reasonable belief that illicit intercourse must have taken place within the requisite time. As, however, oaths in supplement do not rest on any implied contract between the litigants, they may be redargued by contrary proof afterwards discovered, or the cause may be brought under review of a superior Court, on the ground that the oath ought not to have been allowed; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 14; Tait, 273. See Semiplena Probatio.

The oath in litem, is the oath of the pursuer of an action as to the amount of the loss or damage which he has sustained through the defender; and it is admitted only in two classes of cases: 1st, Where there is full proof that the defender has been engaged in some illegal act, as spuilzie, or the like; and, 2dly, In the case of losses which a party is entitled to recover under the edict Nautæ, caupones, stabularii. In either case the oath in litem is conclusive as to the quantities lost; but, in so far as regards the price or value put on the articles, it is subject to modification by the Court. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 18, and B. iii. tit. 1, § 29; Stair, B. iv. tit. 44, § 4; Bank. B. i. tit. 10, § 133, and tit. 16, § 1; B. iv. tit. 32, § 11; Tait, 279, et seq.

Where a party has been required to give his oath, either on reference or by the judge, the requisition is made under the certification that, in default of his appearing to make oath, or on his declining to swear, he shall be held as confessed; that is, his failure to appear, or his silence, will be deemed equivalent to an acknowledgment, on oath, that the fact, as stated by the other party, is correct. For this purpose, however, it is necessary that the party who is to swear shall have been regularly cited either apud acta (i.e., by the judge notifying the day to him in Court), or by a messenger-at-arms. See Citation. If the party appear and swear non memini to a fact, so recent that he cannot be supposed to have forgotten it, that will be held equivalent to a refusal to swear, and he will be held as confessed. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 14; Tait, 287 and 240.

The law sanctions or requires several judicial or voluntary oaths, affidavits, and declarations of parties. 1st, The oath of calumny, as known in our older practice, was a declaration upon oath by a party, on the requisition of his adversary, of his belief in the truth of the averments on which his plea rested. See Calumny, Oath of. 2d, The bankrupt statute requires from the bankrupt and those connected with his affairs, and from the creditors, sundry affidavits, oaths of verity and credulity, and other declarations upon oath, as to which, and all similar statutory oaths or affidavits, it may be observed, that, except against the deponents themselves, they are not legal evidence. The examinations upon oath of the bankrupt and others as to the state of his affairs, are in law regarded as mere inquisitorial investigations of the nature of a precognition; and it is only in the event of the death of the parties by whom they are made, that such depositions will be admitted even as adminicles of evidence. The affidavits and oaths of verity and credulity by creditors, again, can be viewed as nothing better than the solemn attestation of a party in his own favour, not as legal evidence where the claim is disputed; Bell's Com. ii. 399, 485. 3d, Neither party can insist for a judicial examination of his adversary as matter of right, it being entirely in the discretion of the judge to admit it or not; and the declaration of a party on such an examination, although good evidence against himself, can, as against his opponent, be received as no more than the deliberate statement of a party. Such examinations are altogether incompetent,—1st, Where a reference to oath is intended, or is the only mode of proof competent in the circumstances of the case; 2d, Where writing is indispensable; and, 3d, Where the facts, in regard to which the party is proposed to be judicially examined, are such as would infer personal punishment or infamy against him, if prosecuted criminally; Gordon, 22d December 1809, Fac. Coll.; Tait, 291, et seq. 4th, In criminal prosecutions the voluntary declarations emitted by the accused in the course of a precognition, or before the libel has been served upon him, may be founded upon at his trial, and, taken along with the other evidence adduced, may contribute to his conviction. See Declaration. Lastly, The admissions or confessions made by a party, either on a judicial examination or voluntarily in court, or even extrajudicially, if seriously made, may supersede the necessity of resorting to other evidence, all such admissions or confessions being good evidence against the party making them. From this rule are excepted admissions or concessions made in the course of extrajudicial communications for a settlement of the case; for it is presumed that a party is willing to make large concessions in order to avoid a law-suit; besides, were such communications to be taken advantage of, it might prove a serious obstacle to compromises. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 33; Stair, B. iv. tit. 45, §§ 5–8; Bank. B. iv. tit. 33, §§ 18, 19; Tait, 293.

III. OF THE ORDER IN WHICH EVIDENCE IS TO BE RECEIVED; WITH SOME GENERAL RULES AS TO EVIDENCE.

The best evidence, and that to which a party ought first to resort in support of his plea, is a written deed. Where that does not exist, parole proof, where otherwise admissible, may be resorted to; and failing both of these, the party may, where such a mode of proof is competent, refer the point at issue to the oath of his opponent.

The following rules applicable to the subject of evidence generally may be of service:—

I. Neither judges nor juries can legally proceed upon their own private knowledge concerning matters of fact at issue before them; but are bound to decide solely according to the legal evidence judicially adduced. Hume, ii. 310.

II. The best evidence to be had in the circumstances must be adduced. Thus, it is incompetent to prove the contents of a written document otherwise than by the document itself, if it be in existence; except in the case of extracts from public or judicial records, as already explained. And, on the same principle, hearsay evidence, generally speaking, is inadmissible; that is, where a fact or facts pertinent to the issue, and in the knowledge of a competent witness, are proposed to be proved, not by that witness himself, but by the evidence of one who heard him state them. To this rule there are exceptions,—1. In a criminal prosecution, the dying declaration of the injured party as to the mortal injury, uttered in the prospect of death, is allowed to be proved by hearsay on a trial for his murder. 2. Even in civil cases hearsay evidence is admitted where the statements of a competent witness, in relation to the matter at issue, are offered to be proved after his death, or after he has become insane. 3. It is stated by some authorities, that hearsay is admitted in evidence where it forms part of the transaction which is the subject of inquiry. But where the transaction in question concerns words spoken (as in the case of defamation), and those words are attempted to be proved by a witness who was present and heard them, that plainly is not hearsay, as technically understood. See Hearsay. Tait, 430; Phillips on Evidence, p. 278, 4th edit.; Hume, ii. 391; Murray's Jury Court Reports, vol. i. pp. 95 and 424.

III. By the law of Scotland, no fact can be legally proved, and, in criminal cases, no conviction can follow, on the unsupported testimony of a single witness, however unimpeachable his credit may be. But where one witness swears distinctly to a fact, the want of a second witness to the same specific fact may be supplied by a witness to corroborative circumstances; and in cases of circumstantial evidence, two witnesses are not required to prove each circumstance of the same transaction. Nor, where a specific offence is charged, is it necessary to prove each reiterated act by two witnesses, unless where the acts have no connection with, or relation to each other. Thus, if in a prosecution for defamation, one witness swear that he heard the defender utter the slander, and another swear that he heard him use expressions of a similar import on a different occasion, that will amount to legal proof; Landles, 18th July 1816, Murray's Jury Court Reports, i. 79. But, if successive acts of uttering forged notes to different persons and in different places be charged, two witnesses to each act are requisite; Hume, ii. 371–372; Tait, 437. Several exceptions to the general rule of the common law are introduced by special statutes, authorising conviction on the oath of one credible witness, as in the case of certain offences against the laws of Customs and Excise, the game laws, and the like; Bank. B. iv. tit. 30, § 2. See Game.

IV. It is a trite rule in evidence, that a party cannot be required to prove a negative; but when evidence is adduced in support of the affirmative, such evidence may be rebutted by opposite proof, which is not properly proving a negative, but merely proving a proposition inconsistent with that which is affirmed; Hutch. Justice of Peace, B. i. c. 6, p. 277.

V. Every member of the community, if legally capable, is bound to give evidence when required by competent authority; and peers as well as commoners, when examined as witnesses, must be sworn to tell the truth. Quakers and other sectarians, on account of religious scruples, are, by special statutes, allowed to make a solemn affirmation instead of an oath; and these affirmations are declared to have the effect of an oath, in all places, and for all purposes whatsoever, where an oath is required, either at common law or by statute; 22 Geo. II., c. 46, § 34; 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 49, and c. 82; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 77, 1838; Tait, 288 and 422.

VI. Witnesses must be examined apart from each other; and examined must have no communication with unexamined witnesses, lest the latter should be biased by hearing what the others have deposed. Neither, generally speaking, are unexamined witnesses permitted to be present in Court, or before the commissioner, while the case is going on, or while objections to their admissibility, or to the competency of the questions proposed to be put to them, are under discussion; Stair, B. iv. tit. 43, § 18; Tait, 420.

VII. Witnesses are entitled to the expenses of travelling to and from the place to which they are cited to give evidence, and of their stay while they are detained. The Act of Sederunt, 21st Dec. 1765, fixes, on a very moderate scale, the rates of such allowances to witnesses in cases before the Court of Session, and authorises the expenses to be levied by summary warrant against the agent of the party adducing them; and although a witness may not be entitled to enforce payment of more than the rates so fixed, yet in practice, a sum sufficient to defray the reasonable expenses incurred by the witnesses is allowed, without regard to the rates of the Act of Sederunt. But where a witness, by disobeying the first citation, renders letters of second diligence necessary, he forfeits the allowance for expenses; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 30; Tait, 417. In criminal cases, in like manner, witnesses are entitled to a reasonable sum for travelling expenses, although they may be compelled to come from any part of Great Britain or Ireland to bear testimony on a criminal trial, without any previous tender of expenses; 54 Geo. III., c. 186. Their expenses are paid by the parties who adduce them; and, in case of refusal or delay, payment may be enforced by letters of horning against the adducers; and there are examples on record of such hornings being issued, even against the Crown lawyers; Hume, ii. 368, note. Witnesses do not appear to be entitled to any remuneration for loss of time, although persons in the working classes are usually allowed wages at the ordinary rate of their trade; and it is said to be the practice in England to make allowances for loss of time to medical men and attorneys, in addition to their travelling expenses; Phillips on Evidence, i. 4.

Lastly, A proof prout de jure, means a proof by all the legal means of probation,—i.e., by writing, by witnesses, and by oath of party; although, in practice, the phrase is usually employed to signify a proof of facts and circumstances by witnesses, in support of an averment, in contradistinction to a proof limited to writ or oath of party; Bank. B. iv. tit. 27, § 1; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 2, § 1; Dunbar, Bligh's App. Cases, ii. 350. See Prout de Jure.

Evidents; a word used by conveyancers as synonymous with writs or title-deeds, by which property is proved. See Balfour's Practicks anent Chaltouris and Evidentis, p. 187, et seq.

Ewest; nearest. The word is used in this sense in our older statutes. Thus the act 1572, c. 48, in regard to manse and glebes, provides, that the manse "maist ewest to the kirk" shall pertain to the minister or reader, "together with four acres of land of the glebe at least lyand contigue, or maist ewest to said manse, gif there be sa meikle." See Glebe.

Ex Officio; is a term applied to acts done by a functionary in virtus of his office, and not at the suit, or on the employment, of any other party. An ex officio information, in the law of England, is an information (analogous to a Scotch indictment) filed by the Attorney-General ex proprio motu, and without the intervention of any judicial authority. See Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Ex Parte. In judicial proceedings a step is said to be taken ex parte, when the adverse party, either by neglect or refusal to appear, has not been heard, or has not stated his reasons why what is asked should not be granted. See Absence. Default.

Ex Post Facto; is a term used in law to signify something done in order to affect some right or demand, which had been brought into question before the ex post facto act or deed was done. An ex post facto law, is a law which operates retrospectively; as, for example, which imposes a penalty on an act or deed done before the law was enacted, and which act or deed, when done, was not penal or prohibited. This is an extraordinary remedy resorted to in extreme cases, and which seems to be justifiable only where the law so made, is directed against some unquestionable moral wrong, which, from the infrequency of its occurrence, or from its enormity, may not have been hitherto made the object of legislation. Vide Tomlins', h. t.

Ex Deliberatione Dominorum Concilii. These words are annexed to all signet letters which pass the Royal Signet for Scotland, on bills presented at the Bill Chamber of the Court of Session; such as privileged summonses, letters of suspension, supplement, and the like, letters of horning on decrees of inferior judges, letters of caption and other diligences requiring bills. The words are subjoined to the signet letter immediately above the subscription of the writer to the Signet. See Bills of Signet Letters. Bill Chamber. See also Stair, B. iv. tit. 3, §§ 4 and 32; Bank. B. iv. tit. 27, § 9.

Exaction; as understood in the law of England, is a wrong done by an officer or one in pretended authority, by taking a fee or reward which the law does not allow him. As contradistinguished from extortion, it is said to be an exaction when the officer wrests a fee or reward where none is due; whereas it is extortion, when, something being due, the officer extorts more than he is entitled to. Tomlins' Dict. h. t.

Examined Copies. In the phraseology of the English law, an examined copy of a deed, writing, or record, is a copy or extract of the deed or entry in the record, examined and certified by the proper officer. The term is nearly synonymous with the Scotch law term

Extract. As to the effect of such examined copies or extracts, and of notarial copies when produced as evidence, see the article Evidence, supra, p. 367.

Excambion ; is the legal name of the contract whereby one piece of land is exchanged for another. The deeds by which the contract is completed ought to bear, that the lands are excambed and disposed in excambion. The implied warrandice of this contract is real warrandice, in virtue of which, either party, in case of eviction of the land which he has received in excambion, may recover possession of the land which he gave in exchange. This right to recur to the original property in case of eviction, is competent to the original excamber and his heirs and singular successors, against the party with whom he contracted and his heirs and singular successors, even although the singular successor may have acquired his right prior to the eviction. The original title of the party claiming under this warrandice is proved by the recital in the contract of excambion, it being presumed that when the exchange was made, he delivered the title-deeds of the portion excambed to the other party, unless the contrary appear. In order to constitute this sort of warrandice, the deeds must expressly bear that the lands are mutually given in excambion. Heirs possessing under deeds of entail have a statutory privilege, under 10 Geo. III., c. 51 (called the Montgomery Act), of exchanging or making excambions of certain portions of the entailed lands. This privilege was conferred by that statute, not only to benefit the heirs of entail, but also to promote the general improvement of the country. But no more than thirty acres of arable land, or one hundred acres of ground unfit for the plough, can be so exchanged. In order to carry such an arrangement into effect, the heir of entail proposing to make the excambion must apply to the sheriff or steward of the county where the entailed estate lies, who appoints two or more skilful persons to adjust the value of the lands to be exchanged. Upon their settling the marches, and reporting upon oath that the exchange will be just and equal, the sheriff authorises the exchange to be made by a contract of excambion, which is effectual on being executed, and afterwards recorded in the sheriff-court books of the county in which the estate is situated, within three months after the execution of the deed. The land given in exchange to the entailed estate is thenceforth held as part thereof, and that given from it held as free of the fetters of the entail; 10 Geo. III., c. 51, § 27. By the recent statute, 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 42, this power has been greatly extended. It is thereby enacted, that notwithstanding the prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses in any entail, it shall be lawful for the respective heirs of entail in possession, without consent of any other heir, to make excambion of any portion of the entailed estate for an equivalent in lands, estates, or heritages lying contiguous to the same, or to some other part of the entailed estate, or being convenient to be holden with the same, whether belonging to himself in fee-simple or to any other person, and that although the heritages to be given and taken in exchange consist of different descriptions of heritable property. Notice of the intention to make such excambion must be given (three months previous to the application to the Court of Session after mentioned) to the five heirs or substitutes of entail, or to the whole, if their number be less than five, next in the order of succession to the heir so applying. When any of these five heirs is under age, or under any other disability, the notice must be given to his curator or other administrator; and if three or more be under such disability, the notice must also be given to the two heirs, next in succession after such five heirs, who are under no disability. When any of the said heirs is forth of the kingdom, notice must be given to his known agent or factor. After such notice, for the purpose of ascertaining and adjusting the value of the lands, &c., proposed to be exchanged, an application must be made by summary petition to one or other division of the Court of Session, setting forth the objects and expected advantages of, and praying for, such excambion. The said Court, after proof made to them of notice having been given as above, and hearing any party having a title and interest to be heard, appoint two or more skilful persons to inspect and adjust the value and settle the marches of the lands, &c., to be exchanged. Upon receiving their report, and being satisfied of the respective value of the lands, &c., and the expediency of the exchange, the Court authorises the excambion. The contract of excambion is then executed at the sight, and with the approbation of the Court, and recorded in the Sheriff-court books of each of the shires in which the lands are situated, and also within three months in the Register of Tailzies. The expenses incurred by any party having a title or interest, appearing as aforesaid, are borne either by such party, or by the heir of entail applying for the excambion, as the Court may think just. Such excambions cannot be made of the principal mansion-house or offices, or the garden, park, home farm or policy, of any entailed estate, nor of more than one-fourth in value of the entailed heritages; and if a fourth part has, under authority of the act, been excambied, no further excambion is competent to any heir of entail. The land given in exchange to the entailed estate is thenceforth held as part thereof, subject to all the prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, and that given from it held as free of the fetters of the entail. No debt contracted by any heir of entail during the execution and registration of the contract of excambion, affects the lands contained in the contract, and thereby added to the estate. Any excess of value on either side, not exceeding L.200, is paid to the proprietor to whom the lands of similar value are awarded. But if any party to an excambion gives or receives any consideration other than the lands to be exchanged, or aforesaid excess not exceeding L.200, the excambion is null and void. Where any part of an entailed estate is under more than one deed of entail, descendible to the same series of heirs, such deeds of entail are, in reference to the application for excambion under this act, to be construed as one deed of entail. The act 10 Geo. III., c. 51, continues in force, except in so far as repealed by any of the provisions of the late act. Excambions under the act 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 42, may be carried through under the forms of the Entail Amendment Act 11 and 12 Vict., c. 36, 1848. See, on the subject of this article, Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 28; Stair, B. i. tit. 14, § 1; Bank, B. i. tit. 19, § 4; Bell's Com. vol. i. p. 693, 5th edit.; Bell's Princ. § 1772; Bell on Purchaser's Title, 2d edit. p. 130; Bell on Leases, 4th edit., vol. i. p. 296; Hunter's Landlord and Tenant, p. 508.

Exception; is a term borrowed from the Roman law, and used in the law of Scotland as synonymous with Defences. According to Stair, "Exceptions are so termed by the Roman law from the formulae of actions in that law and the edicts of the prætors, which, if they did bear conditions not to hold in such cases, these conditions were thence called exceptions;" Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 14. In Spottiswood's Annotations on Hope's Minor Practicks, there is the following note on the word Exception:—"This word is from the law of the Romans; and in their language excipere signifies to defend, and so an exception is called a defence; or it may be said to be taken from the style or formula of the summons, which was in use to be given with a nisi, unless si non, if the other party do not extra quamsi, without the defender do this or that, &c. And the Emperor Justinian, in the title of his Institutes, which treats of exceptions, at the beginning says, "That exceptions are devised to defend, and are introduced for the sake of those against whom the action is raised; because," continues, he "it often happens that, though the pursuit be according to law, yet it is unjust against him who is called to it." A defender, who comes prepared for his defence, either denies that the pursuer has right and title in law to pursue, or, though he finds the action competent, yet propounds something that either removes it wholly or diminishes the claim; and this, in a proper sense, and not the inficiation or total denial, is an exception. But, generally speaking, everything which one alleges for defending himself, and for eliding the action, is called an exception;" Hope's Minor Practicks, by Spottiswood, tit. 1 of the Form of Process, p. 29, note. In the more correct acceptation of the term exception, therefore, it is not applicable to a defence, which denies the relevancy of the libel as laid; or which resolves into an objection to the citation of the party, and the like; since, strictly speaking, an exception must assume that the libel is relevant, but allege that the defender is not liable in the conclusion, in respect of the exception which he pleads. This distinction, however, has not hitherto been much attended to in our practice. See Defences. It is a question of some practical importance whether the defence against an action is pleadable by way of exception, or whether it must not be made good by a separate action. This difficulty arises in cases where the demand rests on a deed ex facie valid and regular, but which is reducible on the head of deathbed, or of fraud, force, or fear, or the like ground. It seems to be settled, that ex facie nullities, whether at common law or founded on statute, are pleadable by way of exception. But the exceptions of fraud, force, or fear, if the deed alleged to have been thus legally obtained relate to heritage, cannot be pleaded by way of exception. The defender in such a case must reduce the deed to which he objects. The same is the rule as to deathbed deeds—deathbed being pleadable, not by way of exception, but by reduction; although by our older practice the rule seems to have been different in petitory and declaratory actions at least. See Calderswood against Schaw, 14th Nov. 1668, Mor. p. 12,607, and p. 2737; Stair, B. iii. tit. iv. § 31. According to one authority the distinction between allegations propounded by way of exception, and those which must be established by way of action, is founded in "the circumstances of the process; as when, in defending the right, quarrelled incidenter, other persons not called to the principal action are concerned, or the process will, if that allegiance be instantly received, expatiate into another form or kind of action, of higher and more weighty consequence than the principal process, or that this will be retarded, the question being only a prejudicium or preparatory, and which, though sustained, will not determine the principal cause." Spottiswood's Notes on Hope's Minor Practicks, pp. 29-30. See also Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 16, et seq.; Kames' Equity, 297; Thomson on Bills, 280.

Exceptions, Bill of. In England, if the counsel for either party, at the hearing or determining of a cause, apprehend that the judge, either in his directions or decisions, mistakes the law, they may require him to seal a bill of exceptions, stating the point wherein he is supposed to err; which bill is of the nature of an appeal to the next superior Court; Blackst. vol. iii. p. 372. And when jury trial in civil causes was extended to Scotland by the statute 55 Geo. III., c. 42, it having been deemed proper to adopt sundry English law terms and forms in preference to those which our own law supplied, amongst others, bills of exceptions were introduced, as to which the following provisions were made in section 7 of the statute:—"It shall be competent to the counsel for any party, at the trial of any issue or issues, to except to the opinion and direction of the judge or judges before whom the same shall be tried, either as to the competency of witnesses, the admissibility of evidence, or other matter of law arising at the trial." The ground of exception required to be first stated verbally to the Jury Court, and then reduced into writing, according to a form prescribed in the App. to the Acts of Sederunt, 9th December and 3d July 1823, and signed by the judge or judges of the Jury Court. But notwithstanding such exception the trial was to proceed, and the jury to return their verdict; and after the trial, the judge who presided was forthwith to present the bill of exceptions, with the order or interlocutor directing the issue, and the verdict of the jury indorsed thereon, to the Division of the Court of Session by which the issue or issues had been directed; "which shall thereupon order the said exception to be heard in presence on or before the fourth sederunt-day thereafter." If the Court of Session allowed the exception, another jury was directed to be summoned for the trial of the issue; if the exception was disallowed, the verdict indorsed on the bill was declared final and conclusive; the party, however, against whom any interlocutor was pronounced on the matter of the exception, was entitled to appeal to the House of Lords against that interlocutor; the appellant attaching a copy of the exception to the petition of appeal; and provided that such appeal was presented to the House of Lords within fourteen days after the interlocutor was pronounced if Parliament was then sitting, and, if not, then within eight days after the commencement of the next session of Parliament. These appeals had, under this statute, a precedence, being appointed to be heard on or before the fourth cause day after the time limited for laying the printed appeal cases upon the table of the House of Lords; 55 Geo. III., c. 42, § 7. In the more recent statute, 49 Geo. III., c. 35, § 16, it was provided that, in all cases in which general verdicts were found by the jury, the motion for setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial should be made in the Jury Court, in presence of two at least of the Jury Court judges, and not in the Court of Session; and the order granting or refusing such new trial by the Jury Court was not subject to review by petition, representation, appeal to the House of Lords, or otherwise, unless the motion for setting aside the verdict was founded on misdirection of the judge at the trial, in matter of law, or on the undue admission or rejection of evidence; in which cases (§ 17), "it shall be competent to the party against whom judgment is given by the Jury Court, to tender a bill of exceptions to such judgment, in the same manner as at a trial; and the proceedings on such bill of exceptions shall be conformable in all respects to the provisions of the act 55 Geo. III., c. 42: Provided, nevertheless, that the interlocutor to be pronounced on such motion shall be final, and shall not be subject to review by petition, representation, appeal to the House of Lords, or otherwise." The procedure on bills of exceptions is now regulated by A. S. 16th February 1841, entitled "An Act of Sederunt, regulating proceedings in jury causes." By this act of sederunt, which was passed after the union of jury trial in civil causes with the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and which repeals all former acts of sederunt on the subject, it is provided (sect. 32) "That where the counsel for either party shall except to points of law laid down by the presiding judge in the course of a trial, or in his charge to the jury, the counsel tendering such exception shall deliver in a note thereof to the judge at the time the exception is taken; and the same, if it shall state correctly what was decided, or directed, or omitted by the judge to be directed, shall be certified by the judge at the time, by subscribing his name to such note; and a note of all such exceptions taken in the course of the trial, or to the charge of the judge, shall be finally settled and certified as aforesaid before the jury is enclosed to consider their verdict." This note forms the basis of the bill of exceptions, which is afterwards prepared and adjusted; and, by section 38 of the same act of sederunt, it is enacted "That it shall not be competent to proceed in any bill of exceptions, unless each bill shall be lodged within six days after the commencement of the next session, or of the meeting of the Court after the Christmas recess, if the cause has been tried after the end of the session at the sittings in March or July, or during the Christmas recess, or upon circuit, or within ten days if the case has been tried during the session, or immediately before the sitting down of the session, or if the exception has been taken on a motion for a new trial, except leave has been obtained from the Court to prolong the period for presenting the bill." The exception must be to the law laid down by the judge, including his judgment on the admission or rejection of evidence; his refusal to adopt a direction in point of law, suggested from the bar, or the like. Where, in the course of his charge, the judge makes any mistake in point of fact, the practice is for the counsel who thinks he has erred to interrupt him and to set him right. The bill of exceptions sets forth so far the procedure at the trial; and as both parties are entitled to see that this is correctly done, the practice is to communicate the proof-prints of the bill to the opposite agent; and, in the ordinary case, the bill is ultimately adjusted at a meeting of the counsel, with the judge who tried the cause. Considerable discussion has arisen concerning the proper limits and contents of bills of exceptions; as to which, all that can be said in a work such as the present is, that the whole matter must be presented in such a form as to admit of its being judged of by the Court. See various forms of bills of exceptions in Macfarlane's Jury Practice, App. p. 352, et seq.; and see Lord Chief-Justice Tindall's answer to certain queries put by the Dean of Faculty on this subject, 15 S. & D. App. 1312. A judge who presided at a trial may sign a bill of exceptions after he has resigned the judicial office; Smith, 27th Jan. 1835, 13 S. & D. 323. By 7 Will. IV., c. 14, it is enacted, that in all cases in which any bill of exceptions is brought before the Court of Session, or carried by appeal to the House of Lords, it shall not be competent to the Court of Session or to the House of Lords, in pronouncing judgment on such bill of exceptions, to make any order, or to pronounce any judgment, ordering a new trial, unless the said Court or House of Lords are of opinion that the exception is to be allowed. And when the Court or House of Lords are of opinion that the law directed at the trial, or the determination to receive or reject evidence excepted to, is correct, they are to make an order that the bill of exceptions shall be disallowed, and that the verdict found by the jury shall be carried into effect, by a judgment pronounced thereon, for the party in whose favour the said verdict was found. By the Court of Session Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 36, § 45, it is provided, "That a bill of exceptions shall not be allowed in any cause before the Court of Session, upon the ground of the undue admission of evidence; if, in the opinion of the Court, the exclusion of such evidence could not have led to a different verdict than that actually pronounced; and it shall not be imperative on the Court to sustain a bill of exceptions on the ground of the undue rejection of documentary evidence, when it shall appear from the documents themselves that they ought not to have affected the result, at which the jury by their verdict have arrived. But see Cameron v. Cameron's Trustees, Dec. 21, 1850, 13 D. 412. It has been held by the House of Lords,—(1.) That, in preparing the formal bill of exceptions, it is irregular for the judge to make any alteration upon the exceptions, as they appear by the note tendered by the party, and signed by the judge himself at the trial; but, (2.) That if such alteration be made, the Court cannot adjudicate upon any other exceptions than those set forth in the formal bill; Earl of Glasgow v. Hurler Alum Co., June 26, 1850, 7 Bell 100; Jurid. Styles, iii. p. 920; Macfarlane's Jury Prac. 236, 271, et seq. See Appeal. Jury Trial. New Trial.

Exceptio Non Numeratæ Pecuniæ. This was one of the Roman law exceptions, founded on the obligatio literarum of the Romans. The obligatio literarum was constituted by a writing, the granter of which acknowledged receipt from the creditor of a certain sum of money. But as the obligation was sometimes granted before the money was advanced, spe numerandæ pecuniæ by the Roman law, the obligation, until the lapse of two years after its date and delivery, did not prove the receipt of the money; and the debtor against whom, within that time, a demand for re-payment was made, might plead the exceptio non numeratæ pecuniæ; that is, that the money of which re-payment was demanded, was truly never advanced. This exception was sufficient to elide the demand, unless the creditor proved that he had advanced the money. In the older form of the Scotch bond for borrowed money, the debtor was made to renounce "the exception of not numerated money," from a groundless apprehension that the Roman law exception might be pleadable. It does not appear, however, to have been at any time recognised in the law of Scotland. This renunciation, therefore, is only one among many proofs of that over-anxiety in conveyancers, whereby points, otherwise free from all doubt, have been sometimes brought into question. See, as to this exception, Ersk. B. iii. tit. 2, § 5; Stair, B. i. tit. 10, § 11.

Exceptio Rei Judicatæ; is an exception pleadable by a party who has formerly had the matter in controversy judicially determined by a competent tribunal, in a question with the same parties, or with parties in the same interest, and proceeding on the same medium concludendi, or cause of action. Where a party has been condemned by a sentence of a competent foreign court, which sentence has received full execution, he cannot lawfully raise an action in this country in order to obtain what may be, in effect, a reversal of the foreign decree. The exceptio rei judicatæ might be successfully pleaded against such an action; for the defender may legally found on the sentence recovered by him in the foreign Court, as a defence against a new action, on the same grounds in this country; to admit which would be virtually to confer on the Courts of this country a right to review the sentences of foreign Courts. Ersk. B. iv. tit. 3. § 4; Stair, B. iv. tit. 40, § 16; Kames' Equity, 516. See Res Judicata, and authorities there cited.

Exchange, Bill of. See Bill of Exchange.

Exchange and Re-Exchange. Exchange has been defined to be, the difference in the value of money at a place where a bill is drawn, and the place where it is payable; or rather, as the premium or discount (as it may happen) paid or received as the price or value of a draft, drawn in one country and payable in another. The term seems to have originated in the circumstance of such bills or drafts on foreign countries being drawn in a country where one species or denomination of coin is the current money, and payable or exchangeable in another country for money of the denomination current in that country. Exchange, however, may now be said to be a term almost exclusively applicable to the premium or discount paid in one country for a draft payable in another—that premium or discount varying, of course, with the supply of, or the demand for, such drafts. Re-exchange is due where a draft or bill, procured as above, is not accepted or not paid by the drawee; in which case the holder of the dishonoured draft or bill is entitled to re-draw upon the original drawer, and to add to his re-draft the premium, discount, or cost, attending the transaction, and arising from the dishonour of the original bill or draft. The holder of the dishonoured draft is entitled to raise money to its full amount, at the drawer's expense, in whatever currency, or at whatever rate of exchange it was made payable; and if the re-draft cannot be sold but at a discount, the holder of the dishonoured draft may add to his re-draft a sum sufficient to cover that discount. The sum thus added to the amount of the original draft is termed re-exchange. The same rules which regulate exchange and re-exchange in the case of foreign bills of exchange are applicable to inland bills; for the course of exchange between two places in the same country rests upon principles precisely similar. See Bell's Com. i. p. 405. See this subject concisely and distinctly treated in Thomson's Law of Bills of Exchange. p. 593, et seq. See also Glen on Bills, pp. 9–16, 2d edit.; Stair, B. i. tit. 11, § 7, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 342. Exchequer, Court of. The Scotch Court of Exchequer, prior to the Union, was the king's revenue court, and consisted of the treasurer, the treasurer-depute, and as many lords of Exchequer as the King chose to appoint. The ministerial part of the treasurer's office was, to receive casualties due to the king, either as sovereign or as feudal superior; with which office, about a century before the Union, was united the office of comptroller, whose duty it was to levy the rents of Crown lands, burgh rents and customs, and to examine the treasurer's accounts. By article 19 of the treaty of Union, it was provided, that the Scotch Court of Exchequer was to continue until a new Revenue Court should be established in Scotland by Parliament; and, by 6 Anne, c. 26, the Court of Exchequer was established on the footing on which it continued till the recent changes. The judges of the then new Court were, by that statute, declared to be the High Treasurer of Great Britain, with a Chief Baron and four Barons, who must have been either serjeants-at-law, or English barristers, or Scotch advocates of five years' standing. All barristers might plead before this Court who were entitled to practise in the Courts of Westminster or in the Court of Session; and the privileges belonging to members of the College of Justice were communicated to the barons and other members of the Court, "excepting only that they might be pursued in justice before the Lords of Session for causes not competent to the Court of Exchequer." This Court had, under the statute by which it was established, a private jurisdiction as to the duties of customs, excise, or other revenues appertaining to the King or Prince of Scotland; and as to all honours and estates which might accrue to the Crown, in which matters they were to judge according to the forms of proceeding used in the English Court of Exchequer; but under the limitation, 1st, That no debt due to the Crown should affect the Crown debtor's real estate in Scotland, in any other manner than as such estate might be affected by the law of Scotland; and, 2dly, That the validity of the Crown's title to any honours, lands, or casualties in Scotland, should be tried as formerly by the Court of Session. The barons were also vested with the powers which belonged to the ancient Scotch Court of Exchequer, whereby it was their province to pass the accounts of sheriffs, and other officers who have the execution of writs issuing from, or returnable to, the Court of Exchequer, and to receive resignations of lands, and to pass signatures of charters, tutories, or other gifts of casualties, &c., as the Scotch Exchequer formerly did. But this power in the Scotch Exchequer was always limited; for when a signature imported a conveyance of more than was conferred by the Crown vassal's former charter, besides being passed by the barons, it must have been subscribed by the King himself. If such a signature had passed, of course, in Exchequer, it would not have been effectual to the grantee quoad the new right. Gifts of escheat, and some other gifts of minor importance, might pass in Exchequer without a special warrant; but remissions of crimes and gifts of forfeiture on conviction of high treason, required the King's sign-manual as their warrant. And, in general, although all such signatures, gifts, &c., must have passed in Exchequer, it was the Court of Session only that could competently judge of their preference after they were completed; Ersk. B. i. tit. 3, § 30, et seq. See also Bank. B. iv. tit. 11, and Bell's Com. ii. 41, and i. 106, 5th edit., and a work printed, but unpublished, entitled, An Historical View of the Forms and Powers of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, by Baron Sir John Clerk, Bart. and Baron Scrope, 4to, 1820; Stair, B. iv. tit. 1, § 29; More's Notes, p. cclxx. By the statute 6 Anne, c. 26, § 12, it was declared competent for parties affected by the judgments of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, and who, by law, were entitled to "maintain a writ or writs of error thereupon, to sue and prosecute, out of the Court of Chancery in England, a writ or writs of error to be made in usual manner upon any such judgment returnable in the Parliament of Great Britain;" and, in the prosecution of such writs of error, the same course was to be followed which is adopted in similar appeals from English courts. But appeals of any kind from the Court of Exchequer in Scotland to the House of Lords were of very rare occurrence; and the judgment appealed from must have been pronounced in a cause in which the judges acted as such, ex officio, and not ministerially as commissioners under an act of Parliament. There is no example of an appeal from the proceedings of the Barons in the exercise of their powers in receiving resignations, passing signatures, making gifts, and the like. See, on this subject, Form of Procedure in the House of Lords upon Appeals from Scotland, pp. 97-100, 8vo, 1821.

The Court of Exchequer has of late been made the subject of various legislative enactments. By 2 Will. IV., c. 54, it was provided, that successors should not be appointed to such of the barons as should retire or die, and that, after the retirement or death of the last remaining baron, the duties of the Court should be discharged by a judge of the Court of Session, with an addition to his salary of not more than L.600. By 3 Will. IV., c. 13, all the powers and duties of the Court of Exchequer bearing in any way upon the direction of the revenue, are transferred to the Commissioners of the Treasury; and the said Commissioners are authorised to regulate the powers and duties of the offices of King's Remembrancer, &c., and to call upon the Barons of Exchequer to execute conveyances of property vested in them by the recited acts relative to the Court of Exchequer. The legal jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer is excepted from the operation of the act, and it is declared, that all debts, duties, revenues, fines, penalties, and forfeitures, shall continue to be sued for as heretofore. By 4 Will. IV., c. 16, the office of Recorder of the Great Roll, or Clerk of the Pipe, was abolished. See Clerk of the Pipe. By 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 46, continued by 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 73, and made perpetual by 1 Vict., c. 65, provisions were made for the Lord Ordinary on the Bills performing the duties during the last remaining baron's indisposition, or during the indisposition of the judge of session, who, upon his death, should be appointed to the office. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills having continued to perform these duties after the death of the last remaining baron, and previous to the appointment by his late Majesty, of one of the judges to perform the duties, his acts are, by 1 Vict., c. 65, declared valid; and it is provided for the future, that it shall be competent to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, after the death of the judge so appointed, or of any judge to be thereafter appointed, and previous to the appointment of his successor, to perform the duties in like manner as during the indisposition or unavoidable absence of the judge so appointed. The same act vests in the Treasury the rights of the Court of Exchequer relatively to appointments or offices in the said Court, and makes perpetual the above-recited act 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 46.

The Court of Exchequer is now merged in the Court of Session by the act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56 (1856). By that act one of the Lords Ordinary is appointed Lord Ordinary in Exchequer causes, and the procedure in such causes is regulated.

Exchequer, Court of, in England. The English Court of Exchequer is a supreme Court of record, but the lowest in rank of the four courts which sit in Westminster Hall, viz.,—the Court of Chancery, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Court of Exchequer. This court is said to derive its name from the chequered cloth, resembling a chess-board, which covers the table of the court, and on which cloth, when certain of the accounts are made up, the sums are marked and scored with counters. The Judges of the Court of Exchequer are the Chief Baron, and four puisne Barons. The court consists of two divisions, the Receipt of the Exchequer, which manages the royal revenue, and the Court or judicial part of it. It was formerly subdivided into a Court of Equity and a Court of Common Law, but by 5 Vict., c. 5, its equity jurisdiction was transferred to the Court of Chancery.

Exchequer Bills ; form the principal part of the unfunded public debt of Great Britain. Those bills, which were first issued in the reign of William III., are issued, under authority of Parliament, for sums varying from L.1000 to L.100. They bear interest, and may be transferred from hand to hand without any formal transfer ; and the holders may also receive their amount periodically from Government, at par, with the interest due on them, with an option to exchange them for new bills, to which the same advantages are extended. The interest borne by Exchequer bills has fluctuated since they were first issued. Originally the interest seems to have been 5*d.* per L.100 per diem, or L.7, 12*s.* 1*d.* per annum : latterly it has varied from 2½*d.* to 2*d.*, and even to 1½*d.* per L.100 per diem, being about, or a fraction under, L.3 per annum. Tomlins, h. t.

Exchequer Horning. Execution was awarded on the decrees or judgments of the Scotch Court of Exchequer relating to the customs or excise, or other revenue matters falling under its cognizance, according to the forms used in the English Court of Exchequer. But the diligences of horning and caption, agreeably to the former law and practice of Scotland, may still be resorted to under authority of the Court of Exchequer, for enforcing payment of the land-tax for feu-duties specified in the reddendo of Crown charters, or the like. Such diligences are subscribed by a writer to the Signet, and pass the Signet in the usual form. The horning is obtained upon a bill presented in Exchequer, which is the warrant for signeting the letters. These letters bear in the end, "Ex Deliberatione Baronum Scaccarii." By 43 Geo. III., c. 150, § 44, diligence by horning may issue from Exchequer against collectors of revenue in certain circumstances ; and, generally, it may be observed, that the writ of extent contains a capias on which horning may be issued, and caption may follow." Under the act 19 and 20 Vict., c. 56, constituting the Court of Session the Court of Exchequer, and regulating the procedure in Exchequer causes, Exchequer decrees are put in execution by the sheriffs ; sec. 29, et seq. See Juridical Styles of Signet Letters, vol. iii. p. 733, 2d edit. ; Bell's Com. ii. 604, 5th edit. ; Bell's Princ. § 1343 ; Illust. ib.

Excise ; is an inland duty levied under authority of Parliament, and paid sometimes on the consumption of the commodity, and frequently upon the retail sale. Excise is now extended to a great variety of articles, such as spirits, cider, perry, malt liquors brewed for sale, malt, hops, tea, coffee, tobacco, paper, licences to auctioneers, spirit-dealers, &c. Indeed this imposition extends to so many commodities, that it may be correctly denominated general in its application ; and, by the articles of Union (6, 7, 8, and 18), the law, with regard to excise and customs, was made the same in England and Scotland. The duties thus collected compose an important branch of the revenue of the kingdom. Their collection is managed under a system which has been the subject of innumerable legislative enactments, the great object of which, generally speaking, is to secure economy in the collection of this branch of the revenue, and to prevent frauds and evasions on the part of those from whom the duties are exigible. Frauds against the excise laws are, under the special statutes imposing the duties, as well as under the general consolidating statutes, cognisable by justices of the peace ; and the Supreme Court in revenue matters in Scotland was formerly the Court of Exchequer, but its powers in this respect are now transferred to the Commissioners of the Treasury. See Exchequer. The officers engaged in the collection of these duties are Commissioners, who have a general board at London. The Commissioners have under them collectors, comptrollers, supervisors, and gaugers, and the other necessary officers for the prevention of frauds on the part of those by whom the duties are payable, as well as of those by whom the duties are collected ; and the system of superintendence and supervision is so vigilant, and the cheques and correctives of inaccuracy, fraud, or negligence, are so well arranged, that the strictest discipline is preserved from the one extreme to the other of this great establishment. The collections are managed in such a manner, that the proceeds of the different duties are transmitted to Government at very short intervals after their collection. Excise was first imposed by the rebellious Parliament of 1643. See the various statutes connected with this subject, digested and abridged in Huie's Abridgment of the Excise Laws. See also Tait's Justice of Peace, voce Excise and Customs; Bell's Com. vol. ii. pp. 21 and 51; Blair's Justice of Peace, h. t.

Exclusive Privilege. This term is used in a limited acceptation to signify the rights and franchises of the nature of monopolies, formerly enjoyed by the incorporated trades of a royal burgh; in virtue of which the craftsmen or members of those incorporations were entitled to prevent unfreemen, or tradesmen not members of the incorporation, from exercising the same trade within the limits of the burgh. Strictly speaking, all corporations formed without an act of Parliament, or the Sovereign's patent, are unlawful; and it has been repeatedly held that voluntary associations of tradesmen have no persona standi in judicio to enforce regulations made by themselves. But it was maintained, that the magistrates of a royal burgh necessarily possess an inherent and implied power of creating, by seal of cause, subordinate incorporations of the different trades within burgh, and thus conferring exclusive privileges. Lord Kames, on the contrary, held that it was ultra vires of the magistrates to erect corporations; and he shows that, in one instance, where the town of Edinburgh attempted to erect a corporation, it was thought necessary to get the act of council confirmed by the Sovereign, and ratified in the Scotch Parliament. It has been decided, however, that mere prescription, without the possession of a charter, or even of a seal of cause, was sufficient to confer the exclusive privileges of an incorporated trade; the presumption being, that the particular trade had originally possessed a seal of cause or charter; Skirving, 19th Jan. 1803, Fac. Coll. Mor. p. 10921. See also Kames' Elucidations, art. 7. By 9 and 10 Vict., c. 17 (1846) the exclusive privileges of trades in burghs are abolished. As to the exclusive privilege granted to authors, see Literary Property. Engraving.

Excommunication; ecclesiastical censure, whereby the person against whom it was directed was excluded from the communion of the church. By the ancient law of Scotland, excommunicated persons could not enjoy feudal rights, and were disqualified for holding, either directly or indirectly, the lands which they had formerly possessed, and were besides subjected to punishment in their persons. See sundry statutes imposing those and similar penalties, abridged in Kames' Stat. Law, h. t. But by 1690, c. 28, and 10 Anne, c. 7, all civil pains or penalties consequent on excommunication are removed; and the statute 10 Anne farther prohibits any civil judge to lend his aid for obliging any one to appear in a church court when summoned in a process for excommunication; or for compelling the excommunicated person to obey such sentence when pronounced. The lesser excommunication, or suspension from the privileges of the church, which is directed against persons under scandal, is the highest censure which kirk-sessions usually inflict. The greater excommunication requires the sanction of the presbytery. Neither has any civil effects, and the presbytery on being satisfied of repentance, will relieve the persons of the sentence; Ersk. B. ii. tit. 3, § 16; Hume, vol. i. p. 565; Swinton's Abridg. h. t.; Hutch. Justice of Peace, vol. i. p. 88, et seq., 2d edit.; Ross's Lect. i. 90, 248; Hill's Church Prac. 21. See Cursing, Letters of. Desertion. Divorce.

Exculpation, Letters of; are a warrant granted at the suit of the panel or defender in a criminal prosecution, for citing and compelling the attendance of witnesses in proof either of his defence against the libel, or of his objections against any of the jury or witnesses, or in support of whatever else may tend to his exculpation. These letters are issued as a matter of course on application at the Justiciary Office, or, in the case of Sheriff Court libels, to the Clerk of Court; but as a condition of receiving the benefit of letters of exculpation, it is incumbent on the panel (although in practice this is not always attended to), to serve a copy of the letters, and a list of the witnesses, on the prosecutor; 1672, c. 16. If there are any special defences, a written statement of these, along with all articles to be founded on, and the list of witnesses, must be lodged in the hands of the Clerk of Court the day before the trial; 20 Geo. II., c. 43, § 41; Act of Adj., Mar. 17, 1827, §§ 13, 14 (2 Alison, p. 42); Harper; 1 Broun's R. 441. As to proof in exculpation, see Alison's Prac. 615, et seq., and on the subject of this article generally, see Stair, B. iv. tit. 14, § 17; Hume, ii. 383; Ersk. B. iv. tit. 4, § 90; Dickson on Ev. 943; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, § 24.

Executed and Executory; in English law, are terms expressive of the different stages in a contract. A thing is executory with regard to which a contract exists, binding on the possessor to transfer it to some one else: a thing is executed, when the property is already transferred. Thus, an executory estate is one created by deed or fine, but which must afterwards be executed by entry, livery, writ, &c. In the question of condictio indebiti, this distinction is of importance. When the payment has been only executory,—i. e., when the grantor has only bound himself to deliver a certain thing,—he may be freed from his obligation, by proving that he was under an error in law, with regard to the consideration of it;

Execution, by a Messenger-at-Arms or other Officer of the Law. An execution is an attestation, under the hand of the messenger or other officer, that he has given the citation, or executed the diligence, in terms of his warrant for so doing. Executions must be subscribed by the executors and witnesses, otherwise they are null; and where the execution consists of more pages than one, each page, or at least each leaf, ought to be signed by the executor and witnesses; although an accidental omission to sign a page may not be fatal. The witnesses cannot validly subscribe by initials; and they, as well as the officer, must subscribe each page, or at least each leaf; for they are witnesses to the fact attested, not to the subscription of the officer, whom, therefore, it is not necessary that they should see subscribe. And, correctly, the execution ought to bear that the witnesses were witnesses to the premises, or, at least, the fact that they were witnesses must follow by direct implication from what is stated in the execution. In executions of inhibitions, interdictions, hornings and arrestments, the witnesses, besides subscribing, must be designed; 1681, c. 5. In other executions, their designation is not required, although their subscription is; 1686, c. 4. But it is usual and proper to design the witnesses in all executions. No witness ought to be taken who might not competently be a witness to the subscription of a private deed. Executions ought to mention the letters which are their warrant; and executions of summonses must also expressly name and design the pursuers and defenders, otherwise they will not be sustained; 1672, c. 6, and A. S., 8th July 1831. Where, however, the execution is indorsed upon the summonses, and not written on a separate sheet from that on which the summons is written, a reference to the parties, as within named and designed, appears to be sufficient. But even in that case, the safer practice is to mention the names. See, on this subject, Dunbar, 20th Feb. 1755, Mor. 3746; Watt, 10th Feb. 1827, 5 S. & D. 334; Stewart, 12th Jan. 1831, 9 S. & D. 260; Creightons, 16th Nov. 1832, 11 S. & D. 30; Collier, 3d June 1834, 12 S. & D. 674; Globe Insurance Co., Dec. 10, 1842, 5 D. 294. It is not indispensable to design the parties in executions of diligence; the rule being limited to the case of summonses. In the execution, the messenger or other officer must detail what he did, in order that it may appear that he proceeded lawfully; and it seems to be now settled, that if the execution should omit to state any essential step which was actually taken, that omission cannot be competently supplied by the parole evidence of the witnesses who were present and saw it performed.

In addition to the requisites above mentioned, certain executions, with their warrants, must be registered, under the sanction of nullity. Thus hornings, with the executions of charge and of denunciation, must be registered within fifteen days after denunciation, otherwise a caption cannot be obtained; 1579, c. 75. (See Denunciation.) In like manner, inhibitions and interdictions, with the executions of their publication, must be registered within forty days after publication, under sanction of nullity; 1581, c. 119. (See Inhibition. Interdiction.) So also, executions of summonses to interrupt prescription of real rights must, with their executions, be registered within sixty days after the date of the execution and instrument of interruption, otherwise they are ineffectual against singular successors; 1696, c. 19. Blank executions,—i. e., executions which persons, relying on the faith of the executor, are prevailed on to sign, as witnesses along with him, blank or unfilled up,—are declared to be void and null to all intents and purposes; and the lieges are prohibited to fill up such blank executions. The penalty to the executor is deprivation and perpetual incapacity to hold the office of a messenger; and to the witnesses, infamy; A. S. 28th June 1704.

Two witnesses were formerly required to executions, but one is now sufficient, except in cases of poinding, in which cases two witnesses are still necessary; 1 & 2 Vict., c. 114, § 32; 9 & 10 Vict., c. 67, § 1; 1 & 2 Vict., c. 119, § 23. By the statute 1592, c. 141, it is enacted, that "all copies of summonds and letters, quiblkis sall be delivered to ony party, be subscribed be the officiar executor thereof." It is to be observed, however, that the word summons, as here used, is held to signify merely the citation, and that it is sufficient that the citation has been subscribed; Izatt v. Robertson, 25th January 1840, 2 D. 476. It is not requisite that the citation be signed by the witness; Beattie v. Lee, 14th Feb. 1823, 2 Sh. 220 (N. E. 194); Shand's Prac. 249. By 1693, c. 12, it is enacted, but only under the sanction of deprivation and tinsel of office to the messenger, that "all copies of summons, charges, inhibitions, arrestments, or other letters whatsoever, given to the party, shall bear at length, and not in figures, the day and date of the delivery thereof, as also the names and designations of the witnesses in such sort as the execution and indorsation did and doth bear the same." According to Stair (iv. 38, § 12), the word indorsation is merely another name for execution. As to the executions of citations and of charges, see the articles Charge, Citation, Edictal Citation, Execution of Sentences and Decrees.

There are numerous recent illustrations of the accuracy and punctuality required in the executions, especially of diligence. See the cases of Glen, Nov. 19, 1841, 4 D. 36; Craig, Nov. 23, 1841, 4 D. 54; Clason, Feb. 15, 1842, 4 D. 743; Scott, June 27, 1844, 6 D. 1221, App. 5 Bell, 126; Burleigh, July 20, 1848, 10 D. 1517; Hanna, March 2, 1849, 11 D. 941; Henderson, Feb. 28, 1852, 24 Jur. 285, 1 Stuart 527.

Much information as to the solemnities requisite in the executions of warrants of imprisonment is to be found in the report of the case of Scott, January 18, 1855, 17 D. 292.

Where an execution is ex facie regular and complete, it cannot be contradicted by way of exception, or set aside by the production of the copy citation or charge; and objections inferring falsehood in the writ, are not entertained except in an action of reduction improbatum; Barbour, 22d June 1838, 16 Sh. 1184; Balfour, 2d February 1839, 1 D. 458. Amended executions have, in certain circumstances, been sustained; as where an execution bore that a citation had been given on the 25th March, instead of on the 26th; and it appears to have been held that this was competent, although the amended execution was not lodged until after the summons had been called in court, and objection had been taken to the execution; Henderson, 23d May 1848, 10 D. 1035. But see also Allan, 26th May 1848, ib. 1060. The form of executions of charge is provided for by 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, sched. 2; and that of summonses by A. S., 8th July 1831, § 1, sched. 5. The fact of execution is to be distinguished from the officer's attestation or writ, called an execution; but that writ is the only competent evidence of the fact of execution. See Stair, iv. 38, § 12; and Henderson, 23d May 1848, ut sup. Warrants must be executed by a proper and competent officer. All writs issued in the name of the Sovereign may be executed by messengers-at-arms, and, in civil matters, by them only. As to criminal warrants, see Execution of the Libel. Signet letters can only be executed by messengers; but in special circumstances, as where there happened to be no messenger within reach of the place where the service was to be made, special authority has been granted by the Court of Session to sheriff-officers to execute its warrants; Cooper, 1854, 16 D. 1104. It is sufficient, however, that the person intrusted with the execution of a writ shall have been at the time habit and repute qualified; Ersk. i. 4, § 33; and iv. 2, § 6; Stair, iv. 42, § 12. But after public intimation in the newspapers of a messenger's deprivation, all executions by him are null. Executions must proceed on competent authority, and must be conform to their warrants. As a general rule, warrants are only authoritative within the jurisdiction of the court from which they are issued; but by recent statutes provision is made for the execution of sheriffs' warrants, extra territorium; 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114; and 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119.

Execution of the Libel. Under the articles Criminal Prosecution and Edictal Citation, some account will be found of the mode of serving the indictment, or the criminal letters on the accused. Under the present article, therefore, it is only necessary to observe, that the messenger or macer, by whom the libel has been served, must verify the fact by a written execution under his own hand, and the hands of witnesses specially designed (1587, c. 85), in whose presence the service must have been made. In the ordinary case, and unless where, from there being two indictments against the same person, or otherwise, there be room for ambiguity, it will be sufficient that the execution mention the date of the libel, and the names of the prosecutor and panel, without taking notice of the crime laid to his charge. The manner of citing panels, when within Scotland, is regulated chiefly by the statutes 1555, c. 33, 1587, c. 85, and 1672, c. 16; and, in connection with that subject, it may here be observed, that it has been the practice of late years for the messenger or macer who executes the libel, to number at the top, in his own hand, and to sign at the bottom, every page of the copy left for the panel; Hume, ii. 236-254. An execution must also be returned, by the officer who has cited the witnesses, attesting that he has done so; and the same form is required to prove the citation of the jurymen; which, however, is, by uniform custom, valid without witnesses, and under the hand of the officer alone; Hume, ii. 300; Bell's Notes, 222; and 1 and 2 Vict., c. 119, §§ 24-6; 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80, § 33; Alison's Prac. 310-39.

By 11 and 12 Vict., c. 79, all writs and warrants, including indictments and criminal letters, may be served or executed by sheriff-officers of the county within which such execution is to be made. See on the subject of this article, the articles Citation. Dwelling-House.

Execution of Sentences and Decrees. The executive power of the State is vested in the Sovereign; and, by the law of Scotland, all execution of decrees and sentences, whether civil or criminal, proceeds either directly in the name of the Sovereign, in virtue of letters or writs of execution, under the Royal Signet, or on the authority of judges or magistrates, to whom a certain portion of executive power is delegated by the Sovereign. Inferior judges are vested not only with jurisdiction to a limited extent, but with power so far to execute their own sentences; subject, generally speaking, to appeal to the Supreme Courts. But the chief executorials (as they are termed by our institutional writers), or the means of obtaining civil execution against the person or estate of the debtor, are letters or writs in the Sovereign's name, passing under the Signet for Scotland. Personal diligence, or execution in civil causes, was formerly warranted almost exclusively by letters of horning and caption; the act of warding of magistrates of royal burghs, and the statutory power of justices of the peace, under the Small Debt Acts, to authorise imprisonment, being the only exceptions; and civil execution against heritable or moveable property, was, as it still is, warranted by the diligences of poinding, arrestment, confirmation as executor creditor, and adjudication. The nature of those several diligences is explained under separate articles.

By the Personal Diligence Act, 1 and 2 Vict., c. 114, improvements have been made in the form of diligence against the persons of debtors, and the law as to arrestment and poinding has been amended. Under that act, all extracts of decrees, "on which execution may competently proceed," now contain warrants to charge, under the pain of poinding and imprisonment, and to arrest and poind. Upon the extract, it is made lawful to arrest, and to charge the debtor or obligant to pay or perform, within the days of charge. Upon the expiration of the days of charge without payment or performance, poinding may follow; and the execution of charge being registered within year and day, such registration has the same effect as if the debtor or obligant had been denounced rebel in virtue of letters of horning. Thereupon, a certificate of registration being written upon the extract and execution (if it be apart), application may be made for warrant to imprison, and, "if there be no lawful cause to the contrary," the Bill Chamber Clerk, or, in cases of sheriff-court decrees, the Sheriff Clerk, "shall write on the extract this deliverance" Fiat ut petitur, "and shall date and subscribe the same." The extract and deliverance are then a warrant to imprison. Reference is made to the Act for the forms, and for the particular procedure in the case of decrees of the Supreme Court, and of the Sheriff Courts respectively. The provisions of the Act apply to decrees of the Court of Teinds and Court of Justiciary, as well as of the Court of Session; but the provisions for carrying a charge into execution by imprisonment do not apply to the case of decrees which are not in use to be enforced by caption and imprisonment, as,—(1.) Decrees of removing, which are enforced by letters of ejection; (2.) Decrees of adherence, which are enforced by decree of divorce; (3.) Decrees against superiors to enter vassals and declarators of tinsel of superiority, on which no farther execution is competent beyond horning and execution thereof; and on the expiry of the recorded charge, the vassals complete their rights in another way than by caption. The hornings in all these cases grant warrant to charge "under pain of rebellion and putting to the horn," and not under the pain specified in the Personal Diligence Act. It may be observed, generally, that the Personal Diligence Act provides only for that description of diligence which can be completed by incarceration. Diligence executed under the provisions of this act has the same effect as if it had been executed by virtue of letters of horning or of caption, or as if arrestments and poindings had been executed under the forms theretofore in use.

In criminal cases, the sentence is carried into execution either by the magistrates of the burgh, or by the sheriff of the county, according as the sentence is to receive execution within the territory, comprehended in the jurisdiction of the one or of the other. The warrant for the execution is the sentence of the court or judge by whom the criminal was tried; that being sufficient without the special intervention of the Royal authority, which is never interposed between the sentence and the execution, except for the purpose of pardoning the convict, or delaying the day of his execution, or mitigating the rigour of his punishment; and, in executing the sentence, the terms of the judgment must be precisely and literally adhered to. Formerly, under 11 Geo. I., c. 26, a sentence importing capital punishment, pronounced in Edinburgh, or in any place southward of the Firth or River of Forth, could not be put to execution within less than thirty days from its date; and if pronounced to the northward of the firth, within less than forty days. But now (from and after 1st August 1831), the day of execution of a capital sentence, southward of the Firth of Forth, must not be less than fifteen nor more than twenty-one days after the date of the sentence; and northward of the firth, not less than twenty or more than twenty-seven days; 1 Will. IV., c. 37, § 2. See articles Criminal Prosecution. Fine. Imprisonment. Transportation. Capital Punishment. See also Hume, ii. 445-475.

Executioner. See Doomster.

Executor. An executor is the legal administrator of the moveable estate of a deceased person, for behoof of all concerned therein; or, more correctly, perhaps, he may be said to be a judicial trustee for the collection and distribution of the defunct's moveable estate and effects amongst those interested, according to the rules of law. The office of executor is conferred either by the written nomination of the defunct, or, failing that, by decree of the Commissary; the executor, in the former case, being called an executor-nominate, and, in the latter, an executor-dative. In either case, the executor must complete his title to administer, by a judicial proceeding, called a confirmation, without which he has no jus exigendi; nor are the debtors to the defunct in safety to pay to him. See Confirmation. Persons applying to the Commissary for confirmation as executors, are preferred to the office in a certain order; the executor-nominate, whether a relation to the defunct or not, being invariably preferred in the first place; failing such nominee, universal disponees are preferred; then the next of kin; all in the same degree being entitled, if they please, to be conjoined in the office; then the relict; then creditors in liquid grounds of debt; and, lastly, a special legatee. Under the recent Moveable Succession Act, 18 Vict., c. 23, although surviving next of kin have still, in their order, exclusive right to the office, the children or descendants of next of kin predeceasing, are entitled to confirmation when no next of kin compete. According to the above order, the Commissary will proceed in conferring the office; the parties claiming it respectively proving their title to be confirmed in the particular character in which they claim. The office of executor being, in effect, a trust, the executor, before being confirmed, is required to find caution for the faithful discharge of his trust; except in the case of an executor-nominate, who, under the statute 4 Geo. IV., c. 98, § 2, is exempted from the necessity of finding caution. But, in all other cases, the same statute provides, that the Court, in granting confirmation, shall fix the amount of the sum for which caution is to be found by the person or persons confirmed; the caution not exceeding the amount confirmed. The executor confirming is also required, under certain penalties, to exhibit, upon oath, in the Commissary Court, a full inventory of the whole estate and effects to be recorded—the principal object of the statutes being to prevent evasion of the duties payable to Government. The statutes regulating this subject are the 44 Geo. III., c. 98, 48 Geo. III., c. 149, and 55 Geo. III., c. 184. See Inventory. By 4 Geo. IV., c. 98, certain other important alterations on the law with regard to executors were made. 1st, By § 1, it was enacted, that, “in all cases of intestate succession, where any person or persons who, at the period of the death of the intestate, being next of kin, shall die before confirmation be expedite, the right of such next of kin shall transmit to his or her representatives, so that confirmation may and shall be granted to such representatives, in the same manner as confirmations might have been granted to such next of kin immediately upon the death of such intestate.” 2dly, Every person requiring confirmation is, by section 3, bound, upon oath, to confirm the whole moveable estate of the defunct known at the time; it being lawful to eik to such confirmation any part of the estate which may afterwards be discovered; the whole of such estate so discovered being in like manner added upon oath—saving the provision of the act 1690, c. 26, with regard to special assignations, which remain as fixed by that statute. 3dly, It was provided (§ 4), that in the case of confirmation by executors-creditors, the confirmation may be limited to the amount of the debt and sum confirmed, to which the creditor shall make oath; provided that notice of every application for confirmation by an executor-creditor shall be inserted in the Edinburgh Gazette at least once immediately after such application; in evidence whereof, a copy of the Gazette, containing the advertisement, must be produced in court before confirmation.

In the case where the executor is an executor-nominate or a residuary legatee, or one of the next of kin, who de jure are entitled to certain proportions of the executry, it may be observed, that although such executors, when confirmed, are trustees for all concerned, yet the creditors of such executors have an interest in their debtor's reversionary right to the executry, of which, at common law, those creditors might have been deprived by the executors refusing to confirm. To remedy this, it was provided by the act 1695, c. 41, “That, in the case of a moveable estate left by a defunct and falling to his nearest of kin, who lies out and doth not confirm, the creditors of the nearest of kin may either require the procurator-fiscal to confirm and assign to them, under the peril and pain of his being liable for the debt if he refuse, or they may obtain themselves decerned executors-dative to the defunct as if they were creditors to him: With this provision always, that the creditors of the defunct doing diligence to affect the said moveable estate, within year and day of their debtor's decease, shall always be preferred to the diligence of the said nearest of kin." In reference to this provision, it may be observed,—1st, That if the executor have confirmed, and if the funds with which, in that character, he has intrusted, can be distinguished and separated from his own funds, the defunct's creditors have a preference over the funds of their debtor in the executor's hands, even after the expiration of the year; and, 2dly, If, on the other hand, the executor have not confirmed, his creditors may apply to the procurator-fiscal, in the manner, and to the effect pointed out in the statute, or may be themselves decerned executors-dative to the defunct, as if they had been his creditors; subject to the above preference in favour of the actual creditors of the deceased. This preference, however, is a preference which was fully recognised at common law, independently of the statute, the object of which, indeed, rather appears to have been, in certain circumstances, to limit the endurance of the preference to one year; Bell's Com. ii. 81, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, §§ 35, 46. When two or more persons have been confirmed executors, they hold the office pro indiviso, and must concur in suing the defunct's debtors; and, if one of such executors refuse his concurrence, he may be excluded from the office at the suit of the co-executors. But, after the debt has been established in the executors by decree, each executor may, by himself, recover his own share, which the debtor is in safety to pay him. A debtor to the executory, however, ought not to make payment of any part of his debt to an executor-creditor, without the concurrence of the other executors confirmed; because the right of an executor-creditor to receive payment depends on the justice of his alleged debt; and if, on investigation, it prove not to have been legally due, the debtor who pays him may be compelled to pay a second time to the other executors. Generally speaking, indeed, it is prudent in a debtor to the executory to decline paying to one executor, where there are more than one confirmed, unless the other executors are parties, or consenting to the payment. All the co-executors having thus an equal right to the debts due to the defunct, it follows that they are only liable pro rata for the debts due by him, unless it appear that the executor sued, has by himself actually intromitted with as much of the executory as will cover the debt sued for; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 40. An executor being, as already explained, a trustee for all concerned, does not, by his confirmation, incur a universal responsibility for the debts of the defunct. On the contrary, he is only liable to the value of the inventory in the confirmation, non ultra vires inventarii. But he is liable in diligence for making the inventory effectual. See Diligence. A year after confirmation is usually allowed for this purpose (1503, c. 76); and a decree and registered horning is accounted sufficient diligence against debtors to the executory. In like manner, an executor-creditor, who confirms more than the precise amount of his debt, is liable in diligence for the recovery of what he confirms; A. S. 14th Nov. 1679. Executors, it is thought, are liable in interest on the sums belonging to the executory recovered by them, although the contrary is laid down by Erskine, who states that they are not accountable for the interest they receive, since they lend the money at their own risk; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 41; Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, § 57. An executor has always been held bound to communicate to all having interest in the executory, the benefit of eases got in transacting the debts acquired by him after confirmation; Ersk. ibid. § 42.

It is a general rule, that an executor should pay no debt of the defunct's without the authority of a decree; and even where a decree is produced, that he should pay no debt within the six months immediately following the defunct's decease. But from this rule, there is an exception in favour of what are called privileged debts; such are,—1. Deathbed and funeral charges. 2. A year's rent of the house in which the deceased resided at the time of his death; and his servants' wages for the year or term current at his death, according as the wages are payable yearly or termly. 3. Where the defunct has been an office-bearer in a friendly society, a statutory preference over his effects, for payment of sums due by him to such societies, is provided by 18 and 19 Vict., c. 63, § 23; such debts being directed to be paid "before any of the other debts are paid or satisfied." 4. The expense of confirmation and management comes off the total of the executory, and, like privileged debts, is preferable; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 46. Those privileged debts may be paid by the executor without a decree, and without waiting the expiration of the six months. The executor might also at one time have retained the executory funds, without judicial authority, in payment of debts due to himself by the defunct; and, in like manner, he might, unless legally interpellated, have paid such debts as the defunct acknowledged to be due in his testament. But, since the date of the Act of Sederunt, 28th Feb. 1662, this has not been held admissible to the prejudice of the pari passu ranking of creditors claiming within the six months. But, if no claim be made within the six months, the executor, after the lapse of that period, may, unless interpellated, both retain in payment of debts due by the defunct to him, and pay the residue primo venienti. Even when a decree is produced to the executor, he cannot competently make payment to the party producing it, to the prejudice of creditors whose debts the defunct admits to be due in his testament; for the acknowledgment of the debts by the defunct in his last will, which it is the duty of the executor to execute, is accounted a sufficient interpellation to protect the interests of testamentary creditors without the necessity of any step on their part; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 43, et seq.; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 72. It follows from the nature of the executor's office, that he is accountable to the parties interested, for the due collection and distribution of the executory. If, therefore, he fail in the performance of his duty, he is liable, qua executor, and to the extent of the inventory, to a personal action at the instance of any of the parties beneficially interested; decree in which action will authorise personal diligence against him, and will also entitle the creditor to attach, by poinding or arrestment, the funds unrecovered in the hands of the defunct's debtors. Or, if the executor has taken bonds from such debtors in his own name, the executory creditors may attach the sums in those bonds, and they will be preferable over those sums to the executor's own creditors. And where the executory funds and the individual funds of the executor have been so mingled that they cannot be identified, diligence may proceed against the person and the individual estate of the executor; failing which, recourse may be had on the cautioner in the confirmation; Bell's Com. ii. 81, 5th edit. So, also, if there be omissions in the inventory made up by the executor in the confirmation, or if the articles in that inventory be undervalued, any creditor of the defunct may bring an action against the executor for the value of the subject omitted, if the executor's intromission with that subject can be proved. Or the creditor may apply to the Commissary Court to be himself confirmed executor ad omissa vel male appretiatia, to which application the executor already confirmed must be made a party; and the only effect of such a proceeding, generally speaking, is to obtain the omitted or undervalued effects added to the inventory at their true value; Bell's Com. ubi cit. p. 81; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 36, et seq.; Jurid. Styles, ii. 498.

The share of the executry to which formerly an executor-nominate was himself entitled, varied according to circumstances: 1st, Where a stranger was nominated to the office by the defunct, he was, by the act 1617, c. 14, allowed to retain to himself one-third part of the dead's part, after deducting debts. The eldest son or heir in heritage, when named executor by his father, as being a stranger quoad the moveable succession, where there were younger children and an heritable succession, was entitled to retain a third under this statute. The widow, in like manner, when nominated executrix, was accounted a stranger, not being one of the next of kin, and she also was entitled, qua executrix, to the third of the dead's part. It followed, that if the dead's part was exhausted by legacies, the executor-nominate, where he was a stranger and not a legatee, was entitled to no remuneration whatever for his trouble. 2d, Where the defunct bequeathed a legacy to a stranger executor-nominate, the legacy was, in terms of the last-mentioned statute, imputed pro tanto of the executor's third; and, if the legacy exceeded the third of the dead's part, it was declared that the executor should be entitled to his legacy, but to no part of the third. 3d, If the executor-nominate, as one of the next of kin, was entitled to a share of the moveable succession, he could claim no allowance for his trouble as executor, unless his interest in the succession was less than a third, in which case he might have retained as much of the dead's part, as, when added to his legal share, made up a third. 4th, Executors-dative were not, under the statute 1617, c. 14, nor at common law, entitled to any remuneration for trouble, nor to anything more than reimbursement of the actual expenses they incur. Lastly, Where a stranger is named by the defunct, not only executor, but universal legator or legatee, the whole free residue of the executry goes to him, to the prejudice of the next of kin, who, in such circumstances, have no interest (unless as legatees) in the dead's part; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 26; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 53; Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, § 4; Mackenzie's Obs. on Stats. pp. 350, 351. See Dead's Part. By the act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23, 1855, executors-nominate are, as such, no longer entitled to retain a third, or any portion, of the dead's part.

The office of executor, like other trusts, is personal, and not descendible to heirs. Hence, where two or more have been confirmed executors, on the death of one of them, the office

accrues to the survivors or survivor, and falls entirely on the death of the whole. In the latter case, the Commissary was formerly in use to appoint an executor-dative quoad non executa, who was accountable, not to the next of kin of the deceased executors, but to the next of kin of the defunct, the unexecuted part of the testament being held to be still in bonis of him. The part executed, and the responsibilities therewith connected, were, of course, transmitted to the next of kin of the deceased executors in the ordinary course of succession. But, for upwards of a century and a half, the confirmation has, in every case, been held to have the effect of an assignation or procuratory in rem suam, whereby the full right to the subjects confirmed, and, consequently, the right to execute the testament, in so far as unexecuted, is transmitted to the representatives of the deceased executors; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 38. It was formerly the practice for executors who desired to have their accounts settled, and to be discharged of their trust, to raise actions before the Commissary Court, concluding for decree of exoneration. This form of action is gone into desuetude; and, according to the present practice, no formal exoneration is considered necessary; but when an executor is sued by creditors or others interested, and entitled to call him to account, he may competently plead, by way of exception against such action, that the inventory in the confirmation is exhausted by lawful payments, not by mere decrees ordaining him to make payment. If there be any debts mentioned in the inventory as due to the defunct, which have not been received by the executor, he will be exonerated as to those, by producing decrees and registered hornings against the debtors, and by granting assignations thereof to the defunct's creditors who are insisting in the action against the executor, so as to enable them, if they please, to sue the defunct's debtors for payment; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 75, et seq.; More's Notes, p. cccliv. et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 47. See generally, on the subject of the present article, *Stair, B. iii. tit. 8; Mackenzie, B. iii. tit. 9; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9; Kames' Stat. Confirmation of Executors under the Recent Act.—By the act 21 and 22 Vict., cap. 56 (1858), the law relating to confirmation of executors is amended. The practice of raising edicts of executry for the decerniture of executors is abolished, and it is now no longer competent for a party to obtain himself decerned executor in virtue of such an edict. A person desirous of being decerned executor or disponee, next of kin, creditor, or in any other competent character, or of having some other person possessed of such character decerned executor, must present a petition to the Commissary for the appointment of an executor as nearly as may be in the form given in the schedule annexed to the act. Where the deceased died domiciled in Scotland, the petition may be presented to the Commissary of the county in which he was domiciled; and where he died domiciled furth of Scotland, or without any fixed or known domicile, the petition must be presented to the Commissary of Edinburgh. In place of publishing the petition at the kirk door and market-place, as was the practice in regard to edicts, it must be intimated by the Commissary-Clerk affixing a full copy of the petition on the door of the Commissary Court-House, on some conspicuous place of the court, and of the office of the Commissary-Clerk, in such manner as the Commissary may direct, and by the keeper of the record of Edictal Citations at Edinburgh inserting, in a book kept by him for that purpose, the names and designations of the petitioners, and of the deceased, and the place and date of his death, and the character in which the petitioner seeks to be decerned executor. On the expiration of nine days after certification of intimation and publication, the petition may be called in court, and an executor decerned, or other procedure take place, according to the forms in use, in case of edicts of executry, and with the like force and effect. A decree-dative may be extracted three days after it has been pronounced; but the law as to executors finding caution, remains as formerly; only bonds of caution may be partly printed and partly written. The course of procedure in use before the act in regard to confirmations of executors-nominate remains unaltered. Inventories of personal estates of deceased persons and relative testamentary writings may be given up and recorded in, and confirmation may be granted and issued by, any Commissary Court to which it is competent to apply under the act for the appointment of an executor-dative. The inventory of the personal estate of any person who has died domiciled in Scotland may include any personal estate of the deceased situated in England or Ireland, or in both; but the person applying for confirmation must satisfy the Commissary that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland; and the Commissary must find by his interlocutor that he died so domiciled; and such interlocutor is conclusive evidence of the fact of domicile. The value of the personal estate situated in England or Ireland must be separately stated in the inventory, and the inventory must be impressed with a stamp corresponding to the entire value of the estate in the inventory, wherever situated. Oaths and affirmations in inventories may be taken either before the Commissary or his depute, or the Commissary-Clerk or his depute, or before any commissioner appointed by the Commissary, or before any magistrate or justice of the peace within the United Kingdom or the colonies, or before any British consul. A confirmation to a party who has died domiciled in Scotland, and which includes personal estates situated in England or Ireland, on being produced in the principal Court of Probate in England, or in the Court of Probate in Dublin, and duly sealed, has the same force and effect in England or in Ireland, as if a probate or letters of administration had been granted by these courts. In the same manner, any probate or letters of administration granted in England or Ireland, to the executors of a person therein stated to have died, domiciled there, on being produced in the Commissary Court of the county of Edinburgh, and indorsed by the Commissary-Clerk with the certificate in the form prescribed by the statute, has the same operation in Scotland as if it had been granted by the Commissary Court. In order to secure the payment of the full and proper stamp duties, Probates or letters of administration are considered to be granted for the whole of the personal estate of the deceased in the United Kingdom, and in the same manner the inventory exhibited in the Commissary Court, before obtaining confirmation, must include the whole of the personal estate of the deceased in the United Kingdom, and the value thereof. On applying for probate or letters of administration, the affidavit required must specify the fact that the deceased was domiciled in England or Ireland, according to the deponent's belief; and such affidavit is sufficient to authorise the fact of domicile to be so stated in or upon the probate or letters of administration; but such statement, and the interlocutor of the Commissary finding that the deceased was domiciled in Scotland, is evidence only for the purposes of the act.

Executor-Creditor. Where the executor-nominate, and the other executors legally entitled to expedite confirmation, have declined confirming, any creditor of the deceased holding a liquid ground of debt may obtain himself confirmed executor-creditor, to the effect of administering as much of the estate as may be sufficient to pay his debt; A. S. 14th Nov. 1679. The creditor's right, or, more correctly speaking, this diligence, is completed by the confirmation—the mere decree-dative of the Commissary, which precedes the confirmation, not being sufficient to complete the right. And where other creditors are in circumstances to do so, they may apply to the Commissary, and be confirmed along with the first; or another creditor may himself confirm executor-creditor also, and summon the first to communicate a share of the fund which he has confirmed; Bell's Com. ii. 81. Where, again, the debt of the creditor of the defunct is not constituted, the act 1695, c. 41, provides, that it shall be lawful for the creditor, who has a depending cause or claim against the defunct, at the time of his death, “to charge the defunct's nearest of kin to confirm executor to him within twenty days after the charge given; which charge, so executed, shall be a passive title against the person charged, as if he were a vicious intromitter, unless he renounce; and then the charger may proceed to have his debt constitute, and the hereditas jacens of moveables declared liable by a decree cognitionis causa; upon the obtaining whereof, he may be decerned executor-dative to the defunct, and so affect his moveables in common form;” Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 34, et seq.; Bell's Com. ii. 81. In order to secure an equitable distribution of the funds of a defunct, it was provided, by 1654, c. 16 and 18, enacted during the Usurpation, “that hereafter there be no executor-creditor decerned and confirmed to any defunct until half a year be passed after the defunct's decease; and that no decree for payment be extracted against any executor for six months after the defunct's death; and that all creditors who shall use diligence against the executor, within the said six months, shall come in pari passu with others who have decrees ready to extract.” This enactment was repealed at the Restoration, but substantially re-enacted by the declaratory Act of Sederunt, 28th Feb. 1662; whereby it was provided, “that all creditors of defunct persons using legal diligence at any time within half ane year of the defunct's death, by citation of the executors and intromitters with the defunct's goods, or by obtaining themselves decerned and confirmed executors-creditors, or by citing of any other executors-creditors confirmed, the said creditors using any such diligence before the expiry of half ane year, as said is, shall come in pari passu with any other creditors who have used more timely diligence." The posterior creditors, before taking benefit by the inventory confirmed, being bound to pay a proportional part of the expense incurred by the executor-creditor first decerned and confirmed; and it being lawful for such posterior creditor or creditors to obtain themselves conjoined with the first in the office of executors-creditors. The distinction between the pari passu preference thus introduced, and that of adjudication within year and day of the first effectual one, is that, in the case of adjudications, the participation of creditors adjudging, after the expiration of the year and day, in the benefit of the first adjudication, is absolutely excluded; whereas, claims upon the executry may be made, notwithstanding the expiration of the six months, so as to give the claimant a share of the fund, if it be still undivided; Bell's Com. vol. ii. 81. See also Bank. B. iii. tit. 8, § 81, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 45, et seq.; Bell's Princ. § 1895; Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 63; More's Notes, cclxxxix. cclcx.

Executors. This term is sometimes applied designative to the next of kin of a defunct who are entitled to his moveable succession ab intestato. In this acceptation, the executors, or heredes in mobilibus, are the whole next of kin of the defunct—i. e., all the nearest in degree of blood; for, although an only child is both heir and executor to his or her father, yet, if there be two or more children, or, failing children, if there be two or more equally near in degree, they succeed ab intestato to equal portions of the moveable estate, without regard to primogeniture, and with no preference of males to females, except where a person dies, leaving both heritage and moveables. In that case, where one of the next of kin (e. g., the eldest son) is heir to the heritage, he is not entitled to any share of the moveable succession, unless he choose to exercise the privilege of collation. Heiresses-portioners who succeed ab intestato to equal portions, pro indiviso, of the heritable estate, are all equally entitled, as next of kin, to shares in the moveable succession. Hence, although the eldest sister should take the heritable estate destinations of her father, or under an entail, she is not thereby deprived of her share of the moveables which she may claim without collation. See Collation. The jus representationis had no place in moveable succession. Thus, the defunct's surviving children were formerly his next of kin or executors, to the exclusion of a grandchild by a son or daughter who had predeceased the defunct. In like manner, if one died without issue, leaving two sisters, and a nephew or niece by a third sister, deceased, the two surviving sisters succeeded to the whole moveable estate, to the exclusion of the child of the sister who predeceased her father. This is now altered by the act 18 and 19 Vict., c. 23, 1855. It is of importance to attend to a distinction in the case of full and half blood. In the line of ascendants and descendants, all are said to be full blood; that is, all the defunct's lawful children, though by different mothers, are, with respect to their father's moveable succession, his next of kin. But in the collateral line the rule is different; for in that succession children by the same father and mother, or brothers and sisters german, and their issue, are accounted nearer in degree than their brothers and sisters by the half blood. Hence, it is a rule in moveable as well as heritable succession, that the full blood excludes the half blood in the same line of succession. Thus, if the deceased leave a sister-consanguinean,—i. e., by the father's side,—and a nephew by a sister-german who has predeceased the defunct, the nephew will succeed to his uncle's moveable estate, to the entire exclusion of the sister by the half blood. Failing descendants both by the full and by the half blood, ascendants succeed; for it is a rule that the father and his brothers, and other kindred in the ascending line, never succeed ab intestato, while any of the father's children or their issue exist. Where the father succeeds as his child's next of kin, he succeeds to the entire exclusion of the mother, who formerly was in no case accounted as of kin, to the effect of succeeding ab intestato to her children, even although the property should have come originally from her. And, upon the same principle, all persons related through the mother, including brothers and sisters uterine, are excluded. See Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 32; Bank. B. iii. tit. 4, § 16, et seq.; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, §§ 2, 3. Where the defunct has not nominated an executor or administrator of his moveable estate, nor disposed it in favour of a general donee, the whole next of kin or executors are entitled to the administration pro indiviso, and may obtain confirmation accordingly. The authorities cited under the article Executor may be consulted as to this article also. See Executor. Confirmation.

Executry; is the general name given to the whole moveable estate and effects of a defunct (with the exception only of heirship moveables), and is the proper subject of the executor's administration. It includes not only what belongs to the executor by his office, or succession, but all that belongs to the defunct's relict, children, or nearest of kin, legatees, and creditors. Stair, B. iii. tit. 8, § 1; Ersk. B. iii. tit. 9, § 1; Bell's Com. i. 141; Sandford on Heritable Succession, i. 43;

Exercitor. An exercitor is the person to whom the profits of a ship or trading vessel belong, whether he be the actual owner or merely the freighter. According to Erskine, the word is derived from exercere, to employ—an exercitor being one who employs the ship in the way of trade on his own account. An exercitor is liable for all repairs, provisions, or furnishings, of whatever kind, necessary for the ship or crew, and ordered by the master, or by the person in the actual charge of the ship. This obligation is founded on an implied mandate, which the exercitor is presumed to have granted in favour of the master, to the effect of procuring whatever may be needful for the successful prosecution of the voyage. Hence, the master may, in that character, competently bind the exercitor for such furnishings, even although the master may be himself incapable of contracting a binding obligation on his own account; for any one may be appointed master, “without distinction of age, sex, or condition; even pupils, and women clothed with husbands;” Ersk. infra cit. But although the contractions of a shipmaster, who is not sui juris, thus bind his constituents, yet, in the ordinary case, the master as well as the exercitor is personally bound to the furnisher; for a shipmaster is not accounted a mere administrator for the owners. Whoever is in the actual command of the vessel is deemed to be præpositus, præsumptione juris et de jure, without any commission from the exercitor, and even although he should be acting as master without the exercitor's knowledge, and contrary to his orders. The exercitor is also liable for the necessary furnishings, whether the master has purchased them with his own money, or has borrowed money for the purpose. It is to be observed, however, that a shipmaster's obligations for borrowed money bind the exercitor, only where the advance has been made in a foreign port; while contractions for ordinary and necessary furnishings bind the exercitor, although made to the master in a home port; Lindsay and Allan, 18th June, 1800; Fac. Coll., Mor. App. voce Mandate, No. 2. And as the master can in no case bind the exercitor in matters not falling within the trust committed to him as master, it is proper that bonds for money advanced for the use of the vessel should expressly mention the cause for which the money is borrowed. The furnisher or lender, in order to make good his claim against the exercitor, is not bound to prove that the furnishings or advances of money have been properly applied by the master; but he must be able to show that the furnishings or the
